There are many properties of below £100 a week, but that young person decided that that was the accommodation that he wanted and that he expected the taxpayer to pay for, despite the fact that many middle-aged and elderly people in my constituency are claiming housing benefit at only £40 to £60 a week, and are living in much more modest, but reasonable and acceptable, accommodation. The state should not be providing £100 a week when it is possible to live reasonably in reasonable accommodation at much less than that.

This measure is fair because it contains safeguards. Local authorities will still have the discretion to pay benefit above the average cost of shared accommodation, especially where there are examples of exceptional hardship. The other reasonable point here is that the new limit for housing benefit is to be introduced only at the average cost of non-self-contained accommodation in the region. By having regard to the average cost, the Government have been reasonable.

There are plenty of statistics around. District valuers and others are competent at assembling valuation statistics. I do not see why councils, using similar techniques, are not capable of establishing good figures on the average accommodation cost, or, therefore, why we cannot operate a housing benefit system that is much more related to real cost that can be measured and recorded.

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the question, pursuant to Order [21 May].

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Richard Ottaway and
Mr. Roger Knapman.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Before we embark on the next debate and start to use up the time allowed for it, I should like to raise a point of order on that time limit. The Order Paper states that the debate will last only one and a half hours, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14B(1).

You will be aware that, on the last page of the statutory instrument, five European Community documents are cited as the base legislation on which it has come before us. I was minded to table amendments in relation to those documents, which—if selected—would have dealt with the need for the documents, their integrity and their merits. I have refrained from doing so because of the time limit on the debate.

Could you confirm that the debate would not be confined to an hour and a half if this statutory instrument had been debated before 2 November last year and that it could have gone on until as late as 11.30 pm, which would have allowed a wide-ranging debate had I tabled those amendments and had they been selected? Could you confirm that that is the fact that now confronts the House in debating these important matters?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): That may all be true, but the current rules of the House allow only one and a half hours for the next debate. Those are the rules under which the House operates.

Fishing Vessels (Decommissioning)

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): I must inform the House that Madam Speaker has placed a 10-minute limit on all Back Benchers' speeches for the duration of this debate.

5.56 pm

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Tony Baldry): I beg to move,

That the Fishing Vessels (Decommissioning) Scheme 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 1242), dated 7th May 1996, a copy of which was laid before this House on 8th May, be approved.

I appreciate that many hon. Members want to speak in this debate, and I shall try to keep my comments as brief as possible. I hope that hon. Members will show some forbearance with interventions as I expect to cover most concerns in what I shall say.

I suspect that it will be helpful to the House if I put this order in context with what the European Commission said last week about decommissioning. Last Wednesday, the European Commissioner with responsibility for fisheries, Mrs. Bonino, held a press conference—of which we were given no notice—to outline her proposals for the next round of decommissioning, which is intended to take the European Community from now until the year 2002.

It is difficult for me to help the House in any detail on those proposals as they have not yet been tabled by the Commission, but judging from the reports of the press conference, the impact of Mrs. Bonino's proposals, if adopted, would be cuts of up to 40 per cent. in parts of the United Kingdom fishing fleet. That is wholly unacceptable.

Mrs. Bonino went on to describe the UK fishing industry as being among the "bad boys" in Europe for not having met existing decommissioning targets. Such a description is somewhat galling for the UK fishing industry, particularly as Mrs. Bonino described countries such as Spain as being among the good guys. What she failed to connect, of course, was the ability of Spanish fishing interest to move into the UK fleet. It is easier for Spain to meet her decommissioning targets when a significant number of Spanish-skippered, Spanish-owned and Spanish-crewed vessels are masquerading as UK boats and catching fish against the UK national quota. That is a crazy situation which cannot be allowed to continue. The European Commission cannot be surprised that the UK fishing industry is not and will not be prepared to contemplate any further substantial reductions in the UK fishing fleet until the Commission tackles and deals with the whole issue of quota hoppers.

When Mrs. Bonino was in the UK recently, she gave the impression that there might be some simple way within the existing rules which, if only the UK Government were to take it, would enable us to eliminate quota hoppers within a short time. No one is keener than I am to see the quota hoppers dealt with without delay and for UK fish to be available for UK fishermen. I therefore immediately instructed officials to explore in detail with Commission officials what it was that Mrs. Bonino was suggesting that we might do to tackle quota hoppers.

I am bound to tell the House that, on further detailed investigation, it became clear that there was no immediate solution that the Commission could offer. I am sorry that responsible newspapers such as The Independent, presumably on the basis of Commission briefing, have suggested that there is such a remedy available. There is not, and that is why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made it clear that we shall be seeking to deal with the whole problem of quota hoppers at the intergovernmental conference.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Baldry: I give way first to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow).

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Given the nonsense coming out of Brussels and especially that uttered by Mrs. Bonino, given the nonsense of the common fisheries policy and especially the discard policy, and given that the Government are raising the issue of quota hoppers at the IGC, may I suggest that we go one stage further and seek a fundamental renegotiation of the common fisheries policy, not least so that we could control our own waters, no doubt with the same pattern—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The debate is about decommissioning only.

Mr. Baldry: We should at all times show leadership in the European Union and in the fundamental reforms of the common fisheries policy that we seek.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Baldry: I must make progress; this is only a short debate.

The straightforward fact is that upwards of 150 UK-registered vessels are now owned, or part owned, by foreign interests, mainly from Spain and the Netherlands. They represent some 20 per cent. of our offshore fleet and take a significant proportion of UK quotas of fish such as hake, plaice, megrim, sole and monkfish. Such a situation cannot be allowed to continue. The Commission and the European Community must take action to deal with quota hoppers.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) rose—

Mr. John Sykes (Scarborough) rose—

Mr. Baldry: I give way first to the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) and then to my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough (Mr. Sykes) .

Mr. Tyler: Does the Minister recall that the issue of decommissioning and quota hopping was mentioned when I brought a delegation to see him on 27 November? He told us that it was not possible to deal with the matter in the context of the IGC. Will he consider specifically quota-hopping flag boats which have not, as I understand it, been involved in the decommissioning scheme at all, except for perhaps one boat? If the scheme continues as it is, 50 per cent. of certain species, notably hake and plaice, could be taken from our quota by quota-hopping, flag of convenience foreign boats.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This is a very short debate. Many hon. Members have put their names down to speak, but the hon. Gentleman was not one of them. Long interventions are not helpful.

Mr. Baldry: Let me make it absolutely clear that, as I have just said, at the IGC we intend to deal fully with the issue of quota hoppers. The Community has to take action to deal with quota hoppers. The current crazy situation cannot continue.

I now give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough, but I think that this must be the last intervention that I accept.

Mr. Sykes: I represent Scarborough and Whitby. Is the Minister aware of the tidal wave of anger and frustration that has swept my constituency over the question of decommissioning? Is it not time that this country decided for itself what constitutes its own waters? Should not Britannia show Mrs. Bonino the way and declare a 200-mile limit around our shores?

Mr. Baldry: I regularly meet representatives of the fishing industry. I met representatives of the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations and the Scottish Fishermen's Federation the day before yesterday, and I am glad that they very much support the line that I am taking. I work very closely with the UK fishing industry. Indeed, I see my role as doing what is in its best interests. If there is to be fishing in the European Union against national quotas, it makes sense that the quotas benefit the fishing communities of individual nations rather than the vessels of other European Union member states which rarely, if ever, visit the countries concerned—let alone bring any economic benefit—but simply catch their fish against those countries' fishing quotas.

We have told the IGC, the Commission and other member states that we shall be tabling changes to the treaty which should enable individual member states to adopt appropriate measures to ensure that their fishing communities and related industries are able to benefit fully from the national quotas allocated under Community fishing policy.

There will be an initial discussion, but no decision, on the Commission's latest proposals on fleet structure and fishing effort at the Fisheries Council in Luxembourg next week. In any event, the full proposals have not yet been issued. I shall be making it clear that, until real and substantial progress is made on tackling quota hoppers, the Commission cannot be surprised that we shall not be ready to agree how to reduce further the UK fishing fleet. I shall, however, be making a number of other points.

I do not want there to be any scintilla of a suggestion that, when progress is made on quota hoppers, we shall simply accept any restructuring or decommissioning targets that the Commission wishes to set—far from it. First, the Commission's proposals for the next round are apparently based on a report by scientists known as the Lassen report, which makes recommendations as to where fishing effort should be reduced in Community waters but, bizarrely, makes no recommendation for reducing industrial fishing. It appears that the proposals, which currently look as though they might reduce UK fishing effort by up to 40 per cent., would have absolutely no impact on industrial fishing—a form of fishing which is carried out on a huge scale and has implications for much of the marine ecosystem. It is very difficult to agree fisheries conservation measures which seek to cut pretty well every other aspect of the fishing fleet if they leave industrial fishing untouched. It is quite bizarre.

We are all aware, and the UK fishing industry recognises, that fishing is a hunting activity and that it is important that there are sustainable levels of fish left in the sea. As the recent report of the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology made clear, the world's fish stocks are in a state of crisis. That report concluded by saying:

"in their heart of hearts, scientists, fishermen, managers and politicians must all know that action must be taken now" if we are to prevent a repeat of episodes like the collapse of the Grand Bank stocks. Indeed, the scientists tell us that almost 60 per cent. of the main stocks in the waters that we fish have now been reduced to a level where there is a real risk of biological collapse. Even allowing for all the uncertainties and variables which characterise fisheries management, the stark warning in such messages is clear.

With improved technology, modern vessels are simply more efficient machines for killing fish, and fishing effort has to be matched to what the stocks will bear. Clearly there is a need to reduce fish mortality, but the Commission's proposals on decommissioning simply translate killing capacity into tonnage. Fishing vessels vary enormously, however, and it is again somewhat strange to believe that 1 tonne of an older fishing trawler has the same killing capacity as 1 tonne of a modern, large, well-equipped fishing vessel, with radar and other technology which is able with a good degree of accuracy to target, catch and kill large quantities of fish.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) rose—

Mr. Baldry: Many hon. Members wish to speak in this debate. I am sure that I shall cover any issue that the hon. Gentleman intends to raise.

Britain has, on average, a somewhat older fishing fleet than many other member states. We need to ensure that any future structural scheme takes adequate account of the age and killing capacity of the vessels involved and does not simply assume that every tonne of every fishing vessel has an equivalent killing capacity.

I shall also be making it clear next week, when these matters are raised, that countries such as Britain, which spends some £25 million on fisheries protection and enforcement—through the Royal Navy, among other means—should be given credit for that in relation to member states in which, the Commission has acknowledged, enforcement seems to be somewhat less effective.

Clearly, any fishing reduction or effort-control targets must be properly policed. There is a need to match fishing effort to available fish in the sea. Much more work and much more study is required on any proposals that the Commission might bring forward to ensure that they meet the needs adequately and fairly. While that work is going on, we shall expect real progress in considering and taking forward the tackling of quota hoppers.

It is also somewhat galling to be described as being among the "bad boys" of Europe when the European Commission persists in using figures that we have repeatedly told it are incorrect and which give the impression that the UK fishing fleet has increased in recent years. That is not so, and the facts are straightforward. In the past three years, 436 boats have been decommissioned and £26.2 million has been spent on decommissioning. That is a sizeable number of boats—and a substantial amount of money—and represents 6.6 per cent. of the original UK fishing fleet.

There has been wider confusion in the Commission about the UK's past performance and, sadly, a tendency not to compare like with like in publishing tonnage figures. We have been discussing a range of technical points with the Commission and have requested that it make a number of necessary adjustments to our multi-annual guidance programme figure. Once those corrections have been agreed, I believe that we shall be within a handful of percentage points of our target. This scheme will take us closer still.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow) rose—

Mr. Baldry: As I have said, everyone recognises the need to match fishing effort properly to available fish in the sea. This statutory instrument is designed to deal with our commitments to reduce fishing capacity and to meet targets that are due to expire at the end of this year.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Before my hon. Friend concludes, will he give an assurance that the motion is being introduced purely and simply to help the conservation of fish and has no other ramifications?

Mr. Baldry: The motion completes our obligations under the decommissioning programme. The programme's only objective is to try to match fishing effort to available fish in the sea. It is a continuation of the scheme that was already in place last year.

During the debate last year, a number of suggestions were made about possible improvements to the scheme. I and my hon. Friends who have responsibility for fishing in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland promised to listen carefully to what was said. We have listened. I gave a commitment to seek industry views on what could be done and to reconsider the position in relation to the specific queries that were raised about the scheme last year.

Dr. Godman: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Baldry: If the hon. Gentleman allows me, I might tell him some good news.

I gave a commitment, for example, to consider the position on the eligibility of nephrops vessels in the light of subsequent developments. I am glad to be able to tell the House that we have been able to meet almost all the concerns raised in the consultation exercise and significantly to expand the 1996 scheme to make it more attractive and better value for money. It might be helpful if I outline briefly those changes and the principle features of the proposed scheme.

In essence, the changes relate to the eligibility criteria, which we have widened considerably. In particular, we have reduced the number of qualifying days spent fishing from 100 to 75. We have removed the restrictions on licence type to allow any licensed vessel over 10 m in registered length to apply. That will, of course, allow applications from shell fishermen and from vessels in the Nephrops and distant water segments. I know that that is very much welcomed by the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations and the Scottish Fishing Federation. The Under–Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Robertson), has had a number of very useful discussions with the SFF on that very point.

In the consultation exercise, I suggested the possibility of allowing vessel owners to retain or dispose separately of their decommissioned vessel's track record. The response demonstrated no support for such arrangements. Again, we listened to the industry and have decided not to proceed with that suggestion. In response to a number of understandable concerns, I have introduced a greater degree of flexibility to permit historic vessels to be preserved afloat. That can be done while safeguarding public funds by allowing such vessels to be placed with registered museums. I very much hope that that will enable what is clearly a valuable part of our maritime heritage to be retained for future generations.

Mr. Gill Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Baldry: I have already given way to my hon. Friend.

The scheme was launched on 9 May and applications must be submitted before 25 June. Application forms and details of the scheme have been available in local port offices for some time, and it is clearly in the interests of anyone who wishes to apply to do so as soon as possible.

Before concluding, I should like to make one further announcement concerning the Seafish Industry Authority's application for a grant towards its promotional campaign to encourage greater consumption of fish and hence provide better market conditions in future. I am pleased to say that a grant of just over £2.5 million has been approved and will be paid over the next three years.

As the UK Fishing Minister, I have only one interest: to promote the best interests of the UK fishing industry. I think that everyone in the industry recognises that there must be sustainable levels of fishing if the industry is to have a secure future well into the next century. With improved technology, modern vessels are more efficient machines for killing fish. Fishing effort has to be matched to what stocks will bear. The 1996 decommissioning scheme is part of our strategy to ensure that the UK fleet can remain viable, better match available fishing opportunities, and continue to contribute to the renewal of the very fishing resources on which so many livelihoods depend and which I am determined will have a strong future well into the next century. I commend the motion to the House.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I welcome the Minister's recognition of some of concerns of the industry and Opposition Members in the new regulations and the multi-annual guidance programme—especially the more flexible approach and the inclusion of nephrops boats in the decommissioning scheme. Opposition Members also welcome the fact that, after lengthy correspondence, the Minister has made provision for some historically interesting boats to be bought by trusts and museums so that they can be preserved. I only hope that that policy does not lead to too many fishing boats ending up in museums.

Now that the Minister has recognised that historically interesting boats can be preserved and need not be destroyed, will he extend the policy to the sale of boats to waters outside the European Union, and, indeed, to overseas aid schemes, on which I know he has received representations from myself and groups?

This debate has been overshadowed by Mrs. Bonino's recent announcement about the 40 per cent. cut in fleet capacity. The Minister was quite right to stress that. There is a serious problem with fish stocks, which the industry recognises, and progress must be made to ensure that the capacity is matched to the available fish stocks. Opposition Members think that the 40 per cent. cut on top of what has already been agreed is just not acceptable. I am quite sure that the Minister agrees that the figure is open to negotiation. We certainly look to the Government to ensure that negotiations result in a more realistic figure.

Opposition Members also want to ensure that the figure is based on sound science. The Minister referred to the Lassen report that brought about the proposal. Although there is a need for effort control, I hope that the Government not only succeed in reducing the 40 per cent. cut but try to get the Commission to accept that effort control need not just be fleet reduction. It can also concern technical conservation gear. I know that the industry—the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations and the Scottish Fishing Federation—has submitted detailed proposals to the Ministry on how technical conservation gear can reduce effort, and I very much hope that they are taken seriously.

I also endorse what the Minister said about the disgraceful omission of industrial fishing. It is remarkable that a serious study on fish stocks has not taken into account the impact of overfishing in industrial fishing, and the effect it has on the overall ecology of the sea.

I welcome the Minister's strong comments about industrial fishing. I regret, however, that the Government gave financial aid to a fish meal plant in the United Kingdom based on industrial fishing. I only wish that they had thought about the impact of industrial fishing in the way the Minister did tonight when they were considering that particular grant.

The report concentrates on weaker stocks. That is understandable, but it does not take into account the impact of the figures. The fact that the United Kingdom fleet is older than many of the more modern fleets that have taken advantage of grants needs to be worked into the equation.

As the Minister said, the report does not take into account the impact of flag vessels on the United Kingdom register that represent 20 per cent. of the fleet fishing some stocks. That is an amazing figure. He said that action needed to be taken, and that Mrs. Bonino was considering what should be done. However, he could have produced some firm proposals to put to the Commission on how the problem of flag vessels should be tackled.

Mr. Sykes: My hon. Friends need no lectures whatsoever from Labour, as their leader says that he will never be isolated in Europe. If he had his way, we would be sold lock, stock and barrel to the European Commission, with all that that entails.

Mr. Morley: I am sorry that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman. We are having a serious debate on serious matters, not the rubbish put out by Tory central office. I have been concentrating on the central issues; however, I should stress that the Labour party argued for decommissioning and other measures, for years before the Government implemented them. We have also argued for technical conservation measures and working with the European Union to address some of the problems.

One of the main reasons why we have an aging fleet and why we are have these problems is that we were the last country in Europe to introduce the decommissioning scheme, and that should be taken into account.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is not the truth of the matter that, for the past 17 years, the Tory Government have been responsible for running down the fishing fleet around the coast of Britain? As there will be a general election in the next 12 months, they are now singing a different tune. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is rather odd that the Government, who are vetoing everything blanket fashion in the Common Market, are not voting against tonight's proposal?

Mr. Morley: The tone of the Minister's speech has subtly changed in recent debates. He seems to have moved towards a more Eurosceptic point of view. That demonstrates the weakness of the Government and the fact that the tail is wagging the dog.

I return to the serious problems and issues that must be addressed. There has been a history of mismanagement of the fisheries industry in Britain, and it does not all involve the European Union. There has been a great deal of mismanagement of Government policy, and the delay in decommissioning is only one aspect of it.

Will the Minister consider how we should deal with the flag ships? Does he have any firm proposals? Both the Minister and the Prime Minister have said that they intend to deal with flag vessels. That is fine, and we agree, but what are the Government's proposals? How do they intend to address the issue?

Some minor issues that Opposition Members have repeatedly raised have been ignored. They include the national insurance contributions from the crews of flag vessels, the requirement for British officers to captain those ships, and the proportionate use of United Kingdom port facilities. I do not dispute that there are difficulties, but the Government ought to consider them and draw up proposals.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Raymond S. Robertson): We are.

Mr. Morley: The Minister says, "We are." I hope that he will spell out some of those proposals tonight. He might like to consider raising with the Commission an extension of the decommissioning scheme in order to buy out some of the flag vessels that are currently on our register. I agree that the way in which foreign vessels have flagged out on our register to fish on our fish stocks is certainly an abuse of national quotas and fish stocks.

Mr. Gill: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm to the House that he agrees with the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang), who said on 19 December:

"It is unacceptable that we should be decommissioning vessels to facilitate additional fishing opportunities in waters around the UK for the fishing industry of one of our European partners—in this case Spain."?—[Official Report, 19 December 1995; Vol. 268, c. 1358.]

Does he agree with that?

Mr. Morley: It is totally unacceptable that we should be asking UK fishermen to decommission to make way for vessels from other member states. That is not acceptable to the Labour party. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East was quite right about that.

To return to the reduction of effort and the abuse of the flag vessels, there is a lesson of regulation for the Government to learn. We need to make progress in dealing with that and addressing our own reduction figure.

When we were termed the bad boys of Europe by Mrs. Bonino, she was referring not to the fishing industry but to the Government. We have made very little progress towards our target set by the MAGP. The Minister said that he intends to announce how near we are to that target, but hon. Members may have noticed that there was no such announcement tonight. It would be helpful if the Minister would tell the House what progress has been made and how near we are to meeting those targets.

I know that the Minister is having discussions, but some of those discussions on how the targets are met and the way in which the figures are calculated depend on the good will of the European Commission and whether it will accept the Government's interpretation of them. We are all aware that the present atmosphere is somewhat strained.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that we should make rather faster progress towards those targets? Would that not mean further cuts in the amount of fish that British fishermen can fish?

Mr. Morley: I shall come to that point in a moment, but, as the Minister said, the industry recognises there has to be some reduction, in order to match our fishing capacity to available fish stocks. There is no argument about that, but we can certainly argue about the level of the reduction, the basis of the calculation and the science being used. There is a great deal of debate on those issues.

As for meeting the reduction, Labour has long argued that, if there has to be some reduction within the present targets—not the 40 per cent. that I consider is not sustainable and will not be imposed in the United Kingdom, but the scheme that has been agreed as part of the four-year programme—it should have been front-loaded in the first place. If we agree that there should be a reduction in the fleet, surely it would be better that it should happen as quickly as possible to help those who want to get out of the industry to do so, and to make more fish available for those who want to remain in the industry. In that respect, the Minister still has an option of bringing forward the £13 million that is earmarked for next year.

Dr. Godman: Both the Minister and my hon. Friend have referred to our aging fleets. In essence, we are talking about the reduction of an aging national fleet. At the same time, we must talk about the renewal of the remaining smaller fleet. Particularly on the west coast of Scotland, we need new vessels to replace our drastically aging fleet.

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point about a real problem within the industry. If we made some progress with decommissioning, the Government would be eligible for the rebuilding grants that have benefited other countries for some years, and have enabled them to modernise their fleets. Even under the present system, a scrap and build policy that takes into account the aggregation would attract some grants. The Government might like to discuss that with the Commission.

It is clear that the common fisheries policy has failed in respect of sustainable fisheries management. It does not have the confidence of the industry, and in that respect needs a radical reform. The Opposition certainly emphasise that. The Minister said that the Government will raise the issues of reform of the CFP and of flag ships at the IGC, and we very much welcome that. I hope that they make some progress, and that they get some co-operation. But the present policy has been too little, too late, to deal with the problems of the fishing industry, and it does not provide the industry with an option. It is vital that the Government make firm proposals to ensure that we have a sustainable future for our fleet, so that many of our boats do not end up in maritime museums.

6.29 pm

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): In my opinion, it would be nonsense if the House voted against the motion tonight. The industry is in favour of the scheme, and, in a brief circulated to most hon. Members with fishing interests, the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations described the terms of the statutory instrument as "uncontroversial fine-tuning". I am sure that that is right.

I speak as a member of the all-party Back-Bench alliance that fought hard and long to have a second decommissioning scheme introduced. If we stop the decommissioning scheme as it is constituted at present, there would rightly be howls of anguish from the industry. However, I have some reservations about the impact of the decommissioning scheme.

During the last round, for example, there was a concentration of activity regarding the number of boats in certain ports to be decommissioned. In Newlyn, the decommissioning scheme reduced almost at a stroke the catching capacity of the boats there, although other boats were introduced to the area.

The background to the debate tonight is perhaps not so much the details of the scheme included in the statutory instrument, as the remarks by Commissioner Bonino, who called for a 40 per cent. reduction in certain sections of the fleet—albeit across the European Community as a whole for certain sections. Her comments provoked yet more howls of anguish from our fishermen, who were right to protest about the proposal.

The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) referred to the Lassen report, upon which Commissioner Bonino apparently based her remarks. That report is quite clearly flawed, and all the informed comment, particularly from the NFFO and the Scottish Fishermen's Federation, shows its defects. The hon. Gentleman was absolutely correct to focus on the fact that we have an aging fleet, whereas some of the boats in the Spanish fleet in particular are modern vessels.

The report therefore did not compare like with like. We must dismiss some aspects of the report, and the rather crude and unrealistic call by Commissioner Bonino. If her proposal was ever implemented—I do not think it ever will be—it would spell devastation for many of our fishing communities, and for the industry as a whole.

My complaint about Mrs. Bonino's rather superficial remarks is that, in putting forward this "solution", she ignores the basic defects of the CFP. There is a consensus in this House—irrespective of one's attitude towards Europe—that the CFP is, not working, and is in fact anti-conservationist. It is not good enough for the Commission to say that we should somehow cut our fleet, as if that were the answer to the problem. It is not, although it may be a part of the answer.

Like the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe, I accept that there will have to be some scaling down of the fleet, and the industry agrees. I regret that, but I do not believe in kidding people. However, if we do not radically reform the CFP, we shall gain nothing by reducing the size of the fleet. We must carry out a root-and-branch reform of the CFP—that is the imperative.

We must also deal with the vexed question of quota hoppers. I have been fighting this wretched business of quota hoppers—or flag of convenience vessels as we called them in the old days—for more than 15 years. I have been spelling out the dangers and what they would lead to long before Spain came into the Community, and that is when action should have been taken. I deplore the fact that the effective action proposed in the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 and overruled by the High Court was not taken before Spain came into the Community. If action had been taken, we would not have the problems we face today.

I am indebted to the NFFO for spelling out the present position in stark statistical terms. Do people not realise that, at the moment, much of our quota is not in British hands and does not belong to British fishermen or our industry? Some 46 per cent. of our hake quota and 44 per cent. of our plaice quota is owned by foreign interests, mainly Spanish. For megrim, the figure is 35 per cent., for monkfish it is 29 per cent., and for sole it is 18 per cent. It is well documented that 20 per cent. of the tonnage of our fleet is owned by foreign interests, mainly Spanish and Dutch. That is intolerable and totally unacceptable. No wonder our fishermen are seething with anger, and we were daft to allow this situation to develop. We must put a stop to it.

Having said that, I very much welcome the robust remarks of my hon. Friend the Minister in his immediate response to Commissioner Bonino's irresponsible statement a week ago. I also welcome the pledge by the Prime Minister that, if necessary, we will look for treaty changes to deal with the central issue of quota hopping.

I must say that I am sceptical about the outcome. I was in Spain two weeks ago with other members of a Committee, and we met the Spanish Foreign Minister. The reaction of the Spanish Government to our promise to pursue the matter if necessary at the IGC was to beg Britain not to do so, and they made it clear that they would use the veto if we did. What incensed me was that the Spanish said that there is no problem, despite the figures that I have quoted to the House. It is a huge problem.

We have just as much of a fight on our hands on quota hopping as we have with beef, and it will be a test of the determination of the Government and the Prime Minister to force a solution to the problem. I hope that we will succeed—and we must succeed, in the interests of our fishing industry and our fishermen. They must be our prime concern in this House, irrespective of party position. There is a huge consensus in the House, especially among those of us who have the honour to represent fishing constituencies. We need results. This is not just a game—I say that with the greatest respect to some of my hon. Friends who comment on these issues.

An industry is at stake here. We must ensure that we defend its rights and those of the United Kingdom. We must pass the statutory instrument, but we must not lose sight of the tremendous battle ahead of us on quota hopping and reform of the common fisheries policy, because the industry's future depends on it.

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I realise that time is short for the debate, and that several hon. Members wish to take part, so I shall try to be as brief as I can. I will put four questions to the Minister, in the hope that he will be able to respond to them.

The first question, which has already been raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) and by the Minister, relates to the importance of technical conservation. I should like the Minister to say what stage he has reached in discussions with his European partners and the Commission in pursuing measures on technical conservation. In particular, my constituency fishermen are interested in square mesh panels, which they consider a sensible way forward. Those panels are cheap and effective, and their use is supported by the fishermen. I would be grateful if the Minister could say whether he has taken up such measures with the Commission, and what progress he made.

My second question echoes the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) about the restructuring and modernising of older parts of the fleet. Have the Government any plans in that respect, and if so, exactly what are they? Are they working on measures to help to renew the older parts of the fleet?

My third question, which has already been raised, is what proposals the Minister has for solving the quota hopper problem. It is important that he should begin to share with the House some of his ideas on that issue, which is at the heart of the crisis we face in the industry at the moment.

In the light of the debacle over the Merchant Shipping Act 1995, it is important that the Minister shares his ideas with us at the earliest possible moment, so that we can discuss them and perhaps probe whether they offer our best solution. I remember the debates in Committee on the Merchant Shipping Act, when the Government's suggestions were criticised. The Government were told that their proposals simply would not work, and those criticisms have turned out to be absolutely valid. It is therefore important that the Minister does not charge ahead with his own ideas. He should share them with the House and the industry, which would then be better served.

My final question considers a group of people who have not been touched upon in the debate—those ordinary members of crews of fishing vessels that are decommissioned. The owners of those vessels get reasonably large sums of money from decommissioning, but those who have worked on those vessels for 10 or 20 years end up with nothing and just become unemployed.

When we consider the decommissioning package, we should also think about those ordinary crew members. We should think of measures to compensate those who are taken out of the industry through no fault of their own but simply because of its overall needs. I should be grateful if the Minister turned his mind to what can be done to help those ordinary crew members, who end up with nothing.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on his robust speech, which will be applauded by my constituents. I do not see, however, how anyone of us can have any enthusiasm for the statutory instrument, because it will not achieve the objective we all desire.

We could double the size of the fishing fleet going out to sea, and there would be no danger to our fishing stocks if our fishermen were able to go back to the fishing methods of an earlier generation. Equally, we could more than halve our existing fishing fleet and the fleets of other Community countries, and our fishing stocks would be so depleted that we would cease to have a fishing industry of any consequence if we all went along with high-tech industrial fishing methods.

Industrial fishing methods are being rapidly adopted not just in Community waters but around the world, and they have become a curse on conservation. I repeat that it is a worldwide problem, but I wish that this country would take the lead, as it is uniquely qualified to do, not just in Europe but internationally, to alert the fishing industries to the fact that, unless we tackle industrial fishing methods and the evils it is bringing, we will have a grave ecological problem in our seas in quite a short time.

The problem of quota hopping has been mentioned forcibly by several hon. Members, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris), who said that he had been arguing against it for 15 years. Surely the problem goes back to 1970, and the genesis of the common fisheries policy.

On the eve of our application to join the European Community, the Council of Ministers passed the regulation that enshrined the principle of equal access. It was therefore immaterial what country one came from, because one had equal access to all the waters. That principle was reaffirmed in 1976. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is not in his place, because I intended to remind him that he was in the House then and supported his Government, which he did loyally in those days, on that issue. Given his absence, I had better say no more about it.

We should remember that the problem goes back a long time. We conceded the principle when we joined the Community in 1973. If we are to make any progress on quota hopping, that regulation of 1976 must be expunged. I hope that the Minister will confirm that; that he will keep it in mind; and that he will do his utmost to achieve that objective. If he fails to do so, perhaps even he will consider the necessity for not just a root-and-branch reform of the common fisheries policy but something even more radical.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I do not wish to follow the point made by the hon. Member for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body), because he misunderstands the issue to the extent that the common fisheries policy is built on the concept of relative stability. It is the contradiction between quota hopping and relative stability that must be addressed as a matter of urgency.

This is an item for the intergovernmental conference, so we must know what exactly the Government propose to do. Some suggestions have been made, but no specific attempts have been made to identify the necessary approach. The Government will have my full support and that of my hon. Friends to achieve that end. The IGC has been going on for some weeks. I know that it is a lengthy process and that there is still time to discuss the issue. I understand that nothing will be decided in the discussions on Monday. I am not asking the Minister to show his negotiating hand, but he needs to reassure the industry that he is taking the issue seriously. He needs to put some flesh on the bones.

I support the statutory instrument for the reasons that everyone has explained. The relaxation of the eligibility criteria is welcome, and the prawner question, which was vexed and hard fought last year, has been dealt with. The industry is a lot happier. We would obviously be a lot happier if more decommissioning schemes were introduced, backed up with proper funding, for which we have argued for many years, at least since the late 1980s. I hope that the Government will continue to do what they can to increase the access to and eligibility for decommissioning schemes in the future.

I should like to refer to the Minister's comments on the multi-annual guidance programme. I was encouraged by the tone that he adopted on some issues. The Government are entitled to be robust about the relative position of the United Kingdom and the Commission on the MAGP. However, there is still much confusion about the exact targets and shortfall, about whether the deficit will be carried over and, if it is to be carried over, the consequences that that will have for MAGP3 and up to 2002.

I hope that, if the Minister has time, he will consider that matter. I was encouraged that he took such a robust attitude to the Lassen report and the Commission's announcement on that. A 40 per cent. reduction, even if it is over five or six years, is unacceptable, and hon. Members on both sides of the House have expressed great anger about that. I add my weight to the frustration expressed by other hon. Members. We support the Government's opposition, and I hope that that will be continued robustly.

The two specific objections to Lassen have both been mentioned, but I mention them in passing. It is unacceptable to proceed with these issues without taking account of the effect of industrial fishing and the fact that this is a biologist's report; ridiculously, there is no socio-economic analysis and perspective. The Commission must understand that, if fishermen are not committed to the schemes, mechanisms and processes, if they do not accept their value in their innermost hearts, they will not work. We must work with the grain of the industry.

Sadly, there is no basis for equating a 40 per cent. reduction in catch with a 40 per cent. reduction in capacity.

I know that the Minister received no notice of the announcement by the Commissioner, but can we get together to try to create better consultation procedures for setting total allowable catch limits? This scheme has been better than most, but it needs to be improved more in future.

The issue of quota hopping is bound up with the concept of relative stability, and we shall support efforts to change the treaty to get the common fisheries policy and quota hopping better sorted out, but it is an IGC matter and the Government need to say more about what they will do about that.

I sound a note of warning about the potential difficulty of not agreeing to consider anything to do with the Lassen report until quota hoppers are dealt with; some people would be encouraged by that, because they have a vested interest in procrastinating on both those issues. The Government must be careful how they play that tactically. A treaty change on quota hopping is necessary, but even a treaty change—the Minister might confirm this—were it to be successful, and were the Government to win that argument, could be, as far as I can read from a legal point of view, only a prospective suggestion. What can we do about those who are already in the system, and why cannot the Government use some of the money available from the CFP in connection with third-country waters, to buy people out of quota hopping? That appears a simple, straightforward way in which to proceed.

I am very worried about the continuing aging process, which has dramatically increased in the past 10 years. Ridiculously, the average age of our vessels is now 25 years. The Government are putting their head in the sand and are not making use of some of the socio-economic funds that are available through the CFP, for scrap and build and for some pension provision for those who leave the system. There is much to be done. If the Government are robust in dealing with Lassen and quota hopping, they will receive my support and that of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): This is one of those debates that happens all too rarely in the House, in which there is a virtual unanimity of view across the House from all parties, whatever view we have taken individually about our membership of the European Community in the past. Speeches such as those by my hon. Friends the Members for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) and for Holland with Boston (Sir R. Body) show the outrage that exists throughout the House. The passion that my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives brought to bear in his speech shows that the patience of fishermen throughout the United Kingdom is very thin.

Mr. Harris: It has gone.

Mr. Brown: Indeed, it has gone.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and I had the privilege of welcoming the Fisheries Minister to Great Grimsby a few weeks ago. There, despite the devastation that we have witnessed in the fishing industry in the past two decades, there was a buoyancy with the opening of the new fish market—yet suddenly Commissioner Bonino knocks that confidence. I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Minister has responded so robustly, and I hope that he will pass on the message from the House, from all the political parties, that there is outrage about the manner and tone in which she made those announcements.

I fear that, if we fail to sort out this issue, fishermen's patience with the common fisheries policy, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives said, has gone, will never return. Our patience on both sides of the House with the common fisheries policy will then go, the public's confidence in the common fisheries policy will go—if it has not gone already—and there will be a massive upwelling of public feeling, as we look at beef and as we look at fish, which will cause the public to ask the purpose of our membership of the European Community.

In the referendum in 1975, I voted against our entry into the European Community. In the past two decades, however, I bought the view that the issue was resolved once and for all—that that was it, we had had our say, the people of Britain had had their say and it was time to acknowledge that, for better or for worse, we were in the European Community and had to make the best of its institutions.

I have gone along with that view pretty well for the past 20 years. In 1986, I did vote against the Single European Act, but I bought the general view that, for better or for worse, we have been in the European Community and we must make those institutions work with regard to fish, the common agricultural policy and so on.

I do not want the House ever to have to come to consider our withdrawal from the European Community, but it will, I suspect, be an issue such as fish that will be the straw that breaks the camel's back with regard to the patience of the people out there and of the fishermen out there.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby and I constantly attend meetings with the shadow Fisheries Minister, the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley). The fishermen we meet ask us what the benefit is of being in the common fisheries policy. We say to them that, unfortunately, for better or for worse, that is the structure under which we must operate at present; that is where the negotiations must take place. The fishermen's response shows that they are starting to wonder what is in the common fisheries policy for them. The concept may have been a good idea, but currently it impinges very unfairly on our British fishermen.

I am delighted with the robust view that my hon. Friend the Minister and his colleagues in the Government have taken. I am sure that they are not countenancing failure, but if they are unable to deliver what I know that they will negotiate for, our continued membership of the European Community will be called into question. I therefore wish my hon. Friend every success, because much more hangs on a successful outcome of the negotiations than our ability to deal with this problem. I believe that, as we reach the end of this century, whatever Government are in power, the issue of fish will determine the national attitude to whether our continued membership of the European Community is a good thing.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I regret that I have not tabled an amendment, because it would be nice to have a longer debate, as we should now ask questions, and call in question the basis of the decommissioning policy. I am aware that Labour Members supported it for a long time before the Government did anything, but that delay has created a whole new ball game. It is a ball game in which the British industry is now being asked to decommission on what will be a massive scale if we cut 19 per cent. over the effort targets by the end of this year, then 40 per cent. by 2002, effectively to make room for Spanish vessels in our waters, to make more space for large, modernised, efficient European fleets, and to make more room for quota hoppers on our register.

The other European countries have reached their multi-annual guidance programme targets by flagging their vessels under the British flag. Under the MAGP targets up to the end of 1991, Spain had to reduce its effort by 2.2 per cent. It registered 3 per cent. of its fleet as British to catch our fish. The Dutch had to reduce their effort by 16 per cent., so they put 6 per cent. of the fleet under the British flag. We now carry the burden and have to reduce our effort because of that reflagging. Jim Porteous of the south-west fisheries producers organisation has calculated that the flag of convenience vessels are now catching £82 million-worth of our fish in our waters and landing it in European ports. That is why we now face this huge reduction of effort and it is one of the reasons why we should call into question the decommissioning process.

There are other reasons for calling that process into question. I have seen the Grimsby fleet drastically reduced. It is heart-rending, because it is one of the most conservation-conscious and efficient fleets in the country. It uses a larger mesh size than most other fleets and the vessels are older. They are seine netters, which is not an efficient method of fishing. It is not the vacuum cleaner method, scooping up everything. It is conservation-effective. We need more inefficient fishing, so that the fishermen catch larger fish, leaving the smaller fish to be caught later. We are taking the most conservation- effective vessels out through the decommissioning scheme, and that is wrong.

Another reason why we should question the decommissioning scheme was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald). The decommissioning proposals do nothing for the share fishermen. They are losing their jobs as the vessel is being laid up, but nothing is being done for them. I asked the Minister why the Government did not accept the European proposal—I am not advocating accepting European proposals en masse—to part-fund an early retirement scheme and a compensation scheme for fishermen on decommissioned boats. The Government said that they preferred that to be taken care of by national social security measures.

However, because we are talking about share fishermen who work on a self-employed basis, there is nothing for them when their vessel is decommissioned. They are losing their livelihood, but there is no redundancy pay and no help or support for them. If we are to have effective decommissioning, it is essential that something should be done for the fishermen—the poor bloody infantry of the industry. It is time that something was done.

We are asked to make cuts in our effort to the end of this year, as a prelude to what the Commissioner told us might be a cut of 40 per cent. in the British effort. That is ludicrous and totally unacceptable. I am delighted that the Minister is committed to working against it. I want to tell him that the only way in which it can be resisted is by calling into question the basis of equal access to a common resource on which the common fisheries policy rests. If we accept that principle, it follows as night follows day that there will be cuts pari passu across the board.

It is ludicrous that we who bring the most fish into the so-called Common Market pool—about 75 per cent. of the stock—should be asked to take the biggest cuts in our fishing effort. We are being asked to make a cut of over half. The only way to resist it is to say that the cuts should be in inverse ratio to the contribution made to the stocks. If we contribute the most stocks, we should take the lowest cuts. Spain, which has a massive fleet and no fishing waters, should take the biggest cuts. That is the only logical and acceptable way to do it.

We are reaching the end of the line. The Government have come to us bleating about the benefits of the CFP, but have done nothing for the industry except watch it be restructured by liquidation. They must stop the quota hoppers, which means an assault on that principle. They must get greater powers for the territorial states, so that we can protect our stocks and not see them stolen by other vessels. They must end the equal access. That is the only way to defend British fishing and to see some improvement. I offer the Government the principles contained in my Bill—the Fishery Limits (Amendment) Bill—which does all those things. I hope that they will look at it.

Mr. Phil Gallie (Ayr): I agree almost entirely with what has been said by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and I go along with much of what was said by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). I agree particularly with the feeling of resentment about the stocks caught by the quota hoppers. That must be addressed.

I want to make one specific point that has not been covered in the debate so far. Rather unusually, my point involves the banking system in Scotland. The banks play a major part in the fishing industry because they lend finance to the fishermen so that they can obtain the boats that they take to sea. We recognise that the fleets are aging and that in the future there will be a need for the banks to provide support if we are to increase the potential of our vessels and improve safety factors, with fishermen going to sea in modern vessels.

The problem is the way in which the decommissioning scheme will be implemented. Fishermen will have to have their documents handed in and the vessels scrapped by the end of October. Thereafter, there is a 30-day gap to the time when cheques will be handed over. I am advised that at that time, the banks lose security on that element of cash. That is not acceptable to them. It would add costs to the industry in the future if it were to be permitted and if people defaulted on their bank loans.

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: I am sorry that that technicality has arisen so late, but I shall ask my officials to discuss it with the banks concerned as a matter of urgency.

Mr. Gallie: I thank my hon. Friend. That is the assurance I sought, and I shall now sit down.

7.6 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I welcome the co-operation that is allowing all hon. Members with fishing interests to participate in the debate. Every fishing debate is controversial, and an hour and a half is not sufficient time for such a debate.

I want to make three points. We all agree that the common fisheries policy is a busted flush and should be changed fundamentally. There are three areas that destabilise the CFP. The first is the flag of convenience vessels, and that point has been mentioned many times. I remember the Merchant Shipping Bill back in 1988, when the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and I proposed amendments to toughen the conditions placed on flag of convenience vessels. At that time, despite the fact that that legislation was their fourth attempt to deal with the issue, the Government told us that everything was in order and that they had the matter in hand. They told us that our amendments were no good. Whether the amendments were good or bad, they could not have been any worse than the Government's attempts in that Bill.

The issue is now to go before the intergovernmental conference. There is a point that I want the Minister to think about. As I understand the policy of non-co-operation, everything is to be vetoed regardless of whether it is good or bad. Even if treaty changes on flags of convenience vessels were achievable, am I correct in believing that they would be vetoed by the United Kingdom? The Minister seems to be shaking his head, but as I understand the policy, everything is to be vetoed regardless of whether the United Kingdom supports it. The Minister should address that.

The second issue that destabilised the CFP was Spanish access to western waters six years before it was provided for in Spain's treaty of accession. This morning, The Times said:

> "Spain's unexpected decision to vote in favour of lifting the embargo on British bovine by-products may have been taken in the hope of a future quid pro quo with Britain on fishing rights."

We have been here before. There have been Council meetings at which Spain suddenly decided to vote for the United Kingdom's position on qualified majority voting. We then found out that the fishing industry had been sold down the river as part of that bargain. Would the Minister care to deny the report in The Times this morning that Spain's decision to side with the United Kingdom might have something to do with its interest in fishing matters?

Mr. Baldry: I have absolutely no idea where that story came from, and it bears no relation to the truth. Spain changed its view because it saw our eradication document, and it was able to support us on that basis.

Mr. Salmond: I look forward to the Minister's letter to The Times, in which he will doubtless give us the details of the dirty deal that was done with Spain three years ago, which gave it accelerated access. The Minister shakes his head, but I have heard the same point made by Conservative Members.

The third factor that has destabilised the common fisheries policy is the quota allocation. The Minister, rightly, in his short term of office has been directed to technical conservation, square-mesh panels and industrial fishing as alternative methods of conservation. We all accept that quota allocation is fine at times of abundant fishery, but when the fishery becomes tight, the quota allocation becomes perverse as a conservation policy. Many Opposition Members have put the arguments for square-mesh panels and industrial fishing to many of the Minister's predecessors for many years, but we have yet to see effective action pursued and taken.

I know that the Minister has been engaged in the dramatic consultation process in the past few months. I wish him well, but I hope that his declarations on and interest in questions of technical conservation are carried through into serious argument in the Council of Ministers.

I, too, welcome the Minister's tough talk on fishing this evening, but I have seen his predecessors come and go. They all, including the UK Fisheries Minister—as the Minister described himself—said that they would act tough and change their ways on the common fisheries policy. Yet they all went to the Council of Ministers and did not talk tough there. If they did, that did not have any effect because they acted like lambs.

The consistent feature of United Kingdom fishing policy has been to subordinate fishing to other interests in the European Union. That is why Spain, which is in the CFP, secured a good deal and Norway, from outside the CFP, secured a good deal. Fishing is an absolute priority of policy for both countries. Only when a Minister can come to the Dispatch Box and promise the House that fishing will be an absolute priority will he have any chance of success in European negotiations.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): The statutory instrument covers the period up to the end of this year, but the decommissioning will not stop there and further proposals are in the pipeline. The debate has revolved not around the instrument but around those further proposals.

The social and economic structure of the areas affected by fleet reductions has been well explored in the past and needs no repetition, other than to say that if the Irish sea fleet had to cut its catch by 40 per cent., the present onshore infrastructure simply could not be sustained, because the throughput of fish would be so low as to make the whole operation uneconomic. I am sure that that also applies elsewhere.

The fishermen in Northern Ireland are astonished by the latest proposals, because they know that some species are abundant in the fishery at present, including haddock, herring and prawns. That was apparently also the view of the scientists until the turn of the year, but those early opinions seem to have been set aside despite the fact that the prawn fishery was increased by some 3,000 tonnes.

It now seems that a massive cut is being demanded because the Community has taken a global view of all EC fisheries and has made cuts on that basis instead of considering individual species or fishing areas. That is not acceptable to the fishing industry, those who represent it in the House or the country at large. I was pleased to hear the Minister say that it was not acceptable to the Government. I hope that the Government will reject the cuts that have been demanded and opt for a policy tailored to each area and species.

It is clear that the UK has suffered disproportionately from the changes made over the years, and there has been a huge reduction in the fleet in Northern Ireland already. We shall now be asked to give still more. It is time for a radical change of policy, because the Northern Ireland fleet and those elsewhere in the United Kingdom have shrunk far enough.

Something must be done about quota hopping. Much has been said about quota hopping, but something must also be done about the privileged position created for the Irish Republic by the Hague preference system, which has not been mentioned so far. I shall not go into details, but the facts will be well known to fishermen and all those who represent fishing constituencies. Those problems need immediate resolution and even more immediate is the need to fulfil the Government's pledge that the Irish sea Hague preference losses would be made good by international quota swaps.

In the longer term, we need to clarify whether the Government accept the draft report of the Scientific, Technical and Economic Committee on fisheries, issued in early May, which discussed decommissioning and reducing activity and catchability. In short, the question the document raises is whether the EC should have a small fishing fleet with a high catch capacity per vessel and utilise it fully—apparently that would be technically easy, because many vessels are tied up—or whether it should be satisfied with many more but less efficient vessels that would keep more people at work at sea and also more small fishing ports open. That needs careful consideration, because the smaller one-rig boats that fish for prawns ensure a steady year-round supply of prawns and steady employment. The larger, more efficient boats provide more seasonal supply and employment.

The report states:

"Measures to reduce activity and catchability will improve the willingness of fishermen to leave the industry".

If applied, that would lead to a policy that squeezed the individual fisherman financially to the point at which he was not able to catch sufficient fish to keep his operation viable and would therefore be forced to take a small sum in compensation and leave the industry. Is that unacceptable policy precisely the result that the demand for a further 40 per cent. cut is intended to achieve?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Raymond S. Robertson): I am grateful to hon. Members for their wide-ranging contributions to what has once again, and rightly, turned out to be an impassioned debate. The fishing industry is a vital part of our national life and is at the heart of the constituencies of many hon. Members who have spoken today. I am proud to include myself among them.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) said, and whatever the difference in views, I believe that the whole House yearns to see a viable and profitable UK fishing industry that husbands the natural resources surrounding these islands and harvests those natural resources on a sustainable basis. The fish stocks on which our fishing industry relies are heavily over-exploited. Failure to tackle overfishing exposes the fishing industry to an increasing risk that those stocks will simply disappear, and that must never be allowed to happen.

On the subject of the multi-annual guidance programme, the House has shown its real concern about the scale of the possible capacity reductions that the Commission is now seeking to achieve by 2002. I shall repeat the comments made by my hon. Friend the Minister of State and make it clear to all hon. Members that there is no prospect of our decommissioning a third of the UK trawler fleet over the next three years, as Mrs. Bonino has suggested, but there is still a need for us to help remove from the fleet those vessels that are becoming increasingly unviable. Only in that way can we safeguard the future of the remaining fleet, place it on a more viable footing and reduce the incentive to overfish. That is why the Government propose to spend a further £13 million under the scheme before the House.

There is no doubt that we need to reduce fishing effort for the future of the industry. The question is not whether, but how and to what extent different parts of the European Community fishing fleets should reduce their fishing activity. Of course, as the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) said, we do not need to proceed by decommissioning alone. The fleet can be reduced in other ways.

For example, although there is not much agreement in the industry, I know that the Scottish Fishermen's Federation is increasingly willing to contemplate restrictions on time at sea. I commend that thinking and I look forward to the UK industry acting responsibly and making known its detailed considerations of the Commission's proposals as we discuss them in the months ahead. I stress again that, in their present form, the proposals are unacceptable to the industry and to the Government.

Many hon. Members mentioned quota hopping, especially my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris). Of course, there is no point in spending UK taxpayers' money to decommission fishing vessels if other member states can continue to export their own surplus capacity on to our fishing register. It is vital that action is taken to close that loophole, which is exploited by quota hoppers. It would be intolerable if we were to scrap UK vessels, for them simply to be replaced by flag boats from other member states fishing against UK quotas. Although we took action to try to remedy that problem in 1989, our action was struck down by the European Court—the same European Court that many Opposition Front Benchers would sell their souls to serve.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made clear the Government's resolve to tackle the quota hopping problem at the intergovernmental conference. He made that point forcefully in his useful meeting with the Scottish Fishermen's Federation in Aberdeen last month. We envisage that our proposals will take the form of a protocol to the treaty, which recognises that national quotas allocated under the common fisheries policy are to be used for the benefit of national fishing communities. The protocol will be designed to allow individual member states to adopt measures to ensure that there are real economic links between their fishing communities and the vessels that fish their quotas.

As my hon Friend the Minister of State said, the European Commission cannot be surprised that the UK fishing industry and the Government are unwilling to contemplate any further programmes of reductions in the UK fleet as long as the problem of quota hoppers remains to be solved.

Under the common fisheries policy, UK quotas are for the benefit of UK fishing communities, not for the benefit of fishermen from other member states. Fishing makes a vital contribution to the wealth of fishery-dependent areas, which are often in remote parts of our country where the scope for diversification is limited. It is our job to ensure that that contribution is properly safeguarded and secured.

Some hon. Members asked about technical conservation and progress. I acknowledge the positive role that is played by our fishing industry and the fisheries conservation group. They have agreed a package of measures which, if adopted, should help to reduce discards and improve the state of some of the stocks on which our fishermen depend. We have passed details to the Commission and will press it to present its proposals as quickly as possible. Of course, we shall update the House on that.

The hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) asked a series of questions relating to his constituency. I shall write to him with detailed replies.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): It is obvious that the Minister is running out of material with which to respond to the debate. I have a basic question. There have been consistent references to decommissioning and to how we can reach the multi-annual guidance programme. Can the Minister state the exact UK tonnage, because three different figures have been published in the past month?

Mr. Robertson: Obviously, there is confusion about that, and so that there is no ambiguity, my hon. Friend the Minister of State will write to the hon. Lady and to other hon. Members.

Some hon. Members mentioned a decommissioning scheme specifically for quota hoppers. There are 150 quota hoppers in the UK fleet, representing one fifth of the tonnage of our offshore fleet.

Mrs. Helen Liddell (Monklands, East): I should like to intervene before the Minister moves too far from his response to the questions of my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), who made a valid point about the early retirement scheme and the Government's opposition to it. Will the Minister assure the House that the Government will look again at introducing the scheme, in view of the considerable hardship faced by some fishermen?

Mr. Robertson: As I am sure the hon. Lady is aware, there is a variety of other schemes, such as FIFG and PESCA. As she presses me to have a second look at the matter, I am happy to assure her that I shall do so.

Mrs. Ewing rose—

Mr. Robertson: I have already given way to the hon. Lady.

Clearly, if we were able to decommission the 150 quota hoppers, it would go a long way towards meeting any targets for capacity reductions. Of course, there is nothing to prevent quota hopper owners from applying for decommissioning grants under the scheme before the House. Some quota hoppers were decommissioned under previous schemes. A special scheme targeting them would be quite different, and I am not sure that fishermen would take kindly to our spending large sums of public money to buy them out.

Even if it were possible to devise such a scheme, some difficult issues would need to be resolved. Should arrangements be voluntary or compulsory, and what steps should be taken to prevent the owners of decommissioned vessels buying back into the UK fleet? How could we be sure that the quota that was released by the decommissioning of such vessels benefited UK vessels and interests? Those and other matters would have to be carefully considered.

Mr. Salmond: If I were the Minister, I would not burn my bridges about buying out quota hoppers. I would introduce some flexibility. The Minister said that the Scottish Fishermen's Federation supported days at sea measures. Will he make it clear that they would not be an addition but in exchange for a relaxation of the quota regime?

Mr. Robertson: Of course they are not. I am not ruling out the idea of buying out quota hoppers—far from it—but our fishermen would want satisfactory answers to a series of technical and important questions before we went down that road. I am trying to flag up some of the questions and issues that would have to be discussed with the industry and sorted out. I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that. Although we have no plans for a scheme at present, I am not willing to rule it out. Indeed, I am willing to look at it with our industry.

The measure will, I hope, make a valuable contribution to improving the operation of the UK fleet. As the Minister of State said, there have been a number of changes in the criteria compared with the 1995 scheme, and they are all designed to make it more effective. I am glad that the House has been able to welcome the widening of the scheme, which will allow more vessel owners to apply.

We have had a full and useful debate. The proposed scheme will make a modest but valuable contribution towards restructuring the UK fishing fleet and safeguarding its future and that of the fish stocks on which it depends. I have no hesitation in commending the scheme to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Fishing Vessels (Decommissioning) Scheme 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 1242), dated 7th May 1996, a copy of which was laid before this House on 8th May, be approved.

Parliamentary Proceedings (Welsh)

7.25 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move,

That, whilst English is and should remain the language of this House, the use of Welsh be permitted in parliamentary proceedings held in Wales, subject to the conditions set out in the Third Report from the Select Committee on Procedure, Session 1995-96 (House of Commons Paper No. 387).

We have emptied the Chamber of Scotsmen and filled it with Welshmen.

I shall begin by explaining why, to his great regret, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is unable to be present. As my right hon. Friend is not here, my hon. Friend the Under–Secretary of State for Wales, the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) will reply to the debate. I know that that will be understood by Welsh Members, but I thought that I should put it on the record because the same problem has led to the leading party spokesmen for other parties in Wales being unable to be here.

They have a good reason. The Secretary of State and the hon. Members for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) and for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) are tonight taking part in a long-arranged public debate in Wales, probably in English, on constitutional issues affecting Wales. It is clearly an important occasion and they all felt that they should be present. We all understand that, and I am sorry that we were not able to arrange parliamentary business in a more convenient way for them. I can testify from my conversations with the Secretary of State for Wales that he has asked me to make clear his strong personal support for the proposal.

The House will recall that, on 11 March, we agreed seven new Standing Orders enabling the Welsh Grand Committee to play an enhanced role in the parliamentary consideration of Welsh affairs by dealing with a wider range of business and holding meetings in Wales. During consultation on the draft Standing Orders and in the debate, representations were made that the use of the Welsh language should be allowed in the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee when it met in Wales.

I made it clear to the House in, I hope, a characteristically conciliatory way during the earlier debate that the Government did not think that those representations could be dismissed. After all, we are the Administration who carried through the Welsh Language Act 1993, which established the principle that, in the conduct of public business in Wales, the English and Welsh languages should be treated equally.

As I said in our earlier debate on the matter, it was clear that a decision to allow the use of Welsh in parliamentary proceedings would be a major change in practice on which the House ought to take a view when the issues of principle and practicality had been thoroughly investigated. Accordingly, I invited the Procedure Committee whose distinguished Chairman, my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) is in his place and who was slightly taken by surprise when he read the report of our earlier debate, to consider the matter and to report to the House as soon as possible.

My right hon. Friend and his colleagues kindly accepted that unexpected and unannounced remit and have discharged it with admirable speed although they were engaged in several other inquiries at the same time. It is appropriate to express on behalf of the House, and not only Welsh Members, our gratitude to my right hon. Friend and the members of the Committee for that. I am moving the motion to give the House an opportunity to decide on the Committee's recommendations.

First, English is the language in which the proceedings of this House are conducted, as it is the only language that all hon. Members are assumed to understand. The Procedure Committee rested firmly on that principle for proceedings here, and recommended that the House should affirm that principle in a resolution.

In that connection, I thank the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) for his courtesy in giving me notice of some points that he wanted me to cover on the possible uses of languages other than English. This may be an appropriate time for me to pick them up. He asked about the appropriateness or, indeed, orderliness of using Latin and Greek and Chaucerian English. The advice that I have on that is that it would be for the Speaker—or you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—to decide whether to allow an hon. Member to use a quotation in Latin, Greek or Chaucerian English during a speech in the House without providing a translation.

I gather that, unfortunately, no hon. Members of the present House—certainly not me—heard Lord Palmerston get himself out of a tight corner in the "Don Pacifico" debate in 1850, which I remember learning about in my boyhood, with a peroration that included the phrase:

"Civis Britannicus sum", which I hasten to translate, to be sure that I am in order, as:

"I am a British citizen".

I do not think that anyone would take exception to the use of Latin in that case, but as a general rule we might do well to follow the practice of Sir Winston Churchill, who on one occasion, when he had made a telling point in a speech with a Latin quotation, followed it up instantly with a translation into English. I suspect, however, that his purpose was not to keep in order but rather to make a different point, because in introducing the English version he said that it was "for the benefit of any Etonians who may be present".

I move rapidly from Latin, Greek and Chaucerian English to the second question raised by the hon. Member for Cardiff, West, who noticed, no doubt, that I mentioned during the debate in March that Norman French was still used in the other place when Royal Assent is signified to Acts of Parliament by Commission. The formula used—I have heard it many times—is "La Reyne le veult".

Norman French is also used by the Clerks, I am told—I did not know this before—in the endorsements that are written on Bills as they pass from one House to the other. I see the Clerk nodding—[Interruption.] Is he not nodding? Perhaps he is not allowed to nod, but I am sure that I saw him nodding first. Norman French, although spoken in that one instance in the other place, is never spoken in the House. I hope that that is sufficient guidance for what has been the practice.

The last point that the hon. Gentleman raised with me can best be illustrated by referring to the speech that was made to a joint gathering of both Houses of Parliament by President Chirac recently, which many hon. Members present will have heard, and which was, of course, delivered in French. The point is that it is quite usual for visiting Heads of State and Heads of Government to deliver such addresses in their own language, but these are ceremonial occasions that do not form part of the proceedings of the House, so the normal rules do not apply. I hope that that is sufficient comment on the points that the hon. Gentleman raised.

I return to the main purpose of the motion, which asks us to reaffirm that English is the language used for the proceedings of the House. The Procedure Committee was none the less satisfied that the Welsh language enjoys a special status in Wales, already recognised in law through the Welsh Language Act 1993, which provides a sound basis for agreeing a narrow derogation from the general rule concerning English to allow the use of Welsh in parliamentary proceedings in Wales. The motion gives effect to that recommendation.

Finally, the motion approves the conditions for the use of Welsh, which the Procedure Committee has recommended. The principal condition is that facilities for simultaneous interpretation from Welsh into English should be provided for the benefit of non-Welsh speakers. The Committee's advice is that such facilities can be hired at relatively modest cost; indeed, a number of the venues that might be used for meetings of the Welsh Grand Committee are already appropriately equipped, as one would expect, particularly since the passage of the Welsh Language Act.

The Committee also made a number of practical recommendations, which the motion invites the House to endorse: that hon. Members proposing to speak in Welsh should give notice to the Chairman; that hon. Members should not switch from one language to the other in the course of a speech; and that direct communications between the Chairman and an hon. Member, such as points of order, and communications with members of staff, should be in English. As the report makes clear, all those recommendations are made for practical reasons.

The motion would apply not only to the Welsh Grand Committee, but to any meetings of the Welsh Affairs Committee and, indeed, other Select Committees that may meet in Wales. The Procedure Committee has recommended a set of guidelines—again of a practical character—that should govern the hearing of oral evidence in the Welsh language.

Mr. William Ross: The right hon. Gentleman will understand that some of us have been listening to him with great interest. When the proceedings are published, which will be the definitive text—the English or the Welsh?

Mr. Newton: Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton will comment. The report recommends that, where somebody has given notice that they wish to speak in Welsh, they will be required to provide an English translation, which will then be the official record. I think that that is the suggestion. Does my right hon. Friend wish to intervene at this point?

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Perhaps I can come to the aid of the House. All parliamentary papers have always been published in English, and the publication of all parliamentary and Committee papers will continue to be in English.

Mr. Newton: I hope that my right hon. Friend's intervention is helpful to the hon. Gentleman. It was certainly helpful to me. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend.

If the House approves the motion, the way will be clear for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales to introduce proposals for a programme of meetings of the Welsh Grand Committee at suitable locations in Wales. In view of the undoubted success of the reforms of the Scottish Grand Committee that the Government have introduced, I am sure that all Welsh Members will be looking forward eagerly to these developments.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): Can we ensure that there is no misconception? My understanding from the Procedure Committee's recommendations is that, if an hon. Member wishes to speak Welsh in the Welsh Grand Committee in Wales, he is not obliged to provide a translation, as a translation will automatically be provided and transmitted by the translators and the equipment. That should be clearly understood here and now.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I can clear up the misinterpretation that I gave by accident just now. When re-reading material on this issue shortly before I came into the Chamber, the last thing that I read was the evidence given by the Editor of Hansard, who I think made the suggestion to which I referred. I apologise to the House for confusing that evidence, which was fairly fresh in my mind, with the report's recommendations, which have been clearly explained by my right hon. Friend and by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I hope that that helps to remove the misunderstanding to which I inadvertently contributed.

In conclusion, I join my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales in his endorsement of the Procedure Committee's recommendations. I commend the motion to the House.

7.37 pm

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I add to the apologies that were given by the Leader of the House for the absence of the Secretary of State, the shadow Secretary of State and the other two party leaders from Wales, who are in Cardiff tonight. My hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), who is shadow Leader of the House, has asked me to reply, which would not usually occur, but she is otherwise engaged. She has given notice of her absence to the Leader of the House.

The Opposition welcome the Procedure Committee's recommendations. We also welcome the speed with which it carried out its work, its professionalism and that of the witnesses and those who offered written evidence, the Clerks and others, so that it was able to reach the recommendations that we are debating.

I cavil at two of the Committee's recommendations, but just for the purposes of debate and so that the House may give those matters some thought. It occurs to me that the proposed formal declaration that English is the language of the House of Commons, other than for the Welsh Grand Committee when sitting in Wales, is much against the traditions of the House. Such a declaration is almost a first step along the road to a written constitution.

It reminds anyone with an interest in Welsh history of the 1536 Act of Union, which applied to Wales a rule that never applied in England—that anyone from Wales who wanted to take part in public business, such as the law or Parliament, must do so in the English language. A person would have been at liberty to use another language in England, but not in Wales, because fear of the Welsh language prompted a formal declaration. The House should consider whether it would be better to do without a formal declaration, as such is against the traditions of the House—which permits things to be done by evolution and the rules of pragmatism.

As to the use of Norman French in limited circumstances, the Leader of the House did not address what would happen if the House were to make a formal declaration that no language other than English could be used in our proceedings. Would Norman French be disallowed? We do not necessarily want to lose those odd bits of Norman French that are used here and there in our formal proceedings, so it might be better to avoid a formal declaration—or at least give serious thought to the implications before making one.

Mr. Newton: There may be some small misunderstanding. The only use of Norman French in the proceedings of Parliament that is formally recorded is in the other place, so it cannot be affected by a resolution made in this House. However, the Clerks also make use of Norman French in passing Bills between the two Houses.

Mr. Morgan: That calls into question whether the Clerks would be permitted, if a formal declaration were made, to use Norman French for their purposes.

My other concern is whether a speech made partly in Welsh and partly in English would be debarred. Hansard has said that that should not be allowed, and although I understand the reasons, I am not certain that it is wise to make such a definite rule. I appreciate that Hansard wants maximum notice, which is absolutely fair, so that it can check that an interpreter is available, but the general principle followed in respect of the proceedings of the House—I speak from personal experience—should take account of the relevance of the language to the topic, not the convenience of the service provided by Hansard.

I am not saying that I am dismissing the practical concerns of Hansard. Nevertheless, if an hon. Member were to be speaking on the subject of agriculture and wanted to move on from the common agricultural policy wheat subsidy to the BSE crisis in the beef herds of Wales, since most beef farmers in Wales happen to be Welsh-speaking, the hon. Member might want to change at that point to the use of Welsh. If a Front Bencher were speaking on a range of education matters, he might say in the last five minutes, "I want to conclude on the position of Welsh medium schools in Wales." Interested outsiders would be happier hearing about that in Welsh.

It is the tradition of the House first to try something and, if it causes a problem, to reach agreement with the services provided to the House. If something proves impracticable, it is banned because it has been proved not to work. I understand that principle is known as solvitur ambulando—an ancient phrase that I had never heard until a couple of hours ago, when I read that it was used by Lord Howe of Aberavon when he gave evidence to the Public Service Committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. I would be most grateful if the hon. Gentleman would tell us the meaning of that phrase.

Mr. Morgan: Having explained who said it and where, I was about to say that it means, "It will solve itself at a walking pace." I am glad to have acted in an educational capacity for the benefit of the Deputy Speaker, as Lord Howe did for me when I read that reference in the Library's helpful briefing for tonight's debate.

I have practical experience of speaking in both English and Welsh at Labour party conferences in Wales.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): At the same time?

Mr. Morgan: No—consecutively, not concurrently. That did not seem to cause problems for the audience, but there was no question of interpretation. I have also spoken in Welsh in at least one national Labour party conference, and I recall that the present Member of the European Parliament for Mid and West Wales—my former constituent Miss Eluned Morgan, who is no relation—made part of her speech to the Brighton conference in Welsh and the rest in English. She could not have given her speech entirely in Welsh, but it did not seem unreasonable for her to speak in Welsh for three minutes.

The practicalities of using Welsh in a political context do not seem to cause problems, and if doing so makes sense, Hansard should fit the occasion rather than hon. Members having to fit Hansard—although I do not wish to sound as though Hansard writers can perform tricks, stand on their heads and write double Dutch at the same time. I know that there are limits to what they can do, but Hansard should serve our practical needs. If it makes sense for hon. Members to speak Welsh because of the nature of the topic, that preference should be given more attention. The Procedure Committee may simply have decided, "Okay, if that's what Hansard says are the practical modalities of allowing Welsh to be spoken in the Welsh Grand Committee, we must do exactly what Hansard wants in every respect." Which is what the Committee has done.

Mr. Nick Ainger (Pembroke): As someone who served on a council that was bilingual until its abolition earlier this year, I appreciate—as a monoglot Yorkshireman—the concerns that Hansard may have. There is no need for concern because speeches made in Welsh will be interpreted. If the Hansard writers cannot understand a speech and do their job, how will monoglot members of the Welsh Grand Committee understand what is being said? There is some criticism implied of the interpretation facilities. I can assure Hansard as a monoglot Yorkshireman—my hon. Friend has the benefit of being bilingual—that interpretation facilities throughout Wales are excellent. Hansard will be able to do its job, as will monoglot members of the Welsh Grand Committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind hon. Members that interventions in any language should be short and precise.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. If Dyfed county council could interpret my hon. Friend's "Ee bah gum" into Welsh, I am sure that Hansard can do just as well with Welsh interpreted into English for the purposes of the record.

Incidentally, I was interested to hear the interventions of Northern Ireland Members, and I was glad to see in his place earlier my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), because their presence is relevant.

It was as late as 1906 before a Speaker ruled that English was to be the main language of the House of Commons, and only because of a challenge by an Irish nationalist Member of Parliament from west Kerry who attempted to make a speech in the Chamber in Irish Gaelic. The Speaker at the time made the point—as did the Leader of the House in his intervention—that the proceedings of the House have been conducted entirely in English for the past 600 years. He went one stage further and said that the House's proceedings had always been in English, which is not true. The House started out as a trilingual Parliament, with proceedings in English, French and Latin. In a fluid, pragmatic, I hesitate to say solvitur ambulando way, the English language gradually took over from Latin and French, probably by about 1450.

Naturally—and I notice some Euro-sceptic Members here tonight—after the original Norman conquest, the opening of the hundred years war in about 1350 caused this place to become more aggressively English. I hope that we are not about to start another hundred years war with the continent—you never know. The hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) probably thinks that we have started such a war.

The use of French started to decrease and the use of English increased. Strangely, however, as the use of English went up, all words with any conceptual significance were borrowed from the French, so by the time English had replaced French, French had been incorporated into English. Words such as procedure, committee, parliament, government and constitution were all borrowed from French. Single-syllable words were of Anglo-Saxon or English origin, and all the two, three or four-syllable words were of French origin because that had been the language of the upper and ruling classes. That is how English became the flexible language that it is today.

The other great irony about the fear of the Welsh language, which causes Speakers to say, as one did in 1906, "We want to say for definite that the English language is the primary language of the House," is that, by the time the House—having started out on a trilingual basis when it was an England-only Parliament and did not cover Wales, Scotland or Ireland, north or south—became a monoglot English Parliament, it covered initially Wales and then Scotland and Ireland. It was a monoglot English Parliament precisely when it was starting to incorporate the Celtic languages, which might have been relevant in the wish to continue on a trilingual or even quadrilingual basis, not with French and Latin, but with Welsh, Scots Gaelic and Irish Gaelic possibly permitted in special circumstances, as we are discussing tonight.

I hope that the House will warmly endorse the Procedure Committee's recommendation to continue a pragmatic approach to this matter. Rather than issuing firm rules about what shall and shall not be done, we should think about how we handle the problems. This is a British Parliament, not solely a Parliament for England and, therefore, we must incorporate and be flexible enough to allow the use, where appropriate, of languages other than English when covering Welsh business.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): I thank my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House for his kind remarks. I suggest that they are applicable mainly to my Committee members, because they have worked solidly to get this through, assisting me in the recommendations that we have made to the House. I am pleased at the speed with which our report has been taken by the House. I urge all Welsh Members to use their influence on their leaders to ensure that other Procedure Committee reports are debated as quickly as this one. I would have liked a "Hear, hear" from Opposition Members on that matter. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Thank you very much.

I must emphasise absolutely that one of the problems that the Procedure Committee had from the start was the concept that this would be a foot, or perhaps even a toe, in the door, which would lead to possible demands for the Welsh language to be used in Parliament in Westminster. To ensure that that was not acceptable to the House generally or to the vast majority of hon. Members, we emphasised that "the language of the proceedings of the House of Commons and its committees is English: it has been English for many centuries; and it should in our view remain English."

I am sorry if the term "British" would be more convenient, but even in America the language is accepted as being English and I hope that that would be acceptable even to the Welsh. We moved in a specific direction because the special status of the Welsh language in Wales, as enshrined in the Welsh Language Act 1993, did not apply to parliamentary proceedings. It was specifically for that purpose that the Procedure Committee investigated and examined the matter.

There are reasons for our being specific about our proposition about English. The Labour party spokesman, the hon. Member—I was going to say that he was my hon. Friend—for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) pointed out the possibilities of Norman French and other languages. To meet perhaps that point, we are concerned that there should not be an approach that Urdu should be used because it covers certain people whose natural language is Urdu, or that Gaelic should be used in relation to other people in this country. Therefore, we have made that absolutely definite. I hope that the House, in the resolution as set out by the Leader of the House, which I hope will be passed, makes it definite that Welsh is to be used specifically for Welsh parliamentary proceedings in Wales.

Another helpful basis for allowing this is the amount of translation equipment that exists in many of the places where Welsh Committees meet in Wales. It appeared to the Procedure Committee to be nonsense not to be able to use translation facilities in a county council or a chamber if Welsh Members demanded to speak in Welsh.

We did, however, make it clear that Members should use one language alone, whether in interventions or in speeches. That is specifically to assist both the Chairman and the Committee Clerks in ensuring that they understand what the proceedings are and realise it from the word go.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): In the spirit of co-operation and in assisting the right hon. Gentleman, may I ask him this question? If there were a debate in Wales, an hon. Member were addressing the Welsh Grand Committee in Welsh, the Committee were adjourned and the remainder of the sitting were in London, would that not contravene the golden rule that hon. Members start off and finish in the same language?

Sir Peter Emery: If it was to be considered a golden rule, the hon. Gentleman would be correct, but we have made the position clear. I hope that hon. Members' speeches will not be cut in half and that they will not have to make half of it in Wales and half in England. To get over that golden rule, I urge the Welsh Grand Committee Chairman to ensure that that does not happen.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the Procedure Committee might reconsider this matter, as was suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) from the Front Bench. It is common for people in the course of a conversation or a speech to switch from one language to another. It is a natural habit in west Wales, in the Gwynedd valley, where my wife comes from, and in many other regions. The Committee and the House should think about that point.

Sir Peter Emery: Although my mother was a Thomas, indeed to goodness, it was not necessary to switch from one language to the other. We should proceed along with this. After all, it is the start of an experiment. If it appears that there is a problem, the matter can be reviewed. That seems to be the sensible way to proceed. This is a new initiative and difficulties will need to be ironed out. Let us get the system working first and then we can—

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I want to register my support for the principle that it is better to use one language in one speech. I am not sure whether that needs to be laid down in the stipulation, but it is good practice to follow; otherwise, we tend to get tokenism—this is a common phenomenon in Wales—when people start their speeches in Welsh, deliver the meat in English and then return to Welsh. That is thoroughly bad practice. I want hon. Members to use Welsh seriously and thoroughly throughout their contributions to our debates.

Sir Peter Emery: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his remarks. He will not expect me to become a judge of the variation of views among Welsh Members on that matter.

There was some criticism of cost, because the procedure will involve additional expenditure that has not been thought about or budgeted for. However, when we examined the probable cost, we found it to be quite small—about £2,500 per sitting in Wales. That is small compared with the cost for the Scottish Grand Committee, which has to travel to Scotland.

Points were made about the Order Paper and the Official Report. In paragraph 10 of our report, I asked the House to note that those documents were produced by and for the House and therefore should be comprehensible to all Members of the House. There is nothing to stop any hon. Member producing his speech in the Welsh language if that is what he wishes, but the Committee did not think that it made sense to have a Welsh language Official Report or Order Paper, as they would not be understood by the vast majority of hon. Members.

We have attempted—I hope—to be practical in our recommendations to the House, which the Government have been willing to accept. I hope that they meet the wishes of the House and of all Welsh Members, who obviously have a particular interest in safeguarding a language that is theirs and that there is great reason to safeguard.

As I have said from the beginning, this procedure must not be considered as a toe or a foot in the door for any other language, at any time, to be accepted in the House—only English can be the language for parliamentary use.

8.2 pm

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): I, too, wish to thank the Procedure Committee for the speed with which it tackled its remit from the Leader of the House. I will not follow the arguments of the right hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) on whether the English language should be known as the British language, for the central reason that this country is made up of four nations, so there is no such thing as a British language.

I very much welcome the proposal that Welsh should be capable of being used in parliamentary proceedings in Wales. The word "permitted" in the motion—in the context of the oldest living language in these islands, which has a special statutory status—strikes an odd note, although it is technically correct.

As Members, we should not pat ourselves on the back too much over the proposal to allow each Select Committee meeting in Wales to presume in favour of the use of Welsh for those witnesses who wish to use the language.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell), in his evidence, made this valid point:

> "Part of the reason for taking evidence away from Westminster is to hear people in their working environment or in a setting that is directly relevant to the inquiry".

Therefore, I was a little surprised to read that the only time the Welsh Affairs Select Committee had taken evidence in Welsh was as far back as 1981, although it has taken formal evidence in Wales on 18 occasions since then.

My hon. Friend made the point that some other Committees sitting in Wales, such as the Agriculture Committee, might wish to take evidence in Welsh. I believe that it could. Paragraph 13(d) of the Procedure Committee's report says that Select Committees should give notice of any intention to allow evidence to be heard in Welsh. That is quite wrong. It should be automatically presumed that the Committees will take evidence in Welsh, unless there is good reason to the contrary—for example, a lack of translation facilities. I do not understand why a decision should have to be made on each and every occasion.

I said earlier that we should not pat ourselves on the back too much. For a long time, other bodies set up by the House have done what my hon. Friend the Member for Gower emphasised. It is recorded in the archives of the House that one of my ancestors gave evidence in Welsh to a royal commission on land in Wales and Monmouthshire as far back as 28 April 1894. David Jenkins was called and examined through an interpreter. He had no language other than Welsh in which to express himself if the royal commission wanted to hear how his father had been dispossessed by the Earl of Lisburne from a farm in 1875, which had been tenanted by the family for four or five generations from as far back as 1797 or even earlier. If the royal commission wanted to hear about the hardship involved, it could hear it only in Welsh. It was happening then in the real world, so there is no reason why it should not happen now. I expect that David Jenkins was one of many people who could not express himself in any language other than Welsh.

We have moved on during the past 50 years and we have passed three important Acts, each in turn enhancing the status of our language. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), the shadow Leader of the House, said succinctly in her evidence, it was inconceivable that, having obliged other bodies in Wales to provide a Welsh facility, we should not do the same. That is the crux of the argument.

There was no such thing as the Welsh Grand Committee until it was conceived by the joint efforts of Ness Edwards—who was the Member of Parliament for Caerphilly and the father of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding)—and Goronwy Roberts, the Member of Parliament for Caernarfon. It is right that, while English should remain the language of this House, the Welsh Grand Committee, when sitting in Wales, should be able to hear contributions in Welsh from hon. Members. If confined to that Committee, I see no great difficulty in having speeches in Welsh wherever the Committee sits, but that is my personal view. In practice, we are advocates and we seek to persuade, so I suspect that there will not be many instances of Members wishing to do that. Nevertheless, the principle of being able to do so should be established.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), the Chairman of the Welsh Grand Committee, said in his evidence that, from his experience of the Council of Europe, he did not envisage much of a problem with the proposal. I have just returned from the European Court of Human Rights and the diversity of 14 judges from countries as different as Estonia and Turkey, advocates, members of the public, and so on—yet in the cases that I heard there was no difficulty with simultaneous translation. We have moved on and the facilities exist.

One important practical point is that the translators, especially the simultaneous translators, should be competent. Translating is a difficult art. Most of us who are privileged to be bilingual would not set up as simultaneous translators. It is a difficult art that requires special training. Those I know in that art—they are international translators—either have a very mixed background or have immersed themselves in more than one culture. I believe that we in Wales have the advantage in our translators because we are brought up in a bilingual society.

No one should think that translating is an easy art to do well. Hence, one sees at international gatherings that translators usually do not operate for more than 20 minutes or half an hour at a time, when someone else has to take over, particularly if the subject is technical. I emphasise the importance of good translators.

Hon. Members have already mentioned the practical problems involved if a person switches during his speech from one language to another. Those problems are not insuperable. We are on a learning curve and, as the right hon. Member for Honiton rightly said, we should reconsider the situation as we go along according to how it develops. That was an important point, which I endorse fully. Let us make a start and see how it goes.

It is curious that one of the things that might happen—I disagree entirely with the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) on this issue—is that one might want to make a point or more than one point in one language and then switch to English for the remainder of the speech. That would not be tokenism and should not be disapproved of, if we can get over the learning curve; otherwise, the curious effect will be that someone who wants to make a point in Welsh will want to develop his entire speech in Welsh, whereas he might have been prepared to make most of the speech as an advocate, to seek to persuade and to ensure that the language is directly addressed to the majority of those who know both languages. That is an important issue, but it is not insuperable.

Many years ago, I attended the Canadian Parliament, in Ottawa. I do not know whether the right hon. Member for Honiton was with me on that occasion—it was a long time ago, but he may well have been. I think that it was a meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly. Pierre Trudeau was there, fielding questions as Prime Minister in two languages. If a question was put to him in French, he would reply in French. If it was asked in English, he would reply in English. Certainly I saw no difficulties. I am not competent to comment on his French, but he was a native-born French speaker.

I am proud that when—on my first occasion as Secretary of State for Wales—I visited Gwynedd county council, in Easter 1974, the same type of system prevailed. I was questioned and addressed in both languages. Many questions went on for the good part of two hours, and I sought as best as I could to answer in whatever language the question was asked in. Certainly, as regards the language, there was no complaint—although there might have been complaints about the contents of the answers. It is not an insuperable difficulty, and I think that the wise words of the right hon. Member for Honiton—that we should consider the position as we go along—should be borne in mind.

I welcome these proposals. On the whole, they are very sensible. I endorse the thanks given to the Select Committee on Procedure for its speed. We are grateful to it for its recommendations. We have come a long way since the time when another ancestor of mine, my grandfather, had to wear the Welsh knot. We have moved a great deal since then. I am grateful to the Committee.

8.13 pm

Sir Wyn Roberts (Conwy): I, too, warmly welcome the third report of the Select Committee on Procedure on the use of the Welsh language in parliamentary proceedings in Wales. I compliment all those who contributed to the Committee's deliberations and led it to its eminently sensible and very comprehensive set of conclusions. I should particularly like to thank my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons for his leadership and my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) for, I am sure, the wise guidance that he gave to the Committee. It certainly deserves a "diolch yn fawr iawn" from us, which means thank you very much. The origins of the Welsh language lie way back in Romano-Celtic times, or possibly earlier. I do not have to remind the House that the earliest poetry we have, the "Gododdin", was written at least a couple of centuries before "Beowulf". Although most English hon. Members would not understand a word of "Beowulf", we have a reasonable chance of familiarising ourselves with the contents of the "Gododdin".

The Welsh language has, of course, long enjoyed the protection of the House. In the 16th century, Parliament legislated that the Bible should be translated into Welsh. Those of us who cherish the language know how important that decision was in ensuring its survival. In this century, Parliament has, of course, passed a number of Acts that have promoted the use of the language, culminating in the 1993 Act, the full effects of which have yet to be realised.

I accept without question that the language of the proceedings of Parliament is English, but, now that the Welsh Grand Committee is occasionally to become peripatetic in Wales, it would not be understandable, appropriate or right if that Committee—for example, when meeting in a predominantly Welsh-speaking town such as Caernarfon—were not able to allow speeches, questions or interventions in Welsh. That goes for anywhere else in Wales.

During the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, there was mention of the translation that will appear in Hansard. Perhaps it is just as well to remind ourselves that there is no reason why a Welsh speaker in the Welsh Grand Committee should not supply the Official Reporters with his version of his speech, just as we now supply Hansard with copies of any copious notes that we may have.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton mentioned the visit of President Chirac. I certainly received many letters about his address in French to both Houses of Parliament. The letters asked why French was permitted at the Palace of Westminster while Welsh was not. I explained that the President's address was not a part of the proceedings of Parliament but rather a "special ceremonial occasion", as my right hon. Friend described it. Furthermore—as yet—President Chirac is not an honourable Member of this Parliament.

The Welsh Affairs Select Committee laid down its ground rules in 1980, under what I thought must have been the very wise chairmanship of the former Member for Pontypool, Mr. Leo Abse. Those rules dealt with the Select Committee's meetings in Wales and with possible requests for the use of the Welsh language. That Committee's far-sighted proceedings are reproduced in an annexe to this report, and I am glad that the Procedure Committee found those proceedings a useful precedent, which it has now refined.

I cannot find much fault with the Procedure Committee's recommendations, although when we come to practise them we may find some shortcomings that we cannot anticipate. I am sure that those shortcomings can be overcome with a modicum of common sense and good humour. We have already heard the argument whether a speech should be in Welsh in its entirety or whether it could be partly in Welsh and partly in English. Clearly, there are arguments to be made for both points of view.

Personally, I am inclined to agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton that we should begin by asking that speeches should be entirely in Welsh. Welsh speakers in the Chamber know that we wish to encourage the speaking of Welsh, but there is a danger in the tokenism to which the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North referred. However, I am sure that there are also advantages in the part Welsh, part English speech, if only because it allows double exposure in the media.

I regard the use of Welsh by parliamentary Committees in Wales as an important and necessary step, not only in demonstrating official recognition of the language but in establishing the willingness of Parliament to get as close to the electors as it reasonably can.

8.20 pm

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): The right hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) knows as well as any hon. Member the problems that are experienced by people who want to use the Welsh language at an official level in Wales. Of course, he steered the Welsh Language Act 1993 through the House. He also referred to "Y Gododdin"—I am sure that those taking the official note of our proceedings breathed a sigh of relief that he was not tempted to quote it. However, I am sure that when he speaks in the Welsh Grand Committee in Wales, he will take the opportunity to do so.

Like other hon. Members, I have read the record of the House's dealings with languages other than English. I read the record of the proceedings of 21 July 1966, almost 30 years ago to the month. At that time, the first Plaid Cymru Member—Mr. Gwynfor Evans who represented Carmarthen—entered the House. He raised a point of order with the then Speaker about the possibility of taking the oath in Welsh. The Speaker ruled firmly that the oath had to be taken in English, although a number of hon. Members of all parties supported Mr. Evans.

I am surprised that no other hon. Member has referred to that occasion today because in 1974 the Speaker allowed hon. Members to take the oath in either Welsh or English. Indeed, the oath can today be taken in Gaelic, too. There are, therefore, precedents for people applying to speak in Welsh in the House. Although the House did not feel able to accept the request in 1966, it subsequently felt that it was appropriate to do so.

My point is that although, historically, the House has not been able to accept such requests, it has eventually reconsidered the position. Although it took 400 years for the oath to be taken in Welsh, it was at least a step in the right direction. Mr. Gwynfor Evans made his point in 1966, and by 1974 the oath could be taken in Welsh.

We ought to be examining the demand in the House for the use of the Welsh language in the Welsh Grand Committee. In the previous Parliament—in 1988—an all-party early-day motion was tabled and eventually signed by a good many hon. Members representing all the countries of Britain. A grand total of 28 hon. Members felt that it was right and proper for Welsh to be used in the Welsh Grand Committee.

In 1988, it had not been suggested that the Welsh Grand Committee should become a peripatetic body. It was, however, suggested that Welsh should be used in proceedings in the House—in other words, where we usually meet, in Committee Room 10. There has been considerable debate about the restructuring of the Welsh Grand Committee and everyone eventually agreed that it should be meeting in Wales. Although we think that it is a body almost beyond reform, given that it is to continue to meet, it has been agreed that it should be meeting in Wales periodically. The demand for the right to speak Welsh in that body thus became overwhelming, as the right hon. Member for Conwy said.

Having passed the Welsh Language Act 1993 so that the Welsh and English languages should be treated equally, and now that the Welsh Grand Committee is to meet in Wales, it would be ludicrous if an hon. Member could not speak in Welsh. It was not a party political issue, and when the Welsh parliamentary party met the Secretary of State for Wales, there was a broad consensus that it was right and proper to allow hon. Members to speak Welsh when the Welsh Grand Committee meets in Wales.

It seems that all the obstacles that the House thought could be placed in the way of using a language other than English have been overcome in relation to proceedings in Wales. As has been said, week after week in council and other chambers in Wales, people are allowed to use Welsh and English—they can use either language and the content of their speeches is translated simultaneously. That is an enormous advantage. No one present at such meetings is at a disadvantage because both languages can be followed equally or people can follow one language in translation. There is no problem with that.

The Select Committee on Procedure is to be congratulated on recognising that the language problems could be overcome in relation to the Welsh Grand Committee meeting in Wales. However, I found one aspect of the Committee's recommendations a little curious. The Committee adopted the proposition of the Clerk of the House, as the Leader of the House mentioned. The report states:

"any proceedings of the House must be comprehensible to all Members, and must therefore be in the only language all Members are assumed to understand."

I can fully appreciate the first part of that sentence—we all agree that any proceedings must be comprehensible to all Members—but it goes on to say that any proceedings

"must therefore be in the only language all Members are assumed to understand", which means that all speeches have to be in English.

Simultaneous translation facilities mean that any speech can be heard in a language that everyone can understand. If a Member is speaking in Welsh but his speech is simultaneously translated into English, an hon. Member who cannot speak Welsh can still fully comprehend what the other is saying. I am not sure that the Committee's comment still holds true as a general rule.

If the rule can now be extended to the use of Welsh for the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee in Wales, there is no obvious problem in extending it to the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee in the Palace of Westminster. The practical problem has been overcome in relation to proceedings in Wales and can be overcome in Westminster.

In case hon. Members think that my idea is revolutionary, I am not suggesting that proceedings in the Chamber or in any Standing or Select Committee of the House should be in Welsh. What I am suggesting is that hon. Members should be allowed to address the Welsh Grand Committee in Welsh, whether it is meeting in Wales or Westminster. Clearly, that would mean Committee Room 10 would have to be fitted with translation equipment, but I cannot see any practical problem with that.

While we recognise that the Select Committee on Procedure's recommendations are a practical and acceptable step forward, the Committee, once it has considered how things develop in Wales, might want to examine the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee at Westminster.

I should like to put one point of detail to the Under–Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones) about the production of a Welsh language Official Report, which was also mentioned by the Leader of the House and the Chairman of the Procedure Committee, the right hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery). I understand that there will not be a Welsh Official Report, but if an hon. Member who has spoken in Welsh finds another way in which to make his speech available in Welsh, he will be allowed to do so.

This also seems rather curious. Why do we publish reports of our proceedings? It is so that people outside can read and follow them; it is not for our purposes. It is curious that a person speaking in Welsh in the Welsh Grand Committee in Wales has to have his speech translated so that people can read it in a language in which it was not delivered. We must remember that people who will follow our proceedings in Wales will be members of the media—spoken and written. If they want to follow our proceedings in the language in which they were delivered and the Official Report needs to be in English, why could not a Welsh-delivered version be annexed to it? If people want to refer to the speech in its language of origin, what is the problem with making it an annex to the Official Report, even if the Official Report is in English? Perhaps that can be considered again after the Committee has met in Wales a few times.

Progress on the use of Welsh in parliamentary proceedings in this place has been painfully slow. As I have said, it took more than 400 years for hon. Members to be able to take the oath in Welsh and, recently, to be able to speak in Welsh in the Welsh Grand Committee in Wales. Those are very small steps. If we had our own Parliament in Wales none such problems would occur because there would be a bilingual system. But, Westminster is currently our only Parliament and I see no reason why the Welsh language—a 2,000-year-old living language—should not be allowed its rightful and proper place in proceedings relating to Wales, whether in Westminster or Wales.

Mr. Walter Sweeney (Vale of Glamorgan): I welcome the opportunity to speak briefly against some of the Procedure Committee's recommendations. I should like to alter slightly the Latin quotation cited by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House by saying omnes cives Britannici sumus, which loosely translates as, "We are all Brits here." Whether hon. Members are English, Welsh, Irish or Scottish, we are all British—or Irish—citizens and we all speak English in the House and its Committees.

Such use of English may originally have been part of a campaign to discriminate against Welsh, as the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan) suggested, but no reasonable hon. Member could doubt that the rule serves the convenience of monoglot Members, who should not be discriminated against. Most hon. Members can speak English fluently—[Interruption.] Even in Wales, 80 per cent. of the population cannot speak Welsh.

I warmly welcome the first recommendation of the Procedure Committee that English is and should remain the language of the House. I would have been happier if the Committee had left it at that, subject to one exception to which I shall return. I do not accept the recommendation that members of the Welsh Grand Committee should be entitled to address the Committee in Welsh when it meets in Wales. I consider that a totally unnecessary, inappropriate and unacceptable sop to Welsh nationalism.

Such an entitlement is unnecessary, because every member who serves on the Welsh Grand Committee is almost bound to be capable of speaking and understanding English. It is inappropriate, because most Committee members are likely to be unable to understand Welsh. It is unacceptable, because the possibility of Committee members speaking Welsh represents a breach of the centuries-old principle that the language of Parliament should be English.

The Procedure Committee has considered the matter against the background of the Welsh Language Act 1993. This is not the time to rehearse the general arguments about how best to preserve and enhance the richness that the Welsh language bestows on the culture of Wales, but the detailed application of Government policy on the Welsh language can be intensely irritating and wasteful of paper.

Every publication that I receive from a Welsh Government agency is printed in both languages, even though virtually every recipient has a good understanding of English. As a non-Welsh speaker, I rip such publications in half and discard the Welsh part—not because I have anything against the Welsh language, but to save storage space and make a small gesture against the waste of paper and print. Some documents frustrate my intentions because the two languages are printed on opposite sides of the page. Whenever practicable, recipients of bilingual documents should elect which language they prefer and then be given a single-language document.

Documents produced in Welsh cost many times more than those produced in English, because Welsh documents have so few readers. The policy of wasting paper and money will be built on if the House accepts the Procedure Committee's recommendation to introduce interpreters and additional electronic equipment that, according to the Committee's report, will cost about £2,500 a sitting. What a waste of money!

I would have more sympathy with the Procedure Committee's proposals if I thought that there was any significant risk of a member of the Welsh Grand Committee who speaks Welsh being unable to speak English. From talking in English to hon. Members who speak Welsh, such as the hon. Members for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) and for Gower (Mr. Wardell), I have formed the impression that their English is up to the higher standards found in the House. Such hon. Members are the Welsh equivalent of English people who are good at Latin, Greek, French or German, who tend also to be first-class English speakers. There is no practical benefit for hon. Members who speak Welsh being allowed to speak Welsh.

Mr. Llwyd: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sweeney: I regret that time does not permit me to do so.

I accept that those whose first language is Welsh may be even more at home with Welsh than they are with English, but any special Welsh idioms or nuances of meaning are likely to be lost in translation. So, for monoglot English colleagues, and in Hansard later, the added value of the original Welsh would be lost.

I said at the outset that, although I favour the retention of English as the only language authorised and spoken in the House and its Committees, I also favour one exception. If the Welsh Grand Committee or the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs ever take evidence from Welsh speakers who are not hon. Members, and if such witnesses are not competent in speaking English, they should be allowed, at the discretion of the Chairman, to address the Committee in Welsh—whether they give evidence in Wales or Westminster.

I make that exception not to give witnesses who are equally at home in English or Welsh the opportunity to elect to speak Welsh, but to ensure that Committees are not deprived of the opportunity of hearing evidence from a Welsh speaker in the very unusual circumstances of such a person being unable to speak English.

8.37 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): It is refreshing that we have heard the authentic, arrogant voice of linguistic chauvinism towards the end of the debate. I shall not dwell on it. Perhaps Freud could explain why the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) tears in half bilingual forms. There are probably deep-seated reasons for it.

The House has taken a more enlightened position. I add my gratitude to that of others for the thoroughness and speed with which the Procedure Committee reported. I should like to strike a slightly cynical note in saying, to vulgarise Virgil, "Timeo Conservatores et dona ferentes"—I fear the Conservatives though they bear gifts.

Progress since I tabled an amendment on 11 March—it has caused the Government to act so quickly—has been remarkably speedy. They have suddenly realised that the Welsh language is a great treasure. As has been said, the first early-day motion that I tabled on the first St. David's day after I was elected called for the use of the Welsh language to be permitted in the proceedings of the Welsh Grand Committee using simultaneous translation facilities. That early-day motion was tabled not on 11 March this year but on 1 March 1988.

We should all acknowledge that the reason for the extraordinary speed with which the Government have acted has little to do with their love of the Welsh language and much to do with their desire for the Welsh Grand Committee to sit in Wales and to do a certain amount of mischief as they see it in putting their case before the people of Wales. They will be sadly disappointed in that aim, which has a clear political slant.

Let me say what a pleasure it has been listening to the speeches tonight. In my constituency, a fortnight ago I attended a centre where the Romans were in Wales—the second legion were in Caerleon 2,000 years ago. A group of schoolchildren were visiting the Capricorn centre, which is a wonderful centre for teaching children about life in Roman times. That school party was from ysgol Trimsaran. The children were learning about the Roman barracks and the living conditions there. It was all fascinating stuff.

However, the most vivid reminiscence of Rome was on the tongues of the children who were all Welsh-speaking from Trimsaran. When they see the bridge that crosses the river at Caerleon, they do not call it a bridge, they call it a "pont". When they see the windows that decorate the town, they do not say "window", but "ffenest". Those are two examples of a whole range of words that came to Wales with the Romans 2,000 years ago when the children of Caerleon were bilingual. It is a remarkable miracle that those words have echoed down the centuries and are a great living treasure.

The right hon. Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts) mentioned the Gododdin. He did not quote from it. I shall attempt to do so from memory. Its first words are of great significance:

"Gwyr a aeth Gatraeth Godigog oedd eu ffriedd".

That means "The men went to Catterick". It was the first book in the Welsh language and was written two centuries before Beowulf. If I quoted Beowulf, not a soul in this place would understand me.

The Leader of the House talked about Chaucerian English which is one of our great joys and a treasure to us all. It is a beautiful language:

"Whan Zephirus eek with his sweete breth
Inspired hath in every holt and heth
The Tender croppes, and the yonge sonne
Hath in the Ram his halve cours yronne,
And smale foweles maken melodye,
That slepen al the nyght with open ye".

It is music; it is poetry; it is beautiful and it is part of the inheritance of every hon. Member. Why do we not delight in it? When I used a different quotation—

Mr. Newton: I suppose that the hon. Gentleman realises that he will have to write that out for Hansard.

Mr. Flynn: I shall be quite happy to do that, although I am afraid that the spelling is a matter of dispute. I would be happy to write it out for hon. Members as well.

If only hon. Members who are unfortunately monoglot could understand what it means to speak more than one language. They are not better Welshmen or Englishman than anyone else. We have many reasons for welcoming the Under–Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Evans), to his place tonight. He said with some passion, "I do not speak the two languages of Wales," but he is no lesser Welshman for that. If only hon. Members knew what they were missing—the great treasure that has been handed down to the children from Trimsaran.

Earlier today I was listening to a gentleman from the place where I was educated. Mr. John Humphreys is from Splott. I had the great fortune to be born in Grangetown in Cardiff and educated in Splott. It is known as the dream ticket in Cardiff circles. Unfortunately, neither of those areas was rich in the Welsh language. Mr. John Humphreys referred to the great change that has taken place since 1979 when the Welsh language, the Irish language and many other languages were seen as a divisive grit in politics. They did divide, separate and create suspicions and hatred. That is gone now. It is remarkable that in Grangetown, Splott, Lliswerry and Ringland in Newport there is a great flowering of Welsh schools. Children without any Welsh language in their background are becoming first generation Welsh speakers—for which they will be grateful for the rest of their days. That is a wonderful improvement that has taken place in our time.

I share many of the misgivings that have been expressed about the decision of the Procedure Committee. There are many points to quibble about, particularly by those who are used to living in two languages. Nobody is completely bilingual. Nobody is equally comfortable in both languages. Some are more comfortable in English and some are more comfortable in Welsh. It depends on their mother tongue. People should be allowed to use both languages.

I see little difference between what has been suggested for Wales and what happens in the House of Commons. People who come here from Estonia and Lithuania sit in a special corner where equipment is available to enable our proceedings to be translated for them. That equipment is most sophisticated and could be adapted to other languages.

We are all in the mood to welcome the concession that we have here tonight. We claim it as a right and we look forward to the great joy of using in the only Parliament that Wales has both the beautiful languages of Wales.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the leave of the House, Mr. Rhodri Morgan.

8.45 pm

Mr. Morgan: Gyda chymiatad y Ty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That was totally unnecessary.

Mr. Morgan: I was about to ask for what you had already allowed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It took me unawares and I apologise.

The only false note in the debate was struck by the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) who failed to join in the spirit of the proceedings. In Wales as a whole—perhaps omitting the particular corner with which the hon. Gentleman is most familiar—the use of Welsh is appropriate when the Welsh Grand Committee sits in Wales and for those for whom it is more appropriate to speak Welsh.

I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman attended the meeting in Committee Room 14 a couple of months ago when 300 Welsh farmers spoke to the House about BSE. Although they all spoke English, one could tell by the way in which they spoke it that 95 per cent. of them would have been happier to address the informal procedings in Welsh. There was no question but that at least 280 of them would have been happier had the proceedings been mostly in Welsh. That was their better language. It was clear that they were used to discussing agricultural issues in Welsh. That would probably be the case in respect of other issues such as education.

It is not a matter of trying to compel those without a command of Welsh to speak it, but of giving permission to those who have a command of the language not to be debarred from speaking Welsh at appropriate times. The hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan failed to understand that.

The Britishness of our British Parliament is based on mutual respect between the four different nations that make up the United Kingdom. That in turn is based on the fact that English is our lingua franca. The issue does not arise for the 82 per cent. of the population of the United Kingdom who live in England. However, that 82 per cent. should have the of respect for other 18 per cent. of the population who live in Scotland, Wales and Ireland and who have sometimes have a linguistic skill, preference or culture.

Today, when the second Severn crossing was opened, we are more closely integrated with England than Scotland or Ireland—north or south—in all aspects of economics except one. Only in respect of our language are we less integrated with England than even the Irish Republic, let alone Scotland or Northern Ireland, simply because we have never suffered the potato famine or the highland clearances. As a result, the Welsh language is seven or eight times as strong as the original languages are in Scotland or Ireland.

The necessity of preserving the Welsh language gives Wales a great deal of distinctiveness; that is why we ask the British Parliament to respect that distinctiveness and particularly welcome the recommendations of the Procedure Committee. I hope that we shall carry with us some of those who are more reluctant, such as the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan.

8.48 pm

The Parliamentary Under–Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Gwilym Jones): We have had a constructive and positive debate, ably introduced by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. He reminded us that certain of our leading colleagues could not be with us tonight for good reason, but far be it from me to suggest that it was as a result of any such absences that we had such a constructive and positive debate. I heard nothing divisive in any of the differences that were aired, and nothing that might prevent further progress.

A former Secretary of State for Wales, the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), spoke of the experiences of one of his ancestors in this House with the Earl of Lisburne. Only a few weeks ago, I was with the present Earl as we launched a new Welsh milk for St. David's day. In that direction, things have moved on.

I was glad to hear the speech from my right hon. Friend the Member for Conwy (Sir W. Roberts). For the attention that he has lavished upon the language of Wales over the years and for seeking to take forward its interests in legislation, my right hon. Friend can be regarded as the father of the Welsh language. We heard a brief intervention from the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands), who I seem to remember is the only remaining Member who was a Minister the previous time there was no Welsh-speaking Minister at the Welsh Office.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Sweeney) observed that the Conservative party is second only to Plaid Cymru in bilingual terms, with one third of Conservative Members of Parliament in Wales able to speak the Welsh language. That puts the Conservatives above the Labour and Liberal Democrat parties. My only quarrel in the debate was with the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Dafis) who objected to tokenism and insisted that only one language be used here. I would say to him, were he still here, that those of us whose Welsh is inadequate or absent deserve encouragement and should not be frustrated from taking the opportunity to try to use the Welsh language.

Much of the debate this evening has centred on what the Procedure Committee has cautiously suggested. The caution of the Committee was set out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery), the Chairman of the Committee. We all owe a debt of gratitude to the Committee for considering the matter. He referred to the practical problems and the need to have more experience of dealing with them. Various Members have referred to the problems, which were introduced by the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan).

The suggestion was made that the recommendation of the Committee that Members restrict themselves to one language during any one speech might be unduly restrictive. Of course a Member might wish to deal with several distinct issues during a single speech, and it might seem appropriate to deal with some in English and some in Welsh. I agree with the Committee's suggestion that we ought to proceed with caution, as we do not want to cause difficulties for Hansard and make it more difficult for it to make the accurate report of the Committee's proceedings that the House is entitled to expect.

When we have gained some experience of running the Welsh Grand Committee in both languages, we may find that the Chairman, the Committee and the reporters can cope with a situation in which a Member switches from one language to another once or perhaps twice in a speech, provided—ideally—that everyone knows his intention. When we reach that point, we may leave it to the discretion of the Chairman of the Welsh Grand Committee to permit a slight relaxation of the rules set out in the Procedure Committee's report.

The hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones) asked about the record of proceedings of speeches in Welsh. I could be negative and suggest that he has not proved it necessary to have an alternative record and that, inevitably, it would result in extra expense. Those are not insubstantial objections to his proposals, but I prefer to follow the Procedure Committee and say that we should try to leave the matter open. When this House has had more experience of the Welsh Grand Committee using the language, we might find it appropriate to look again at the matter.

In conclusion, I wish to make the same point as the hon. Member for Cardiff, West—this is a great day for Wales. We are making great steps in our cultural and material fields, and this evening the House has been dealing with our language. Also, just before 11 o'clock this morning, the second Severn crossing was opened. I had the opportunity to be present, along with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Wales and the Secretary of State for Transport, when the bridge was opened by his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. It is a major development that will improve the economic affairs of south Wales, and it links to the very matter we are considering this evening.

Also present—perhaps he is still there—was the Chairman of the Welsh Grand Committee, the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), in whose constituency one side of the bridge is located. I am glad that we can move forward—

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the question, pursuant to Order [17 May].

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That, whilst English is and should remain the language of this House, the use of Welsh be permitted in parliamentary proceedings held in Wales, subject to the conditions set out in the Third Report from the Select Committee on Procedure, Session 1995-96 (House of Commons Paper No. 387).

Diabetes

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bates.]

8.54 pm

Mr. Colin Pickthall (West Lancashire): I am grateful to have the opportunity to raise the subject of diabetes. I did not expect to make my speech so early, but I promise the Minister of State that I will not keep him from an early bath.

I start by declaring an interest—I am an insulin-dependent diabetic, and naturally I take a particular interest in the matter. I shall be talking about matters that lie outside the Minister's area of responsibility, as diabetes is an issue that spreads into other areas. I do not expect definite answers from him on any of these matters, but I hope that he will communicate my queries to other Ministers in one way or another.

I sought this debate to coincide with National Diabetes Week, which in fact is next week, between 9 and 15 June. The week of activities seeks to educate the public generally and to heighten awareness of the problems and possibilities associated with the condition of diabetes. The British Diabetic Association is targeting in National Diabetes Week fitness and exercise as a crucial part of a diabetic's maintenance of good balance and good health.

When diabetics maintain the delicate balance between diet, drugs and exercise, they save themselves a lot of personal discomfort and misery in the short and long term, but also save the NHS vast amounts of expenditure. It is therefore in the interests of individuals and the Exchequer that, as a community, we get diabetic care right.

To indicate the scale of the problem, which has not yet been quantified by the Government, it should be recorded that there are about 1.4 million known diabetics in Britain, with a similarly huge number not diagnosed. Some 20,000 diabetics—almost all of whom are insulin-dependent—are under the age of 20. That is about 100 for each health district. These people have an entire lifetime to seek to control the condition.

There is a much greater prevalence of diabetes in our Asian and Afro-Caribbean communities, and a higher incidence in men than in women. I do not think it is irrelevant to say that, worldwide, there are estimated to be 110 million people with diabetes, and in Europe, 18.5 million people. A significant fact that interests me is that 10 per cent. of insulin-dependent diabetics use 80 per cent. of the world's supplies of insulin. Western intervention in eastern Europe after the collapse of the Soviet Union was particularly important given the lack of health care for diabetics. It is also an important matter in third-world countries, and may be one in which Lady Chalker might wish to take a great interest.

In large measure, diabetics have to care for themselves on a day-by-day basis. It is a complex task requiring help, education and constant self-monitoring, particularly of blood sugar levels. The more even those levels can be kept, the less likelihood there is of long-term severe complications such as retinopathy, neuropathy, cardiovascular disease, kidney failure, amputations and other conditions that can follow from long-term diabetes.

When thousands of new diabetics are diagnosed in this country each year, the size of that education and training task can be readily appreciated. As I understand it, records of diabetes are not kept by health authorities, so we have no precise statistics. I understand that considerable pressure has been exerted for local registers of diabetics. I commend that proposal to the Minister if he has not already thought about it, but I am sure he has.

I have many complaints and many descriptions of shortcomings to make in the debate, but I would not like it to be thought of as a gloomy debate. Professor Harry Keen, president of the BDA, has quite rightly said:

"These are times of great promise for people with diabetes."

There are exciting developments in research into implants of insulin-producing islets, artificial pancreases, as well better as insulin and better delivery systems for insulin. The Government could do an enormous amount for the health of the nation by encouraging and financing an intensification or speeding up of research into those developments.

Cuts or the freezing of research budgets, such as that of the Medical Research Council, whose budget has been cut by 1.5 per cent. in the current year, are very sad, and perhaps foolish. They hinder the likelihood of huge savings that would come from more efficient remedies or controls of diabetes. The same is true of research into the causes of diabetes.

There have also been admirable advances in recent years in the creation of a network of diabetic clinics. At my local clinic at Ormskirk hospital, consultants, a specialist diabetic nurse, a dietician and a chiropodist work together with back-up staff. The easily available provision of such specialist facilities to the entire diabetic population is an aim, I believe, of the NHS, and it should be achieved as soon as humanly possible.

The St. Vincent declaration has set out targets to reduce dramatically over five years the incidence of severe complications in diabetics. It also sets out to change the emphasis, in order to deal with individuals who are diabetics instead of a category or a type of person.

I urge the Government to study the shortcomings and difficulties that are faced by diabetics, and to alleviate them where they can. As I said before, I realise that many of them are not the responsibility of the Minister, but I know that he will be interested in them, and will communicate them to his colleagues in other Departments of State.

The Minister could deal directly with the first problem—the non-availability on prescription of Novopen needles. The Minister will recognise that the pen system for insulin delivery enables a diabetic to keep much better control over blood sugar levels, particularly those who have irregular life styles, as I do perforce as a Member of Parliament. The long-term savings for the NHS are enormous. While some people use replaceable needles several times, many cannot face, and perhaps should not be expected to face, reusing a steadily blunting needle. That can be exceedingly painful, and is a particular problem for young children. A week's supply of such needles can cost as much as £10. As they are not on prescription, that cost must be met by the insulin-dependent diabetic, who might be on the lowest of incomes. I believe that it is only a matter of time before that injustice, as I think it is, is remedied in response to the pressure from many thousands of pen users and would-be pen users.

The Government could make a very popular gesture by putting those pen needles on prescription, as disposable hypodermics are, at comparatively little cost and with considerable future savings in terms of better control of diabetes. As diabetics are converted into using pen needles, they cease to use most of their disposable hypodermic syringes, which are on prescription, so the costs should more or less balance in the long run. I understand that discussions have been taking place on this matter inside the Department, and I urge the Minister to expedite them if he possibly can.

Experience has shown that no job exists that cannot be done as well by someone who is diabetic as by anyone else, whether it is the job of an international footballer or of an actor, such as Leo McKern, Sir Harry Secombe or Willie Rushton, who were all involved in exceedingly stressful jobs and are all insulin-dependent diabetics; or the jobs done by several hon. Members of the House, and of another place; or heavy manual work. Every diabetic person is different; that is the central message, if any, of this speech.

Each person must work out his or her own regime. Each person must anticipate times when blood sugar might become low because of missing out on a meal at a specific time or because of unexpected exercise. That can lead to hypoglycaemia, and the diabetic must ensure that he takes in extra carbohydrate sugars to compensate.

All diabetics, as far as I know—at least unless they are completely mad—carry emergency rations with them to counter such possibilities. However, some occupations deem insulin dependency to be incompatible with the work involved, and in most of the cases I shall mention that assumption is a blanket one, ignoring the individual's success or otherwise in controlling the diabetes, and even ignoring medical evidence provided on that person's behalf.

For example, police forces usually automatically suspend or sack insulin-dependent officers. Many dedicated police officers have written to me in considerable distress, having lost promising careers simply because they suddenly developed insulin-dependent diabetes in middle age. As far as I know, the Home Office has not seriously studied that problem. I have tabled several questions about this, and received an answer more or less to the effect, "It is nothing to do with us," or, "The problem is in hand."

It is wrongly assumed that a police officer who is insulin-dependent is more likely than the next man or woman to suffer lapses of health while working. The same applies to firefighters, with the added impetus that a firefighter who is insulin-dependent cannot drive a fire tender or one of the heavy vehicles that the fire service uses, so he or she gets the sack or is demoted or pushed sideways into a desk job.

Even more peculiarly, in most cases a similar ban applies to offshore work. I take one absurd example. A 50-year-old man working as a ticket seller on the Shetland Isles ferry service became insulin-dependent. As soon as that happened and his employers found out, he was sacked, because he was unable to comply with the medical standards for offshore work. That worker was never more than 15 minutes from land, and had nothing to do with running the vessel. He simply collected the ticket money for the vehicles on the ferry.

Just as worrying is the story of a girl accepted for nurse training. After her initial acceptance, she was suddenly refused because she was insulin-dependent. Her health record, attested by her doctor, was excellent, but she told the hospital, in all honesty, that she had experienced hypos during the previous two years. The attacks were mild and had been self-treated. The hospital concerned was, in effect, refusing to accept any nurse with insulin dependency.

Only this morning I read an article in the Lancashire Evening Post about a diabetic man in Wigan, who said that he was refused entry into the armed forces because of his diabetes. He had also been sacked from his employment as a barber when his employer found out that he was insulin-dependent.

Perhaps most pressing in all these examples of discrimination—that is what they are—is the case of heavy goods vehicle and public service vehicle drivers. An insulin-dependent diabetic applying for a driving licence after 1 July this year will be banned from holding one of the new class 2 licences, which would prevent the driving of any vehicle over 3.5 tonnes.

Already, most HGV drivers in the United Kingdom who become insulin-dependent are effectively banned from continuing their employment. Some flexibility is possible in the European legislation, but it is by no means certain that the Government will take advantage of it to ensure that people treated with insulin are not automatically barred from driving class 2 vehicles and the range of associated jobs. I hope that the Minister will have a quiet word with his hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London, the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris), who is responsible for these matters and who I know is fully aware of the details.

There is a further problem associated with drivers. People who apply for work as taxi drivers in some parts of the country are refused licences because they are insulin users. I am unclear how much protection might be provided for those who suffer discrimination in employment in the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. I know that some protection is provided in insurance matters, but, as I understand it, there is no protection in occupational matters.

Two issues underlie all these complaints. Insulin-dependent people will have hypoglycaemic experiences from time to time, and there is no point disguising it. They can be very severe. The attacks result from an excessive drop in blood sugar levels and bring about a disorientation which is rather like drunkenness, only slightly less pleasant. I have been a diabetic for 13 or 14 years, and I have suffered two such attacks, both in the middle of the night.

That raises another problem. As a nation, we keep no records of people who are insulin-dependent and subject to hypoglycaemic attacks but who live alone and have no back-up from relatives. Most relatives of such people are well aware of what the insulin-dependent person has to go through, and are alert to the need to protect them. About three years ago, in a sad case in Grangemouth in Scotland, a woman who was an insulin-dependent diabetic died in a coma, and her small baby died of starvation; yet we have no systems to monitor lone diabetics.

Vague knowledge of the problem of hypos causes the knee-jerk rejection of insulin dependents by the sort of employers I have mentioned. Those who suffer from hypos are those with poorly controlled diabetes, and no one would suggest that someone who is continually poorly controlled should be allowed to drive an HGV.

That would be complete nonsense. Most insulin dependents, however, are well controlled, and that is more and more the case as education and monitoring improves and as more pens are in use.

My case is that every insulin-dependent diabetic who seeks to gain or retain employment should be judged on his or her medical record, witnessed if necessary by independent doctors, as happens in other areas. We seek to end the blanket rejection of diabetics, because that is a plain injustice, and is also appallingly inefficient in economic and employment terms. Many other medical conditions could cause the problems that employers imagine will arise from diabetes, but most of them do not give rise to blanket bans such as I have described.

I have already said that it is incumbent on diabetics and their medical advisers to educate themselves about the best possible control of their condition. They have primary responsibility. However, it is also incumbent on employers and Ministries that impose regulations to educate themselves about the realities of diabetes and individual differences. The Government must take a key role, whether by using the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 to disseminate good practice or through other means.

Between them, the Department of Health and, especially, the Home Office could—by insisting on an individual approach to judging an insulin-dependent diabetic's fitness for employment—make a major impact on employment practices, without any extra spending. Most insulin-dependent diabetics, like other people, simply want to earn a living and to contribute to key professions and occupations.

Diabetes is a condition with which many of us have to live, and most of us manage to live normal lives. We can do any job and undertake any task that other people do, with the possible exception of sugar testing. Diabetes can, and does, strike at random. It hit me at the age of 38, probably as a result of a kidney infection, although nobody really knows why. More than 1 million of us face potential discrimination in employment, yet we have a wide variety of talents and energy to contribute. The fact that many of us are not allowed to do so, out of ignorance on the part of those who run some of our systems, is an outrage. National Diabetes Week next week will be just a small part of a campaign to dispel some of that ignorance. I hope that the Government will not only join the campaign, but lead it.

9.18 pm

The Minister for Health (Mr. Gerald Malone): I am grateful to the hon. Member for West Lancashire (Mr. Pickthall) for observing delightful courtesies at the beginning of his speech and pointing out that some of his comments would be on subjects that are not my direct departmental responsibility. I shall deal with those comments first. Although, of course, I am more than happy to accede to his request that I draw those points to the attention of my fellow Ministers, I can answer to some extent his points about blind prejudice towards people who suffer from diabetes.

It is common ground that we are happy to do what we can to dispel prejudice, to ensure a proper understanding in the public mind—especially among those who are potential employers of diabetics—of the real difficulties, and to explain why, in many circumstances, no difficulties arise from employing people who have the problem well controlled—as the hon. Gentleman rightly said.

I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his timing in bringing this matter before the House, but I was rather curious about his interpretation of the declaration of Members' interests. Even in these days, I am not sure that it is necessary to declare that one is suffering from a medical condition before speaking about it in the House.

The hon. Gentleman certainly displayed his close and keen personal interests, which I know go well beyond being a sufferer. He is an active member of the all-party parliamentary group on the condition, and I know the role that he has played in the British Diabetic Association. That is why those who read the report of his speech will understand that it has great value.

I shall deal with a number of the detailed points before using the debate to set the problem in context and to explain why my Department and all its Ministers view the condition seriously. I shall also explain why I share the hon. Gentleman's optimism. We have an agenda which we can develop together, and I think that it will improve treatment not just in the long term but in the short term. I may be able to tell the House why that agenda has been pursued positively. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that it is being pursued in that spirit.

The hon. Member raised two specific issues, the first of which was about registers. I am sure that everybody who is associated with the problem will be aware that we have been highly successful in incorporating diabetes into the primary care chronic disease management programme. When I was preparing for the debate, I was delighted to note that that programme has gone some 90 per cent. of the way towards achieving its targets.

In a sense, the chronic disease management programme is the core of providing the database that is necessary, and the sort of register to which the hon. Gentleman referred. I agree with him that the development of local databases is an extremely good way to measure performance against a set of targets. There is much interest in the concept of registers in the management not just of diabetes but across the spectrum of chronic diseases, and my Department takes a keen interest in that.

It is not just the chronic disease management programme that is being taken forward in this respect. Some districts have made much progress and have done a great deal of work towards building a district-based population diabetes register in collaboration with local GPs. That has been made possible with the rolling out of the chronic disease management programme. I see the role of the Government and the Department as the pulling together of the thinking that has been developed in this area, and the pooling of the efforts that have been made on registers.

I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is aware that the Department held a workshop on registers last summer. That was extremely useful, and I am pleased to tell him that the results will shortly be published. He was right to highlight that as an important area in which thinking is being developed. It will be taken further, and I am sure that he will participate in the debate that will follow publication of the results of that workshop.

Not surprisingly, the hon. Gentleman spoke about disposable and reusable insulin pens and about needles. Of course my Department is aware of the issue and of the views of users, who have been well and constructively represented by the BDA. It might be helpful if I set out where we stand.

[Mr. Gerald Malone]

The BDA submitted, as the Gentleman will know, a comprehensive document earlier this year, which is being considered by Ministers and officials in the Department. Although it was not my specific responsibility within the Department, I was interested to see the document in detail. It was a first-class effort in putting together a sound, economically based case as to why it might make sense to move in that direction.

The hon. Gentleman will not be surprised that I cannot give any commitment about that tonight, but I can reassure him that the matter is being treated extremely seriously. Discussions are under way, and I hope that we can make some progress towards reaching a common position and an understanding of the facts and economics that underlie the case made by the BDA.

It is not surprising that this debate has a high profile, because it precedes a very important week. Diabetes has a high profile not just in my Department but in the country as a whole. I shall use the time available to set that in context.

It may surprise the House to learn that the treatment of diabetes consumes NHS assets in excess of £1 billion per annum—between 4 and 5 per cent. of total NHS expenditure—because it is so widespread. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the fact that the extent was not quantified. The best efforts that we can make show that diagnosed and undiagnosed diabetics account for 2 per cent. of the population. I know that other figures show that it is perhaps somewhat higher to one percentage point, but even 2 per cent. shows how important and fundamental it is.

In recognition of that importance, the Department currently supports two major research projects into the illness. The hon. Gentleman touched on the importance of research, and I should like to put on record what the Department is doing. The total cost of the Department's projects is just under £1 million, within the centrally commissioned research programme. In addition, in 1993-94—the latest year for which full figures are available—the Medical Research Council spent a little over £4 million on diabetes research, made up of two components: £1 million in the MRC's research establishments, and almost £3 million in grants to universities and medical schools around the country, which, of course, carry out research projects based on local patients.

As I have mentioned, diabetes is specifically targeted by the chronic disease management programme, and that has been a success. In addition, the importance accorded to diabetes is illustrated by other work that is under way.

In August 1994, the clinical standards advisory group, an independent group giving expert advice to Health Departments and the NHS on standards of clinical care and availability of services, produced a report on standards of care for people with diabetes. The Health Departments accepted the group's main recommendation: that they should encourage purchasers of health care to ensure that there are adequate local diabetes services with appropriate standards specified in contracts. That matter has been brought to the attention of those who are at the heart of shaping patient care—the health authorities that examine these matters and decide which services will be available to local people.

Equally important, in the following year, in 1995, the final report of the St. Vincent task force on diabetes was published. The task force was set up in 1992, jointly by the Department and the British Diabetic Association. Its terms of reference were to advise on which aspects of the St. Vincent declaration recommendations needed to be addressed in England, and also their relative priority, and to provide detailed advice on action needed to implement the priority areas that were agreed with the Department following the advice that had been given under the first term of reference.

The task force was seen as extremely important by all interested and involved parties, so I will set out in fuller terms what has happened since. Its work was intended to be based on the recommendations made in the St. Vincent declaration, which was promulgated following the famous meeting of the European region of the World Health Organisation and the European committee of the International Diabetes Federation. The declaration recommended action in key areas and set outcome targets, which are an important way of holding health authorities accountable for progress.

The task force report was circulated widely throughout the NHS last year, and it makes recommendations about good clinical and management practice in 11 key areas. That work not only helped to raise awareness of diabetes among clinicians and the general population, but forged solid working relationships between my officials and the BDA and other professional colleagues in the service. That relationship is still paying dividends.

The Department of Health is building on the task force work in two main ways. Officials are working up detailed costings for implementation of the report's recommendations, by a survey of current provision and by means of a computer model. Probably more important is that a sub-group of the clinical outcomes group, more commonly known as COG, has been set up to develop guidance for purchasers.

The terms of reference of COG, which is a multi-professional, non-statutory committee that advises the Department on how to improve outcomes of clinical care, are to advise on the strategy for medical, nursing and therapy audit; facilitate the development of clinical and service-wide audit; disseminate good practice through sharing guidance, material and experience in audit; advise the chief medical officer and the chief nursing officer on the most appropriate action to ensure the attainment of desired clinical outcomes and on the relevant areas of research; and identify areas where measurable and sustainable improvements in health can be achieved, including examples of bad practice—which it is as important to eliminate as to establish good practice.

To highlight the importance that the Department attaches to the messages that came out of the St. Vincent task force and the CSAG reports, it set up a diabetes sub-group under COG—the clinical outcomes diabetes sub-group—whose task is to develop purchaser guidance based on the report's recommendations. A key element underpinning all that work is that it should be based firmly on medical and scientific evidence of effectiveness where possible.

The hon. Gentleman rightly emphasised the importance of ensuring that research is translated into good practice. There is a continuing body of work based on research currently being undertaken, which, once it is complete, should be available to affect what happens in the field—as the hon. Gentleman suggested should happen.

I can illustrate the significant relationship forged during the sub-group's work by its diverse membership. Professor David Shaw, who chaired the St. Vincent task force so admirably, and Professor Harry Keen, chairman of the BDA, both serve on the sub-group, which will reinforce the strong link between the new group and the work of the task force. Their important experience of the life of the task force will add immeasurably to the depth of understanding of the issues in the group.

The sub-group started its work last autumn, and meets at monthly intervals. I understand that it is making excellent progress, and that is an important initiative for the Department. We in government have supported the St. Vincent initiative since its inception. I am sure that the work programme that is in hand is a sensible way forward, so that we can continue to make progress and secure better treatment levels and packages of care for all people who suffer from this terrible problem.

Although the hon. Gentleman said that he would let me have an early bath, it is useful that we have been able to use the earlier conclusion of tonight's proceedings to explore a serious problem in slightly greater depth. I am grateful to him for having raised it. I am especially grateful because it gives us an opportunity to set out the work programme that is in hand. On the other matters, I repeat my reassurance. I will, of course, raise them with the Ministers responsible, and I confirm that I am happy to do so.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Private Security Industry

1. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to implement the recommendations of the Home Affairs Committee in its first report of Session 1994-95, HC17, regarding regulation of the private security industry. [30261]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Maclean): The details of our proposed scheme for access to the criminal records of potential employees in the private security industry are well advanced and I hope to announce the details shortly.

Mr. Jones: Why has the Minister taken so long on this important matter to respond to the excellent report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs? Does he agree that, alongside many excellent companies, there are charlatans who give bad advice for a fee? Why can we not have quality personnel, vetting procedures and statutory regulations?

Mr. Maclean: This is an important matter and it is vital that we get it right. We must bear it in mind that, although the hon. Gentleman can put up a fairly honest plea for the controls that he wants, many Labour Members have consistently opposed the private security industry, do not like it and would like to regulate it out of existence. Some of the controls for which they call would enormously damage the industry. We want to ensure that it can continue the generally excellent service that it provides, with the proper safeguards.

Sir Ivan Lawrence: Although Conservative Members are whole-heartedly behind the Government's deregulation policy and a first glance might show that the recommendations of the Select Committee on Home Affairs went in the opposite direction, is not the strength of our report this: that this regulation is being called for by the industry itself and that, far from expecting that it will be a burden on the taxpayer, the industry is prepared to pay for it?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. and learned Friend's report from the Select Committee was a valuable contribution to the debate on regulation and control of the industry—there is no doubt about that—but he would be the first to admit that his report, although it made some valid suggestions, did not provide the detailed blueprint that one would require if one were to have proper safeguards in place without damaging the industry, and without heading down the road that many Opposition Members call for, which involves excessive regulation, training, hours of work and every single iota of the private security industry's work.

Mr. Michael: The Minister did not answer the question and he ignored the recommendations of the Select Committee, whose Chairman has just questioned him. The Minister tells us about plans to vet staff, but runs away from the need to regulate the private security industry as a whole, despite the calls of the Labour party, the Select Committee, the police and the private security industry itself. Why will the Home Secretary not face up to the fact that the Government's refusal to legislate is allowing his friends, the crooks, to masquerade as private security firms?

Mr. Maclean: That carefully rehearsed harangue would be much more believable if it came from someone with a credible record on voting on law and order issues, but this is the hon. Gentleman who argued that someone should be given bail if locking him up was bad for his health, and who voted against giving courts powers to impose longer sentences on violent and sexual offenders. He voted against reforming the right of silence, against increasing penalties for people who are cruel to children, against life imprisonment for hard drug dealers and for people who take guns to crime, and, seven times in a row, against the prevention of terrorism Act. If the House had agreed with him and had implemented the policies for which the Labour party voted, serious criminals would be walking the streets today instead of languishing in gaol. No wonder Labour's own Front Benchers described their policies as absolutely ridiculous and complete and utter nonsense. The fact is that one cannot trust Labour on crime.

Metropolitan Police

2. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional resources he is planning to give to the Metropolitan police in 1996-97. [30262]

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Michael Howard): I have approved a budget for 1996-97 that will allow the Metropolitan police to spend £29.2 million more this year than last—an increase of almost 2 per cent. and some 90 per cent. more in real terms than in 1979.

Mr. Carrington: Will my right hon. and learned Friend find time to visit Fulham and Hammersmith police stations, both of which have been rebuilt at a cost close to £10 million? Does that not show the Government's strong commitment to the Metropolitan police, whose 90 per cent. increase in spending in real terms is starting to pay off in the increasingly successful war against drugs, muggings, burglaries and auto crime?

Mr. Howard: I would like to visit my hon. Friend's constituency, and I shall do so when a suitable opportunity arises. My hon. Friend is absolutely right to be as pleased as I am with the performance of the police in the Fulham division, where there has been not only a fall in overall crime but a substantial increase in the clear-up rate, and a fall in auto crime—the theft of and from vehicles—on the most recent figures of no less than 20 per cent. year on year. I join my hon. Friend in congratulating the police in Fulham division on their excellent performance in fighting crime.

Mr. Tony Banks: What additional support and resources are being made available to the Metropolitan police in connection with Euro 96? Our police, unfortunately, have acquired the best expertise in dealing with hooliganism and one wants to see them given all necessary support. Have any additional resources been requested, and what steps has the Home Secretary taken to make sure that the police have adequate support?

Mr. Howard: Again, as so often happens, we see Labour Back Bencher after Labour Back Bencher getting up to ask for more money to be spent. We have made generous provision for the Metropolitan police, and out of it they are making available resources to deal with Euro 96—as are other forces throughout the country. Only the antediluvian Opposition Back Benchers think that more money is the answer to everything.

Drugs

3. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the response by the police and courts to those possessing and using drugs. [30263]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Tom Sackville): All police forces have specific drugs strategies covering rigid enforcement, with co-operation on rehabilitation and the reduction in demand for drugs. The courts have a wide range of discretion, from fines to life imprisonment.

Mr. Congdon: Given the real dangers of drug taking, does my hon. Friend agree that it is important that the police and courts continue to take a tough line with people who take drugs? Is it not important to get across the message to all young people that taking drugs is wrong and will seriously damage their health?

Mr. Sackville: I can reassure my hon. Friend that this Government will have nothing to do with calls for going soft on drugs, legalisation, decriminalisation or anything else. My hon. Friend may be interested to know that the prison population of persons convicted of drug offences has increased from 3,500 to 5,500 in two years. He may be interested to know also that I recently spent a day and an evening with Amsterdam police, when I witnessed the full absurdity of drugs being delivered to the back of so-called coffee shops illegally, then being supplied legally to customers inside. Because the socialists in the coalition that is in power in Holland have absurd policies, that country's police and customs have been undermined and Holland has been turned into the distribution centre for Europe of cocaine and heroin and the source of almost all the amphetamines and Ecstasy that comes into this country. We will not see such policies from this Government, but we would see them from the woolly liberals on the Labour Front Bench.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: I congratulate the Northumberland police on their work on drug trafficking in our area. Is the Minister aware that my local authority in Blyth Valley has implemented a policy according to which anyone caught trafficking drugs from a council house will be evicted? I understand that the first case under that policy will go to the High Court.

Mr. Sackville: On the hon. Gentleman's suggestion, I visited his local authority, and I congratulated it on bringing that case. I commend this tough line on drug dealers in council estates to all other local authorities.

Mr. Allason: Is my hon. Friend aware that the eight years' sentence on a convicted drug dealer in Torquay has sent a chill through the illicit underworld in that town? Is he also aware that the police have welcomed this stiff sentencing? It is perfectly clear from events after the conviction of that woman that drug dealing has become very limited in Torbay, forcing drug dealers to go elsewhere.

Mr. Sackville: I congratulate the local police on what they have achieved. There is concern about sentencing drug offenders, which is why my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary has introduced proposals under which all persistent drug dealers will go to prison for a very long time, and they know they will.

Probation

4. Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he next intends to meet representatives of the probation service to discuss probation issues. [30264]

Mr. Sackville: My right hon. and learned Friend expects to meet representatives of the Association of Chief Officers of Probation on 10 July and of the Central Probation Council on 23 July.

Ms Quin: Will the Minister take the opportunity of paying tribute to the work of the probation service and give a commitment to an enhanced and secure role for the service in the future? In the discussions in July, will the Minister respond to the probation service's concerns about the Government's action in removing training qualifications from the probation service? Will the Government also respond fully to the probation service's concerns about the Government's White Paper and the work of the probation service as set out in it?

Mr. Sackville: I am glad to be able to say that Baroness Blatch will meet people in the profession to discuss the new training arrangements. I ask the hon. Lady to request that her allies in politics and in the trade unions desist.

They have been seeking to delay those negotiations in a rearguard attempt to keep the outdated social work degree as a necessary part of training. Any further delay will damage the profession.

Mr. Nicholas Baker: Does my hon. Friend think that representatives of the probation service will recommend to him a curfew of children under 10, as recommended by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw)?

Mr. Sackville: The hon. Member for Blackburn needs to get his house in order and decide exactly what he is recommending to the House. We have heard three different versions of that plan in as many days, which typifies the totally muddled and confused attitude to law and order on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the Minister explain to the House how his right hon. and learned Friend proposes to persuade probation officers that that there will be an improvement in penal policy by a 15 per cent. reduction in probation staff this year? Will he also tell the House how the Government will justify the removal from prisons of seconded probation officers, who make an important contribution to the release of prisoners from prison, so that it can be shown—if at all—that prison works?

Mr. Sackville: I do not know where the hon. and learned Gentleman gets his figures, because spending on the probation service has remained constant in real terms. As to prisons, a great deal more work is being done on rehabilitation in prison by prison officers and by drug rehabilitation services, which are now working in prison. A great deal of work is being done.

Immigration (False Documents)

5. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many false documents were discovered per week in 1995 in the United Kingdom being used by people trying to enter the United Kingdom illegally. [30365]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Timothy Kirkhope): During 1995, a total of 4,486 forged or falsified travel documents were detected by immigration officers at United Kingdom ports and airports of entry, an average of 86 detections each week.

Mr. Evans: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. Is he aware that the British people are sick and tired of immigrants who pay nothing and take everything? Does he agree with me that it is time that immigrants paid tax for five years before they can use the health service or take social security benefits? After all, students have to take out loans and pay for their education. Why cannot immigrants do the same? We know that the lot opposite, if they ever got into power, would let everybody in, and the taxpayer would foot the bill.

Mr. Kirkhope: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his robust remarks. It is important to remember that people who come to this country legally find it highly offensive that some people use bogus documents to try to enter the country and thereby take social security benefits and jobs that should be available for those who are here legally. I also congratulate members of the immigration service's national forgery section and the national intelligence section on their work. Many people come from all over the world to see how they work because we have an excellent detection service to prevent abuses of the system.

We are concerned about forged credentials of all kinds. Indeed, we should all be concerned about the Labour party's forged credentials on crime, because, frankly, with such credentials, no one can trust it.

Mr. Henderson: Does the Minister not think that there is a contradiction between his stated desire to get rid of bogus documents and his reply to the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), and the Government's policy in the Asylum and Immigration Bill, clause 8 of which introduces provisions that mean that employers will have to recognise up to 40 new documents when they make their checks? Will that not create a forgers charter, in that all the people who are currently making money out of preparing forged immigration documents will now be forging employment documents? The Government should withdraw clause 8 if they genuinely want to get rid of forgery in the context of immigration.

Mr. Kirkhope: If only the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues had been a little more supportive of the Government in this vital aspect of legislation, we might be able to deal with some of the abuses rather more effectively. We want to ensure that people who do not have the proper documentation that entitles them to work should not benefit from the economy of this country. I hope that the Labour party will start to think more carefully about what benefits from the economy should be available to people who are in this country legally and to good employers.

Mr. Whittingdale: Does my hon. Friend agree that it will be possible to detect people who are attempting to enter this country using false documents only if we continue to check such documents at the point of entry? Will he confirm that the Government will not in any circumstances accept any attempt by the European Commission to remove our border controls?

Mr. Kirkhope: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. We are extremely effective in detecting forged documents, but it is vital that we maintain our present controls to make sure that illegality is stamped out.

Leicester Prison

6. Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will pay an official visit to the Welford Road prison, Leicester, to discuss conditions of prisoners and staff. [30266]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Miss Ann Widdecombe): I will be making a routine visit to Leicester prison on 27 June.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that, since the Conservative party came to power, crime in Leicestershire has trebled and the population of Leicester prison has risen from 207, which is permitted, to 324? When she makes her routine visit—which will be very welcome as she has a well-earned reputation for gentle, quiet and caring compassion—will she be kind enough to consider the terrible effect that such overcrowding has, not only on inmates and their rehabilitation but especially on those who are in charge of them and whose life's work it is to work in prison?

Miss Widdecombe: Despite the earnest expression on the hon. and learned Gentleman's face, I think that he must be having a little joke at his own party's expense. He seems to be suggesting that we are responsible for overcrowding in prisons, but, during the Labour party's previous term in office, the prison population was rising by 15 per cent. and the party responded by cutting the prison capital programme by 20 per cent. That was how seriously the Labour party took overcrowding.

In contrast, we have built 22 new prisons, eliminated the practice of trebling, eliminated the use of police cells since last June and reduced the percentage of prisoners sharing two to a cell designed for one. That should make the hon. and learned Gentleman very happy about our compassionate policy on overcrowding. Will he stand up and congratulate us and apologise?

Mr. Garnier: Before my hon. Friend makes her routine visit to Welford Road prison in Leicester, will she ignore the routine rant of the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner)? As it happens, crime in the county of Leicestershire—I am sorry about the city of Leicester—has fallen quite markedly. Will my hon. Friend also make a special visit to Gartree prison, which is on the way to Leicester, which she will find is well run and not overcrowded?

Miss Widdecombe: I can absolutely agree with my hon. and learned Friend. Crime in Leicestershire fell by 5.5 per cent. last year. I congratulate him on giving his constituents the good news and the facts, in comparison with the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West, who wants nothing more than to depress his constituents and paint the worst possible picture. I shall of course be delighted to visit Gartree, although I cannot, of course, guarantee to visit it before I visit Leicester. When I visit both prisons, I shall congratulate the prison staff on a magnificent achievement that is always belittled by the Opposition.

Identity Cards

7. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made on his evaluation of the introduction of identity cards. [30267]

Mr. Howard: We are making good progress in our assessment of the responses received to the Green Paper on identity cards. I hope to be able to announce our final decision shortly.

Mr. Dunn: Although my right hon. and learned Friend is awaiting a report from the Select Committee on Home Affairs on the matter, does he agree that one use of a national identity card would be to provide proof of identity by those about to vote in elections? An ID card would prevent wide-scale abuse and impersonation, which is taking place in national and local elections.

Mr. Howard: There is almost no limit to the number of uses that might be made of an identity card. We evaluated many of them in the consultation document that we issued. I know that my hon. Friend is sympathetic to the view that we should await the report of the Home Affairs Committee. I hope to be able to announce our proposals shortly thereafter.

Mr. Beggs: Will the Home Secretary give an assurance that, in the event of an identity card being introduced, it will apply throughout the United Kingdom? Will he take account of the widespread forgery of documents that facilitate personation in elections in certain areas of Northern Ireland? That could be overcome by a single document and enable a greater number of people who have been disfranchised due to arriving to vote with only one part of a driving licence, an out-of-date passport, or whatever, to be entitled to exercise their vote? I exhort him to give that assurance today.

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman will know that whether our proposals extend in due course to Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. I shall ensure that the views that the hon. Gentleman has expressed with characteristic forcefulness are drawn to my right hon. and learned Friend's attention.

Mr. Budgen: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the smartcard, which is required from people who are applying for payment under social security rules, is a form of voluntary identity card? Could not that smartcard principle be applied to a host of other circumstances in which the citizen comes into contact with the agencies of the state?

Mr. Howard: That is indeed a possibility. My hon. Friend has identified one way in which identity cards might develop. The smartcard technology might not be available for general-purpose use for some time, but we shall clearly bear it in mind.

Mr. Straw: Crime has doubled in the past 17 years, which represents the worst record of any British Government since the war, and the worst record among the Governments of 16 western countries surveyed by the Home Office. Against that background, we can all understand the synthetic hysteria that we have heard from the Government Dispatch Box this afternoon. On 1 April last year, the Prime Minister, opening the Conservative party's local election campaign, said that compulsory identity cards would "deter crime and make it more likely that we will catch criminals".

May we now have a categorical undertaking from the Home Secretary that that remains the Government's policy?

Mr. Howard: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman talks about synthetic hysteria, because he is an expert in the real thing. The shadow Chief Whip says that his proposals for a curfew are unworkable, the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge) says that they are ridiculous, and the Association of Chief Police Officers' spokesman says that they would give rise to huge practical difficulties. The only curfew that the Labour party is ever likely to impose is a curfew on the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr.

Straw) himself. It all goes to show that the Labour party cannot be trusted on crime. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] The hon. Gentleman began his question by talking about crime, so I am answering about crime.

As for identity cards, the hon. Gentleman will know that we have always made it plain that we are considering the range of identity card proposals, voluntary and compulsory, and we shall make our decision known in due course.

Madam Speaker: Order. Perhaps I might at this juncture refer the Secretary of State to answers that I gave yesterday to points of order concerning the answering of questions. They are recorded in column 609 of yesterday's Hansard.

Prisoners (Reform)

9. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent action has been taken to make prisons better at reforming prisoners. [30270]

Miss Widdecombe: It is central to the Prison Service's mission statement that it helps prisoners to lead law-abiding lives both in custody and after release. Recent action to reduce reoffending and reform prisoners includes the introduction of a scheme of incentives and earned privileges, an increase in the number of hours that prisoners spend in purposeful activity, mandatory drugs testing, and strengthened offending behaviour programmes.

Mr. Greenway: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply. Bearing in mind the low level of education of many prisoners, does she agree that every penny spent on education for those in prison is well spent, and is especially helpful in reforming them and in enabling them to lead useful lives after prison?

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, which is why we have brought about a massive increase in education spending in our prisons, and in the amount of education spending per prisoner, and why the number of student hours in our prisons is nearly double the number that we inherited from the Labour party.

Mr. Pike: Despite what the Minister says, is it not important that the opportunities offered at prisons such as Risley for prisoners to be trained into jobs, and to be able find employment when they leave prison, should be available to every prisoner in every prison, so that there is a real possibility of reducing crime and prisoners do not have to end up back in prison?

Miss Widdecombe: Proper employment opportunities for prisoners do indeed play an important role in rehabilitation, and preparation for employment in outside life is certainly part of that role. That is why there has been a vast increase in employment opportunities for prisoners, and such a substantial increase in the number of hours of purposeful activity spent by prisoners and in the number of national vocational qualifications and other qualifications gained by prisoners. The hon. Gentleman was right; he merely failed to congratulate us on what we are doing in that respect.

Mr. Ashby: My hon. Friend outlined improvements in the Prison Service and in the welfare of prisoners in answer to an earlier question. Is she aware that, in evidence given to the Home Affairs Select Committee yesterday, it was noticeable that the privately run prisons were at the forefront of those improvements, and that the welfare and well-being of prisoners was better in private prisons than in the public sector? Does that not show that our policies are the right policies?

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that private sector prisons have an excellent record of achievement, with one being praised by the chief inspector of prisons as a model of good practice. My hon. Friend did not mention that that has been achieved with more cost-effectiveness and greater value for money than we currently achieve in the public sector. But there are also excellent examples in the public sector and it is in the interests of the Prison Service as a whole that good practice should be disseminated, no matter where it originates. I hope that the Opposition will bear that in mind when pouring scorn on private sector prisons that have achieved so much.

Closed Circuit Television

10. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria he has used to decide on the allocation of Government grant to closed circuit television schemes. [30271]

Mr. Maclean: Bids made under the CCTV challenge competition are being assessed against the criteria set out in the bidding guidance issued on 22 November. Copies of the guidance have been placed in the Library. We shall be announcing the results of the competition in early summer.

Mr. Rendel: In the first round of grants, we had the absurd situation of a grant being offered to the then Conservative-led Wokingham district council, which then refused to take up the scheme, while no grant was offered to Newbury—then led by the Liberal Democrats—which went ahead with the scheme anyway because it was determined to push ahead with crime prevention. Will the Minister assure us that the criteria will not allow such a ridiculous situation to arise again and that, this time, grants will be given to the authorities that want to use them?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman is being rather careful in his use of language. Throughout the country, Liberal Democrat and Labour-controlled councils have been consistently hostile to CCTV. Those councils may now be queuing up to take money from a Tory Government to set up CCTV schemes, but they have been hostile to its use in the past. We will judge all bids for CCTV fairly and honestly. If a council does not make use of the money, it will lose it and the money will go into the Treasury coffers. If a council can use the money allocated to it, it can hang on to it. Newbury will be treated the same as the other applicants—they will all be treated fairly. But the hon. Gentleman should not pretend that the Liberals have liked CCTV, although they are keen to take our money now.

Mr. Tracey: May I commend to my right hon. Friend the grant application from the royal borough of Kingston upon Thames? Kingston has one of the most vibrant and successful shopping centres in the south of England, but that centre provides opportunities for crime. CCTV would ensure that the crime rate in Kingston fell, as it should.

Mr. Maclean: Of course, the police in Kingston have been successful in ensuring that the crime rate is reduced. I repeat that all applications for CCTV funding from the extra money that we have made available—an increase from £5 million to £15 million—will be carefully considered before we come to a decision.

Mrs. Ewing: We all recognise that CCTV is an innovation and that its success in the prevention and detection of crime has yet to be proved. The Minister, who knows my constituency, may realise that there is a danger that the application of CCTV may drive organised criminal gangs out of city centres and into rural areas. What action will he take to ensure that rural areas are not subjected to increased crime as a result of what is happening in city centres?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Lady's question would have been better directed to the Scottish Office, but I can refer her to Scottish Office and Home Office research which shows that the displacement that she fears has not occurred. I can speak with authority for England and Wales on this matter, as I am the Minister responsible. The latest crime figures in those countries show that the police in rural areas have been every bit as successful in cracking down on crime as the police in metropolitan areas. In 1995, crime fell even more in rural or non-metropolitan areas than in metropolitan ones. I cannot give the figures for Scotland.

Schengen Agreement

11. Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he next intends to discuss developments in the Schengen agreement treaty procedures with his EU counterparts from the relevant participating member states. [30272]

Mr. Howard: I frequently discuss developments in Schengen when I meet my European Union counterparts, and I make it plain that the United Kingdom has no intention of signing the convention as it would be inconsistent with the maintenance of our frontier controls.

Mr. Dykes: Will my right hon. and learned Friend bear in mind the fact, that, once we have the strict original entry control procedures for the common Community frontier and the proper Europol arrangements for intelligence information sharing, he will have no reason to have such a lack of self-confidence in his attitude to the excellent Schengen agreement? This country should keep an open mind about the agreement and join it. Pending that, will my right hon. and learned Friend reconsider the bureaucratic, cumbersome and slow entry procedures for many entrants at our ports, especially Dover, where it is much slower for foot passengers than for motorists?

Mr. Howard: I certainly disagree with the first part of my hon. Friend's question. We have natural advantages in frontier control because we are an island, and we have absolutely no intention whatever of dismantling those controls or doing away with them, whatever improvements may be made in the external frontier of the European Union. Our intention is in sharp contrast with the policies of the Liberal Democrats especially, and also with the Labour party.

On the second part of my hon. Friend's question, the present procedures that are in place in Dover are no more than are necessary to ensure the existence of effective controls.

Prison Education

12. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Minister of State last visited a prison in the south-west of England to discuss prison education. [30274]

Miss Widdecombe: I have visited a number of prison establishments in the south-west, including of course the Verne and Portland in my hon. Friend's constituency. My most recent visit to a prison in the south-west was on 8 January and I will be undertaking a further series of visits to the south-west in September. I discuss a wide range of issues, including education, whenever I visit a prison establishment.

Mr. Bruce: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer and for her welcome visit to my constituency. Does she feel that the greater link between prison education and local education facilities—for example, Weymouth college in my constituency—has been beneficial in ensuring that the education that prisoners receive is in line with that received by the community, so that qualifications can be transferred when they re-enter the community after their sentence?

Miss Widdecombe: Indeed I can confirm that. Further, the arrangements that we have made to contract out education locally give greater flexibility and greater clarity and have generally been welcomed as an initiative by governors and staff.

Mr. George Howarth: The Minister may be aware that I visited the young offenders institute in the constituency of the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) yesterday. I have visited a number of prisons, as has the Minister. Is she aware that a recent survey, which covered the south-west and the rest of the country, revealed that on average 14.5 per cent. will be cut from prison service education—in some prisons, the figure is as high as 83 per cent.—which will lead to the loss of 300 jobs and 16,000 prison education hours? Is that what the Minister means when she says that she is committed to rehabilitation through education? The reality is that there will be fewer hours, fewer teachers, less education and less chance of education stopping reoffending. Is the Minister not ashamed of that record?

Miss Widdecombe: As ever, the Opposition are totally incapable of distinguishing between quality and quantity. I will give the hon. Gentleman some of the facts. We inherited from the last Labour Government—

[Interruption.] The House is going to hear this. We inherited a real-terms expenditure of £17,800 per prisoner and we have increased that to £26,000 per prisoner. That is what we have achieved, and that shows the callous neglect of prisoners by the Labour Government. They neglected overcrowding, they neglected purposeful activity, they neglected education—

Mr. Henderson: This is a world record.

Miss Widdecombe: As the hon. Gentleman suggests, I could go on for a long time detailing the Opposition's neglect. By contrast, we have reduced overcrowding, increased purposeful activity, increased education, increased qualifications and introduced and increased offending behaviour programmes. We actually care about rehabilitation because it protects the general public. You cannot trust the Labour party to protect the general public.

Crime

13. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his latest initiatives to combat crime. [30275]

Mr. Maclean: We are taking a wide range of effective action to reduce crime and create safer communities. Record funding for the police, money for 5,000 more officers, the encouragement of closed circuit television and crime prevention partnerships and changes in the criminal law have already cut crime by more than 8 per cent. over the past three years. Our new sentencing proposals will create safer communities in future.

Mr. Amess: In my right hon. Friend's efforts to combat crime, does he intend to introduce a curfew for children up to the age of 10 after 9 o'clock at night? If so, will he consider extending it to members of the shadow Cabinet in view of their many public embarrassing disagreements?

Mr. Maclean: The shambles that now passes for Labour policy creation has given us three different policies in three days on the issue, and I suspect that if President Clinton made another speech tomorrow we would see a fourth version of the policy proposed by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). A fourth curfew policy will probably also be imposed by the Labour Chief Whip, stating that the shadow Cabinet team should not be let out in public after 2.30 pm.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Michael: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 June. [30291]

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning, I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Michael: Will the Prime Minister join the Secretary of State for Education and Employment in rejecting the idea of sixth form vouchers, or will he give in to the chairman of the Conservative party who has been telling newspapers that the right hon. Lady should be sacked?

The Prime Minister: No, he has not. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, yes he has."] No, he has not. I know that the Opposition are a pantomime and I am tempted to say, "Oh no he hasn't." I saw the story in the press this morning and fair old nonsense it was.

Mr. Walden: Does my right hon. Friend agree that our overriding attitude towards Europe should be to persuade our partners against further integration? If so, does he think that his tactics on beef enhance or diminish our powers of persuasion?

The Prime Minister: I am delighted to have my hon. Friend's support against further integration of a federal nature in the European Union. That is right. The issues are dealt with on their own merits.

On the question of beef, I very much welcome the decision taken yesterday by the Commission, which is a first step. My right hon. and learned Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have had a series of constructive meetings, including meetings this morning, on the issue. I hope that we shall be able to make progress by agreement.

Mr. Blair: With reference to what the Foreign Secretary described as a turning point in the beef crisis, have the Italians simply agreed—as I understand it—to try to use their best endeavours to secure agreement with other European Union countries, or have the Italians now agreed to support the lifting of the ban and the British position?

The Prime Minister: No—the Italians, who have the presidency, have now seen the framework document that we have produced and are using their best endeavours to see whether we can reach an agreement in advance of Florence. We have not finally discussed every aspect of that agreement with the Italians—that is happening at the moment, as it is with others. I hope that, as discussions continue over the next few days, we shall be able to reach an agreement. It is not certain, but I think that we have made a good deal of progress in the past few days, which is encouraging.

Mr. Blair: May I then ask the Prime Minister whether it is still his clear policy and expectation that by the Florence summit there will be a firm agreement to lift the ban completely within a specified time scale?

The Prime Minister: As I indicated when I announced the policy at the outset, we required two things before the ban is lifted completely. The first was the removal of the ban on beef derivatives, which has been obtained, and the second was a framework so that we were aware of precisely what needed to be done before the ban was lifted entirely. I very much hope that that will be achieved before Florence, but it is not solely in my hands. We can advance the case, and we are doing so; we need the agreement of the Commission and our partners across the European Union, which is what we are seeking to obtain.

Mr. Blair: I am sure that the Prime Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I gather from what he is saying that a time scale is not necessarily part of the negotiation.

I return to the question of cost that I put to the Prime Minister on Tuesday. He said then that it would not be part of the negotiation because of the refunding mechanism from the European Union. Will he confirm that the refunding in respect of the 30-month cattle slaughter scheme will come mainly out of the British rebate and that the net cost to Britain will therefore be some £2 billion, with several hundred million pounds extra for all sorts of other items? May I put it to the Prime Minister that, if the negotiation neither has a time scale nor an improvement in compensation, on any basis the price that this country will be paying for the beef crisis will be with us for many years to come?

The Prime Minister: The beef crisis is a very serious crisis. There is no doubt that it is expensive for this country. That has been the case from the outset. We set out what the costs were at the beginning. To reassure people on public health, there is a substantial price to be paid, and we see that in the destruction of animals and in the consequent compensation to farmers. We wish to get rid of bovine spongiform encephalopathy, first, on public health grounds; secondly, to restore consumer confidence; and, of course, for the overriding reason that we wish international confidence in British beef to be fully restored.

As far as the negotiations on time scale are concerned, we are seeking not an arbitrary calendar date but the steps that need to be taken—

Mr. Skinner: A retreat is on the way.

The Prime Minister: This is what I said at the outset. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) does not understand very much. If he understood a little more, he would probably interrupt a little less.

As I said at the outset, we are seeking a framework—that is to say, the steps that must be taken to enable us to remove the ban. That is what I stated here when the ban was introduced. That remains our policy and it has not changed one whit.

Mr. Lamont: Does the Prime Minister recall that, during the Napoleonic wars, Samuel Whitbread, the founder of the modern business, was always predicting defeat and urging the Government to open negotiations with Napoleon? Will the Prime Minister ignore the successors to Samuel Whitbread in the Confederation of British Industry who want to throw in the towel and who seem so indifferent to the plight of small businesses and farmers? Will he tell the chairman of Unilever to stick to cream cakes and detergents?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend puts the point with great clarity and precision. As he rightly says, there are a large number of small businesses—650,000 people are dependent on the beef industry, and it is in the interests of the people whose livelihoods are in the beef industry that we need to reach a satisfactory conclusion to this affair and restore the confidence in the international beef trade, which has been lost because of the lack of confidence and, frankly, the rather over-exaggerated response to the problem that we have had in the past. My right hon. Friend is entirely right to say that that is the priority.

Q2. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 June. [30292]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hoyle: Has the Prime Minister seen reports in the Daily Express that his predecessor, Baroness Thatcher, is calling for non-payment of bills to the European Union? Will he condemn that bizarre, foolish and reckless attempt at law breaking?

The Prime Minister: I responded to that point several Question Times ago, and my response would not change today.

Q3. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 June. [30293]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bruce: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that gas bills, electricity bills and telephone bills have been slashed since privatisation? Does he welcome today's news that there will be a windfall rebate of £38 for gas consumers? Did he welcome the £50 rebate for electricity consumers? Does this not show that the regulator has already altered the proposals for a windfall tax of £3 billion into a shortfall tax?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is entirely right: privatisation and the regulator are reducing the prices of a large number of utilities. There has been a rebate of £50 on electricity bills and there will be a rebate on gas bills. The regulator is blowing to pieces the prospect that there might be resources for an artificial windfall tax to fund putative expenditure by any other political party. Opposition Members below the Gangway may not know that the Labour party's industry spokesman is claiming that his party should embrace competition. I will not comment on the look of horror on the faces of the Opposition Members below the Gangway after hearing that.

Q4. Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 June. [30294]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gunnell: Does the Prime Minister agree with me that it is totally unacceptable for Yorkshire Water to show a profit of £162 million when it had a dreadful record on water supply, on leakage, on charges to customers and on investment during that period? Does the Prime Minister not think that it is time to revisit that regulator for tougher sanctions so that we can slake the fat cats and their thirst for profits? It is time that we had tougher regulations.

The Prime Minister: In that case, the hon. Gentleman will support the water regulator, who took action against Yorkshire Water to cut its prices earlier this week.

Mr. Viggers: May I ask my right hon. Friend to spare a moment during his busy day for the plight of people involved in a small section of the beef industry, the cow head de-boning sector? Is he aware that this small industry, which is made up of about a dozen mainly family-owned companies, has been driven out of business by the Government order of 28 March banning head meat? I ask my right hon. Friend to take the modest step of authorising the Ministry of Agriculture to discuss the amount of loss with the industry involved.

The Prime Minister: I will invite my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of Agriculture to examine that matter and then to contact my hon. Friend.

Q5. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 June. [30295]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mullin: Is it not time that the Prime Minister put a stop to the hypocrisy of the Tories being the party of the family? Perhaps he could take a tip from my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) and impose a curfew on his Ministers in the hope that they might sleep in their own beds rather than someone else's.

The Prime Minister: The policy of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw)—which does not seem to carry the support of his Chief Whip—is for a curfew for people under the age of 10.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Has my right hon. Friend seen the advertisement in today's paper supporting a new political party in this country? Will he take the opportunity to confirm that he will always heed the views of the British people to stay part of the European Union so long as it is a part of a Europe of separate states and never part of a federated super-state of Europe?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I did see that advertisement this morning and I am happy to confirm that no Government that I lead will enter into a federal Europe. I have argued for a Europe of nation states and I shall continue to do so. I am delighted to see that there seems to be some support for that in other quarters as well, as was highlighted by the advertisement.

Q6. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 June. [30296]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Campbell: If money is available for tax giveaways in the next budget, will the Prime Minister guarantee that it will be put into the health service and the education service of this country?

The Prime Minister: We have increased the resources for the health service above the level of inflation year after year after year. I shall not make any projections about what will happen in the Budget some months hence, but I note the hon. Gentleman's expectation that the economy is doing well enough to mean that it might place us in a position to reduce taxes or increase expenditure. I am grateful for that unsolicited commendation of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor's management of the economy.

Mr. Thomason: Has my right hon. Friend noted that the Rover Group, which is based partly in my constituency, has put in figures for the first quarter of this year showing an increase of 10 per cent. in production, and that the group's exports are up even more? Can he confirm that it is his policy to encourage enterprise, and that that sort of improvement would be severely damaged by the Labour party's policies?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly confirm that. I can also confirm that, in terms of growth, inflation, falling unemployment, investment and many other areas of economic management, this country is now leading any of our competitor countries in Europe as a result of decisions that the present Government have taken in recent years.

Q7. Mr. Bayley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 June. [30297]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bayley: Does the Prime Minister recall that the Labour party proposed an amendment to the Criminal Justice Bill to tighten up on the sale of handguns by mail order? In view of the evidence given at the Dunblane inquiry that one of the guns used to kill those children was sold by mail order by a firm in my constituency, will the Government reconsider their policy and introduce legislation to tighten up or even to ban the sale of handguns by mail order?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman will know, the Government have indeed strengthened firearms controls in recent years. Most self-loading and pump action rifles have been banned and a range of other changes have been made. As the whole House knows, we have given Lord Cullen a very wide remit and he may make recommendations to the Government. We will consider those very seriously, discuss them with other parties in the House and then decide what action needs to be taken.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Will the Leader of the House please set out the business for next week and the week after?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 10 JUNE—Remaining stages of the Community Care (Direct Payments) Bill [Lords].

Remaining stages of the Arbitration Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 11 JUNE—Opposition Day [14th allotted day].

Until about 7 o'clock, there will be a debate on standards in education, followed by a debate on the prior options review. Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

WEDNESDAY 12 JUNE—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Remaining stages of the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Bill [Lords].

THURSDAY 13 JUNE—Consideration of Lords amendments to the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Bill.

Motion on the Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order.

FRIDAY 14 JUNE—The House will not be sitting.

Provisionally, the business for the following week will be as follows:

MONDAY 17 JUNE—Remaining stages of the Family Law Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 18 JUNE—Opposition Day [15th allotted day].

There will be a debate on an Opposition motion, subject to be announced.

WEDNESDAY 19 JUNE—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Until about 7 o'clock, there will be a debate on sentencing policy on a Government motion, followed by a motion on the Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order.

THURSDAY 20 JUNE—A debate on the European Union—the usual six-monthly debate—on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 21 JUNE—A debate on a motion for the Adjournment of the House, subject not decided.

The House will also wish to know that on Wednesday 12 June, there will be a debate in European Standing Committee A on the conservation of wetlands.

[Wednesday 12 June: European Standing Committee A—European Community Document: 8564/95, Conservation of Wetlands. Relevant European Legislation Committee Reports: HC 51-xiii (1995-96) and HC 51-i (1995-96).]

Mr. Rooker: I thank the Leader of the House for outlining two full weeks' business. That is very helpful.

Consideration of the remaining stages of the Family Law Bill is set down for Monday 17 June. First, I plead with the Leader of the House to help hon. Members to take a considered view of that legislation. It will have a very direct and personal effect on our fellow citizens and we owe it to them and to their families to consider it in a grown-up manner. I ask the Leader of the House to arrange for a note to be placed in the Vote Office listing all the amendments that the Government seek to maintain or to overturn, along with any Government amendments for the Report stage.

It would be quite wrong to publish amendments only on the Friday—which is a non-sitting Friday—before a key debate on the following Monday. In the normal course of events, those amendments would not be put down until Thursday and then published on Friday. That is quite unacceptable in this case, and the House should receive advance notice of the Government's views.

Secondly, does the Leader of the House accept that the 58,000 families living in Ministry of Defence married quarters have a legitimate interest in knowing the nationality of the would-be purchasers whom Defence Ministers are lining up to buy their homes for lease back? As it will not affect commercial confidentiality, will the Leader of the House arrange for a Ministry of Defence statement about the nationality of the unknown bidders—information that was yesterday refused to the Defence Committee?

Finally, I refer to an issue that was mentioned in passing during Prime Minister's questions. Has the Leader of the House noticed the community interest in the proceedings of the House next Tuesday as evidenced by the extensive advertising in today's newspapers regarding the ten-minute Bill, the Referendum Bill? While not wishing to discuss the pros and cons of that proposal, I ask the Leader of the House to arrange for a debate about the need to set financial limits on national political advertising.

It cannot be right that people such as Sir James Goldsmith can seek to invent a political party, buy up a democracy and spend a fortune either trying to influence or to replace hon. Members outside the financial limits that are imposed by the Representation of the People Act 1989. There is no legal limit on national political advertising, and the House should address that matter.

Mr. Newton: On the last point, it is difficult to see how the hon. Gentleman's proposal would work in practice. I add also—I hope without too much barb—that, in the light of the amount of trade union advertising that sometimes appears during general election campaigns, it is a rather odd point for an Opposition Front Bencher to raise.

As to the hon. Gentleman's second point about the Ministry of Defence houses, I cannot add to what was said or not said during the recent meeting of the Select Committee. However, I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is due to answer questions on Tuesday.

As to the hon. Gentleman's first point—which he made in a serious and a considered way—I shall ensure that it receives the serious consideration that it deserves from my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor and those concerned with the Bill in the House.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): When my right hon. Friend considers whether Ministers should make ministerial statements to the House in the next two weeks, will he bear it in mind that a great opportunity has been missed in not announcing the success of British diplomacy at the recent North Atlantic Treaty Organisation ministerial council, in enabling France to rejoin the military organisation of NATO? Therefore, can we have a wide-ranging debate on foreign affairs at the earliest possible date or, alternatively, a ministerial statement to rectify that rather sad omission?

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise either a debate—certainly not of a dedicated kind—at an early stage or a statement. I draw attention once again to the fact that the matter could be raised during Defence questions next Tuesday and Foreign Office questions next Wednesday. There will be the usual debate on defence estimates later in the Session, but I cannot predict when that might occur.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): May I also thank the Leader of the House for giving us two weeks' business, and associate myself with the points made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) about the Family Law Bill and the need for proper consideration of any amendments to what is clearly a controversial measure? On the debate that the Leader of the House has announced for a fortnight today, which he describes as the routine six-monthly debate on the European Union, why, for the third time in a row, are the Government not willing to have a debate on anything controversial on anything other than a motion for the Adjournment of the House? We had such a debate on the common agricultural policy and the Scott report, and we still have not debated the big European issue—the Government's non-co-operation policy. Why cannot we have a debate on a substantive motion so that the House can declare its view on whether Parliament supports the Government's policy?

Mr. Newton: On the points about the intergovernmental conference and the Scott report, I have been over the arguments endlessly in the House and elsewhere. On the normal six-monthly debate on the European Union that the House expects to take place before each European Council meeting—there is nothing new about that—I can say only that, since 1993, all such debates have been on a motion for the Adjournment. Of the six that I have looked at, four have been on motions for the Adjournment. It is the sensible and normal way to consider such matters.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Could we arrange for an early and urgent debate on the impending postal strike? Many of us may wish to have the opportunity to condemn the damage that such a strike would cause our constituents privately, commercially and industrially. We would condemn the strike from the Conservative Benches, but would expect silence from the Labour party.

Mr. Newton: I hope that my hon. Friend will understand that the Government still very much hope that a strike can be avoided. It would clearly be damaging to industry and to the Post Office itself. I was the Minister at the time of the last such strike, which was undoubtedly damaging to the Post Office. The Post Office management has made it clear that it sees scope for further progress through negotiation, and I would prefer to concentrate on whether that negotiation will be successful.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): May we have a statement next week on the latest position in respect of the millennium festival? In that statement, will the Minister explain to the House why, regardless of the difficulties in Greenwich, under no circumstances will Birmingham be able to stage the festival? Why are the Government waging a persistent vendetta against the west midlands? People in the west midlands will certainly have their say about that at the next election.

Mr. Newton: I understand why the hon. Gentleman, as a west midlands Member, chooses to use such language, but I do not accept the suggestion that there is any such vendetta. Both my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage, who are members of the Millennium Commission, met business leaders yesterday with Sir Peter Levene, who now has until the end of June to continue his negotiations with private sector investors. We should await the outcome of that work.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May I ask my right hon. Friend for a debate next week on the upbringing of children, so that we may debate the punishment of children where it is necessary, including parents' right to smack without regret, having acted properly? Could we note the importance and the value of restoring corporal punishment in schools and that the Leader of the Opposition voted against corporal punishment in schools when it was last debated in the House, despite his weasel words yesterday?

Mr. Newton: I recall that the last time the Opposition told us that they were having a debate on standards in education, as they are planning for next Tuesday, they changed it to another subject at a very late stage. Perhaps we shall see a change to the subject that my hon. Friend has in mind.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will the Leader of the House find Government time next week for an urgent debate on the growing trade whereby tour operators lease foreign aircraft to carry British holidaymakers without being able to check on the airworthiness of those aircraft? Is that not an urgent and worrying problem, particularly at the beginning of the holiday season?

Mr. Newton: If I may, I shall draw that serious question to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and express the hope that the hon. Lady might get the opportunity to ask him about the matter directly and personally on Monday.

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): Can my right hon. Friend arrange for an early debate on the problems created by new age travellers, especially the untold damage among sheep caused by their marauding dogs, the hygiene risks and the fact that their girocheques seem to chase them around the country? When they are not where they are expected to be, they cause no end of trouble, as they did yesterday.

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend knows well that the problems arising from some of those incidents have, in recent years, been the subject of concern and action by both my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security and my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary via the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994. I shall bring my hon. Friend's continuing concern to their attention.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Could the Leader of the House alter this Monday's order of business as, on that day, the Scottish Grand Committee is meeting and, we understand, the negotiating body in Northern Ireland is meeting, which would affect hon. Members? May I press him on the business on Wednesday 19 June? Will there be an hour and a half or longer for the Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order? Will it be possible on that occasion, for the Leader of the House to introduce a motion to allow the Northern Ireland Grand Committee to move from place to place and to allow us to speak in plain English?

Mr. Newton: Having had an engaging little debate last night on Welsh, I do not think that I wish to add to what was said then, including in an intervention by one of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends. I cannot undertake to change the order of business on Monday, having only just announced it. On the Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order, the debate would normally last an hour and a half. I am considering the possibility of providing a bit more time, and I might take the hon. Gentleman's words as a representation to that effect.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Could my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on transport policy, so that I could raise two issues? One is the increased prioritisation of resources for bypasses in rural areas such as my constituency of Ribble Valley, and the second is the policy of the European Transport Commissioner Neil Kinnock, who was wisely rejected by the British public, but who is now intent on having a European integrated transport policy, which means that he would be doing a smash and grab on British sovereign policy and power. He must be told clearly that he will not be allowed to do so.

Mr. Newton: Obviously, I shall bear in mind my hon. Friend's request for a debate. He, in turn, will know of the United Kingdom Government's clear position on suggestions about the Commission negotiating on behalf of the whole European Union in respect, for example, of airline access agreements.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Now that the question of Goldsmith's money has been raised in the run-up to the general election, if we are to have a healthy democracy, would it not be wise to have a public statement by the Government on the funding of all political parties, so that such funding became transparent, as it is in the Labour party—every trade union penny is recorded for the public to see? Every donation over £1,000 should be recorded by all political parties. Why is it that the Tory party was £19 million in debt last year and is now £26 million in surplus? Where has the money come from? Has it come from overseas? We would like to know, because, if the Government can sort out their own finances, why is the public sector borrowing requirement going through the roof?

Mr. Newton: I imagine that you, Madam Speaker, were able to discern a request connected with the business in that. In so far as I could discern anything, it was a request for a statement and I can say only that I have no plans for such a statement.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Could we have a debate next week on youth discipline, because we have just found unexpected support for corporal punishment for unruly youths from the Leader of the Opposition? As far as I understood it, the only caning that he supported was for unruly Labour Back Benchers.

Mr. Newton: I have already commented on that matter, and clearly my hon. Friend would support any request to change the subject of next Tuesday's debate.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): May I gently pursue with the Leader of the House the business on Monday relating to the Community Care (Direct Payments) Bill? The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Scottish Grand Committee will be meeting in Ayr that morning. I have been advised that the most critical vote on the Bill will occur at about 6 o'clock. It would be impossible for many of my colleagues in Scotland of all political parties to return to the House to vote at that time. We shall also be seeing the start of what we hope will be the peace process talks in Northern Ireland. I ask the Leader of the House seriously and genuinely to reconsider Monday's business and to ensure that no vote is taken early.

Mr. Newton: It is not for me to attempt to dictate the pattern of business. I appreciate why the hon. Lady felt it necessary, as she put it in her usual kindly way, gently to pursue me, but I cannot add to my earlier remarks. We cannot, because of meetings elsewhere—whether in Scotland, Northern Ireland or, when appropriate, Wales—become what would amount to a two-day-week Parliament in Westminster.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on early-day motion 943?

[That this House notes with sad regret the fatal shooting of Stelios Panayi, a 19-year-old Greek Cypriot soldier who had left his post as a friendly gesture to exchange military hats with a Turkish soldier on the dividing 'Green Line' in Cyprus; further regrets that this shooting is just one more in a long series of such murders; is saddened by the fact that after 22 years of division it is still necessary, for the security of the indigenous people of Cyprus, for a UN peacekeeping force to keep vigil on the border, whilst 30,000 Turkish troops in the occupied area pose a threat to all Cypriots; wishes Britain's special envoy, Sir David Hannay, a successful trip to Cyprus in his efforts to advance towards an agreement which will result in a free united Cyprus on a federal basis, a solution which has thus far been hindered solely by the reluctance and refusal of the Turkish side in negotiations to display any sign of political will; and calls on Her Majesty's Government to redouble its efforts to find a lasting and just settlement.]

That would allow the House to welcome the appointment of Sir David Hannay to try to sort out the problems of Cyprus, which have lasted far too long. Does my right hon. Friend accept that it is intolerable that hundreds of thousands of people should have been deprived of the right to live in their own homes since 1974?

Mr. Newton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support for Sir David's appointment, which is intended to strengthen the efforts that the British Government have continuously made to help the process of achieving a peaceful settlement in Cyprus—which is clearly the only permanent solution to the problem to which my hon. Friend referred.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): I appreciate the assistance that the Leader of the House has given in the past in respect of MV Derbyshire. The view is widely held among hon. Members of all parties that the families affected by that tragedy have not received a fair deal from the Government. It came as a shock to learn that the marine technologists who made the first visit to MV Derbyshire are being precluded from joining the assessors on the next voyage, which is an absolute scandal. I would much appreciate it if the right hon. Gentleman conveyed the feelings of many hon. Members that the Secretary of State for Transport should seriously reconsider that matter.

Mr. Newton: I am grateful for the way in which the hon. Gentleman prefaced his question. In the spirit in which I have always approached him previously on the matter, of course I shall convey his remarks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State—who will be in the House to answer questions next Monday. I take the opportunity to mention, I hope not indiscreetly, that I have already had a word with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, following my conversation with the hon. Gentleman earlier this week.

Dr. Robert Spink (Castle Point): Is it not time that the House again debated the funding of the BBC? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the 1991 consolidated licence fee regulations state that a licence is required to install and use television receivers at a single place specified on the licence? Could the House debate the circumstances in which one licence could be used for two different addresses in particular circumstances?

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise a debate on that matter, but it may be in order to raise it in relation to the Broadcasting Bill, which is in Committee and will return to the Floor of the House in due course. I shall bring my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for National Heritage.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): Is the Leader of the House aware of the dismay and confusion caused by the decision of the President of the Board of Trade to nod through the American bid for Midlands Electricity? Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the President to explain to the House his policy in regard to mergers and takeovers, because the industry is currently in total confusion? There seems to be no rationality behind the President's decisions on those matters. One week he will refuse a merger or a vertical integration, but, soon after, he will approve an American takeover of Midlands Electricity. Will the Leader of the House bring the President of the Board of Trade to the House to explain his actions?

Mr. Newton: I cannot promise to bring the President of the Board of Trade to the House in quite the manner that the hon. Gentleman suggests, although I can say that the President is due to answer questions in the House on Wednesday 19 June. The only other comment that I shall make, in view of the anti-American flavour of the hon. Gentleman's question—I do not know whether it was intended—is that it is important to remember that this country has huge investments in America, and it has generally benefited from incoming overseas investment and from our investment overseas.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Does the Leader of the House recall that recently I asked him for a debate on the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991? Since then, Jessie—a bitch that was lame and had no teeth—has been destroyed, and Buster has been on dogs' death row for approximately five years. Can we please have a debate on that Act? It is costing the police hundreds of thousands of pounds in kennelling, and it is causing a great deal of suffering for pet owners, and for dogs that are waiting to be destroyed.

Magistrates have no discretion in that matter, although they would like to exercise it. Perhaps we should have a debate with a view to getting an agreed amendment to the Act, through the usual channels, before we rise for the summer recess. That would be greatly welcomed by all hon. Members, and it would certainly be greatly welcomed by animal lovers across the country.

Mr. Newton: I recall the hon. Gentleman's previous question, and I think—although I cannot recall exactly—that I made the point that that was a good subject for a Wednesday morning Adjournment debate. That is certainly my view, and he might like to consider it.

Madam Speaker: I call Mr. Paul Tyler—I am sorry; Mr. Paul Flynn.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Banks: Say it in Welsh.

Mr. Flynn: No, I dare not.

Has not the case been made that we need to have a debate on the issue of national spending on elections? The Leader of the House has just admitted that he does not know how we could introduce national spending limits. If we had such a debate, we could explain to him the result of my Bill—it will be debated on Second Reading on 12 July—which will reintroduce the national spending limits that operated until the mid-1970s.

If we do not have such a debate and if we do not introduce spending limits, any person, country or malign organisation—overseas or in this country—could spend unlimited millions of pounds on influencing our elections and buying votes. The Government have refused to introduce limits in the past, to protect the integrity of our democratic system. Will they now do it in their party's self-interest?

Mr. Newton: Perhaps I should make the point that the suggestion by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) appears to be related not to election periods but to preventing people from advertising their views on an on-going basis—if I understood his suggestion at all. I have no doubt that I, in common with other hon. Members, will examine with customary fascination the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), provided it is in English and not in Welsh.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Could we have some Government time for a debate on the interests of and disadvantages for the Britons who occupy the Rock of Gibraltar? Is the Leader of the House aware that the people of Gibraltar are currently enduring inordinate and unreasonable delays on the border? That is unacceptable. Those are Britons and, ultimately, this is their Parliament. There is a democratic deficit because they have no representation in the House. Every hon. Member therefore has an obligation to the people of Gibraltar, who are not represented in this place. Is it not time that we had a debate about their future, their complaints and the disadvantages that they suffer because of the Spanish authorities?

Mr. Newton: As usual, I shall bear in mind that request—as I do other requests—for a debate. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and the Government have consistently made clear their desire to do the best for the people of Gibraltar.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (South–East Staffordshire): Could the Leader of the House find time in the next few weeks to debate the performance of Premier Health NHS trust in my constituency, which is proposing to close a residential mental health unit less than 12 months after it was opened? We understand that there are financial difficulties but, although the area health authority is conducting a consultation, the contractors are already implementing the decision to close the unit before the public have had a chance to express their views. The public are understandably incensed and wish to re-establish their rights in the consultation process. It would do a great deal of good if the House were to re-establish those rights before any action was taken.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that I am not in a position to comment off the cuff from the Dispatch Box on a particular case of which I was not hitherto aware. However, it is clear that I should—and I will—bring it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, who is the Minister with the relevant responsibility in respect of social services overall, although not individual departments, and—certainly—health.

Points of Order

4 pm

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I gave your office notice this morning that I would seek to catch your eye about a matter on which I seek your guidance.

I am perplexed, and perhaps other hon. Members are too, about a Bill that is still at its preliminary stage. I must emphasise that I have not yet had a chance today to notify my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) that I would raise the matter. As the House knows, my hon. Friend is the promoter of a ten-minute Bill that is due to be introduced next Tuesday. It deals with referendums and other matters related to our membership of the European Union.

However, I noticed—I am sure that other hon. Members have, too—the text of the Bill in the newspapers, yesterday and today. Of course, the ten-minute Bill procedure means that a Bill is not printed until after its formal First Reading—

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): Leave is granted merely to "bring in" a Bill.

Mr. Dykes: Indeed; the hon. Gentleman reminds me of the correct wording. Prima facie, it might seem a breach of parliamentary privilege that a Bill is given to the press before hon. Members have had the opportunity to see the text. That might be especially awkward in this instance, as those who support the eccentric ideas expressed in the Bill are most anxious to preserve the sacred sovereignty of the House.

Madam Speaker: The Government are frequently encouraged to print Bills in advance so that their contents may be widely known and circulated. Also, many hon. Members apply to introduce a ten-minute Bill and give details to the press. I can see no objection to that. Such Bills are simply in draft form at that stage, and I take no exception to the practice in this instance.

I must tell the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) that he should have taken all necessary steps to inform his colleague that he was going to raise this matter this afternoon.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It was announced in the Queen's Speech that there was to be a state visit by President Mandela, which I understand is to take place next month. I also understand that it has been announced that he is to address us in a session of both Houses, as is now the convention when a Head of State visits. So far, the venue has not been announced. I appreciate that the responsibility is shared between you and the Lord Chancellor. Is it still possible to make representations about the venue, as many people believe that, given the importance of the visit and the recognition that we want to give President Mandela, it should be Westminster Hall rather than the Royal Gallery?

Madam Speaker: I do not think that any lobbying is necessary, as the House is sensitive to the importance of the occasion. However, I see that the Leader of the House wishes to say something further to that point of order, which I shall allow him to do.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Tony Newton): I was not quite sure of the protocol—I did not know whether it was for you, me, the Lord Chancellor or, indeed, for the Lord Privy Seal to reply. However, if it helps the hon. Gentleman, I can tell him that it is intended—rightly, in my view—that the venue should be Westminster Hall.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(4) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation)

HOUSING

That the Rent Officers (Additional Functions) (Scotland) Amendment Order 1996 (S.I., 1996, No. 975) be referred to a Standing Committee on Delegated Legislation.—[Mr. Newton.]

Question agreed to.

SCOTTISH GRAND COMMITTEE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 94H(1) (Scottish Grand Committee (Sittings))

That, notwithstanding the Order of the House [29th January] relating to the Scottish Grand Committee, the Chairman shall interrupt the proceedings on Monday 10th June at half-past One o'clock.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

Question agreed to.

Royal Air Force

[Relevant document: Minutes of Evidence on the Royal Air Force taken before the Defence Committee on 1st May 1996, House of Commons Paper No. 215-ii.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. McLoughlin.]

4.4 pm

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Nicholas Soames): I greatly welcome this opportunity to open our debate on the Royal Air Force on what is a very appropriate day to review its activities and achievements over the past 12 months.

As you, Madam Speaker, will remember, 52 years ago today—6 June 1944—the Royal Air Force was in action over Normandy helping to ensure the extraordinary success of the D-day landings and the ultimate liberation of the occupied countries of western Europe. On D-day itself, the RAF flew more than 5,500 sorties in an allied total of nearly 15,000. The contribution of the allied air forces ensured air supremacy, to such an exceptional effect that the Luftwaffe succeeded in flying fewer than 100 sorties in opposing the landings that day.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): They were great days.

Mr. Soames: They were indeed great days.

The task did not, of course, end with D-day. Throughout the summer of 1944, the RAF continued to make a major contribution to the battle to free Europe. That effort was not made without great sacrifice. Bomber Command alone lost nearly 300 aircraft in June—the vast majority in operations in support of the invasion. Such heroism and determination has inspired, and will continue to inspire, successive generations of young men and women to serve their country with distinction.

Air power today is as important a component of military operations. It exercises an often decisive influence over the broadest spread of operations. In the increasingly unpredictable strategic setting we face, we need forces capable of reacting quickly, boldly and effectively to a broad range of contingencies. The RAF is just such a force. Its speed of deployment, reach and inherent flexibility, and the very punch of air power, ensure that it is ideally positioned to make a formidable contribution to deterrence, or, in the event of conflict, military success.

The House will need no reminder of the key role of air power in the Gulf campaign in ensuring unquestioned mastery and command of the skies, and in greatly degrading the fighting ability of the Iraqi forces. The relatively light casualties—thank God—sustained by coalition ground forces was in no small measure due to that air campaign and its effect. That is, perhaps, the traditional perception of air power and its application. It remains as valid as ever, and we continue to shape our forces to meet the critical demands of high-intensity operations.

It is also clear that air power has great potential in the new scale and scope of the nature of the operations we face. Good examples of that, of course, are low-intensity operations, such as peacekeeping, which require a precise and measured application of force to achieve very specific and clear objectives. There is also a heavy demand for air transport—for deployment to the theatre of operations and mobility in the theatre. Helicopters are crucial in the latter respect. Peacekeeping activities often also require sustained operation from deployed and sometimes ill-found positions, imposing strains on people and equipment alike.

In the former Yugoslavia, the RAF has been engaged from the start of the international community's efforts to bring about peace and stability. An RAF Hercules flew the first relief flight into beleaguered Sarajevo, and, appropriately, an RAF Hercules flew in the last relief flight before the siege was finally lifted. Over that airlift's life, the RAF delivered 26,500 tonnes of vital food, medicines and other supplies to the population in nearly 2,000 sorties—some of them extraordinarily hazardous.

In August, when NATO aircraft were ordered into action to deter the Bosnian Serbs from further attacks on UN safe areas, Harrier and Jaguar ground attack aircraft from No. 4 squadron and No. 6 squadron, together with the Royal Navy's Sea Harriers and supported by E3D early warning aircraft, tankers and Tornado F3 air defence aircraft, flew some 270 highly successful bombing missions against Bosnian Serb targets. Of the 19 targets allocated to the Royal Air Force, 16 were destroyed and the remaining three gravely damaged. In addition, the Royal Air Force's information-gathering capability has been vital to the success of allied operations in the former Yugoslavia.

That demonstration of the potency of air power was enough to convince the Bosnian Serb leadership of our capabilities and our intent. It was decisive in bringing peace within the grasp of the international community. When the Dayton accords led to the creation of the NATO peace implementation force—IFOR—the Royal Air Force was again heavily involved in action, transporting about 7,000 troops and 1,750 tonnes of freight, including 500 vehicles from Germany and the United Kingdom.

The Royal Air Force is also doing exceptional work daily over northern and southern Iraq, monitoring compliance with United Nations Security Council resolution 688. To date, Royal Air Force combat aircraft and their supporting tankers have flown about 14,500 sorties, amounting to more than 36,000 hours of operations. I was delighted to see something of that effort in October, when I accompanied the Commander-in-Chief, Strike Command, Air Chief Marshal Sir William Wratten, and visited Incirlik in Southern Turkey and Dhahran in the Gulf, from where operations are mounted. The House should be under no illusion; those are extremely demanding missions, and I was greatly impressed by what I saw and heard.

The quality of support for such deployed operations is extremely important, and I would like to pay a tribute to the Tactical Supply Wing, which provides supply and specialised aircraft refuelling services to national, NATO and UN forces, and to the Tactical Communications Wing, which provides support communications in the Gulf, Turkey and former Yugoslavia. Personnel from those two very specialist units spend much time away from home, carrying out those vital, but obviously often unseen, tasks. They do not get enough credit for the hard work they do, and I am especially pleased to mark them out for special recognition today.

Even more than in the past, we now perceive United Kingdom forces as required to operate on a joint basis, with land, sea and air elements integrated within a single command structure. The House will recall that we have introduced new structures to improve our ability to respond rapidly and cohesively, with force elements drawn from all three services, notably the permanent joint headquarters—PJHQ—at Northwood, and the joint rapid deployment force.

Responsibility for joint exercises, for existing operations such as those in Bosnia and the middle east, and for new operations overseas, will be transferred to permanent joint headquarters over the coming months. Air power will provide a key component within the joint forces, which we can expect permanent joint headquarters to command.

In addition to the heavy involvement in operations that I have already highlighted, the Royal Air Force has over the past year been actively involved in training and collaboration with our allies, both old and new. Air and ground crews have only recently returned from the United States where they took part in Exercise Purple Star, the first exercise involving the permanent joint headquarters.

The exercise was the largest combined United Kingdom/United States deployment since the Gulf war. It involved 12,000 personnel from the United Kingdom, including elements of the joint rapid deployment force, and 45,000 from the United States. A total— [Interruption.] Would the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) like to intervene?

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): I merely said, "In some very dodgy foreign ships."

Mr. Soames: What an inspired intervention It has added a great deal of light to our deliberations. Perhaps I may continue.

There were 45,000 American troops involved, and a total of 56 Royal Air Force aircraft took part, including Harrier GR7s and Tornado GR1s, VC10 tankers, Nimrod maritime patrol aircraft and Hercules C130s, which were engaged in the largest parachute drop since the second world war, involving more than 5,000 United States and British paratroopers.

Eight Royal Air Force Pumas and seven Chinooks participated in a variety of support helicopter operations, including comprehensive cross-training with the United States 2nd Marine Expeditionary Force and 18th Airborne Corps. Two Royal Air Force Sea King search and rescue aircraft from 202 Squadron participated for the first time in a major exercise in the combat search and rescue role. The airlift to the United States involved some 2,550 hours of flying by aircraft of the air transport fleet. The exercise, which was on a gigantic scale, was a tremendous success. It provided fantastic training opportunities for all air and ground crews.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray) indicated assent.

Mr. Soames: The hon. Lady will have heard about it from her constituents. The exercise provided training for maritime strike and anti-submarine warfare aircraft, and for Tornado and Harrier aircraft in support of their offensive counter-air, battlefield air interdiction and close-air support roles. Many lessons have been learned about large-scale combined joint operations and these will be incorporated in future tasks.

Many exercises, of course, are on a rather smaller scale. As we debate today, RAF Jaguars and Harriers, supported by VC10 and Tristar aircraft, are in Alaska to participate in the Cope Thunder exercise series with US and Canadian forces. They will practise operational low flying, weapons firing and electronic warfare procedures.

The RAF has participated in nine major NATO exercises within Europe in the past 12 months, including deployments to Germany, Portugal, Spain, Turkey and Norway. UK participation in such exercises demonstrates our tangible support for the alliance. It affords valuable practice in combined training, while operating alongside forces of other nations in an often unfamiliar environment. It allows the RAF to practise and assess the deployment, sustainment and recovery of our reaction forces declared to NATO.

Collaboration with our allies has also continued within the Western European Union. In particular, the Franco-British European Air Group, announced at the Chartres summit in the autumn of 1994, became operational during the past year. The air group, based at RAF High Wycombe, was formally inaugurated by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and President Chirac on 30 October 1995.

The group, which aims to improve the capabilities of our respective air forces to carry out combined operations in pursuit of shared interests, has only a small permanent planning staff and has made excellent progress. It is showing tangible results in increased combined training and personnel exchanges, and work is progressing on contingency planning for joint humanitarian operations. We indicated that, after a settling-in period of at least a year, the group might expand to include other WEU nations. We will soon be considering further the possibilities of such an expansion.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The Minister refers to our co-operation with France. Will he devote some time to the implications of President Chirac's announcement about the future large aircraft, which could be serious for the RAF? Will the Air Force have to look elsewhere for an even larger heavy lift capacity?

Mr. Soames: The hon. Gentleman knows that these difficult and complex matters are dealt with by my hon. Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement—the brains sitting to my left. My hon. Friend will refer to that matter later. [HON. MEMBERS: "Does he mean the hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin)?"] The answer is that both my hon. Friends know more about it than I do.

In November, three Hercules aircraft participated in Exercise Bright Star in Egypt, operating alongside contingents from France, the United States, the United Arab Emirates and Egypt. Nimrod maritime patrol aircraft have been deployed to the Gulf for joint exercises; to Malaysia to participate in the five power defence arrangement exercise Starfish; to South Africa and, most recently, to New Zealand, where two Nimrods have been training alongside anti-submarine warfare forces from New Zealand, Australia and Canada. Finally, a Nimrod and crew from 120 Squadron have just completed co-operative training with the joint international task force east in the Caribbean.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): My hon. Friend referred to Nimrods, which are due to be phased out in the near future. Will he confirm that there will be an early announcement—hopefully, before the House rises—on whether the Government intend to order replacements for Nimrod or to update it? Will he confirm that the MOD will look at the life expectancy and value of any replacement, and that he will consider the total British components of any replacement?

Mr. Soames: I can confirm none of those things, because, as I have said, I only use the equipment when it has been bought. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement has those difficult decisions ahead of him, and I have no doubt that he will wish to turn to that important and expensive procurement in his extensive and already brilliant speech.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Will the Minister ask the Minister of State for Defence Procurement to look carefully at the Valkyrie when he visits my constituency, especially Marshall's, tomorrow? The Valkyrie has been developed with a view to replacing the Nimrod as the maritime patrol aircraft, and it has the lowest cost, the best export potential and a high content of United Kingdom production.

Mr. Soames: The hon. Lady is a formidable ambassador for the Valkyrie. I have studied her during the debate. She has looked like a wise owl on her Bench, and I knew that she was pregnant with question. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister of State will have heard what she said and will pay attention to the excellent opportunities that Marshall's have at present and will have in the future.

Mrs. Ewing rose—

Mr. Soames: Oh my God!

Mrs. Ewing: The Minister seems to be concerned by interventions from women. The replacement of Nimrod is critical, because many small and large businesses may be involved in the result of the decision. Can the Minister give us any information about when the decision will be taken and announced?

Mr. Soames: I am doing my best to explain to the House that I am here to speak this afternoon about the operational matters of the Royal Air Force. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement will, I am sure, address such questions. I do not wish to make light of the matter, not only because those aircraft are important to the overall operations of the RAF and the defence interests of the United Kingdom, but because the programme carries many commercial implications, as the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) said. I know that the decision will be taken with great care.

The RAF contributes both to NATO's partnership for peace initiative and to the United Kingdom's outreach programme. Last October, Tornado F3s took part in the first ever partnership for peace flying exercise,

[Mr. Soames]

Co-operative Jaguar, which was held in Denmark. Those exercises, together with the essential preparatory work on flight safety, language proficiency and effective airspace management, are excellent opportunities to reap the benefits of co-operative training, as well as to build confidence and familiarity with potential allies.

The past year has seen a great expansion in bilateral contacts with the countries of central and eastern Europe under the outreach programme, many of which form the basis for successful participation in partnership for peace. It is a testament to the extraordinarily high standards and professionalism of the RAF that we receive daily requests for advice from countries in central and eastern Europe, covering topics from flight safety and airspace management to aviation medicine. The Chief of the Air Staff plans to visit his counterparts in Poland, the Czech Republic and Hungary later this year, and I greatly enjoyed the discussions that I had with the Hungarian Chief of the Air Staff a few weeks ago.

The RAF has also been active in providing assistance to the civil community both at home and abroad. Last year, RAF Hercules aircraft carried humanitarian aid to the dependent territory of Montserrat and neighbouring Antigua to help set up evacuation centres and to airlift those local people who chose to leave the island. With the volcanic activity continuing in Montserrat and elsewhere, the RAF stands by to provide whatever further assistance may be required.

Closer to home, personnel from RAF fire rescue teams, who usually provide crash cover at RAF airfields, were deployed to Merseyside, where they helped to provide emergency fire service cover during the industrial dispute. The RAF is ready to provide similar assistance elsewhere if required. Earlier this year, when bad weather isolated many parts of the country, helicopters took emergency supplies to villages that had been cut off, and ferried people with emergency medical conditions to hospital.

The yellow helicopters of the search and rescue teams continue to be a welcome sight to many an imperilled or incompetent yachtsman or stranded mountaineer. Although established to rescue downed military airmen, the RAF's search and rescue fleet, stationed at eight different locations around the country as well as in Cyprus and the Falkland islands, also provides assistance to the civil community. With the mountain rescue teams, the search and rescue teams were responsible for saving more than 1500 lives during 1995.

By July, the last remaining Wessex helicopters on front-line squadrons will be replaced with the much more capable Sea King, which will increase still further the RAF's ability to help the civil community.

A rather less eye-catching, although nonetheless essential, service to the civil community is air traffic control. My Department co-operates closely with the civil authorities in providing air navigation services to all aircraft in United Kingdom airspace. Last year, some 230,000 military and 82,000 civil flights were provided with air navigation services by military air traffic controllers. In addition, 1,400,000 flights were provided with ATC services at military airfields. The close co-operation between military and civil air traffic controllers is truly essential to the maintenance of this country's safe, efficient and effective air traffic control arrangements .

In Northern Ireland, the RAF continues to fulfil an important role in the support provided by our armed forces to the Royal Ulster Constabulary. At present, approximately 1,100 RAF personnel are deployed in the Province, operating Chinook, Wessex and Puma helicopters, and an RAF field squadron, which provides security at RAF Aldergrove, the Province's main military airhead.

As in the rest of the United Kingdom, the RAF also provides invaluable assistance to the wider Northern Irish community in times of emergency. RAF aircraft have often been called out to help rescue people, either at sea or on Northern Ireland's inland lakes, or to airlift the injured to hospital. The RAF will, like the other two services, continue to assist the police in countering terrorism until all terrorist organisations make a commitment to end violence permanently.

Before I leave the subject of operational activities, the House would, I know, wish me to say something about the recent spate of aircraft accidents, which has seen the unfortunate loss so far this year of nine RAF aircraft. Flight safety is a fundamental part of operational effectiveness. While there has been understandable concern about the recent spate of accidents, there has also been much unfounded, and some wholly irresponsible, speculation about their potential causes.

There have been suggestions that those accidents are connected with the reduction in the size of the RAF following the end of the cold war. Nothing could be further from the truth. The reductions in the number of aircraft and personnel have been carefully planned, and they are consistent with the RAF's commitments. They do not—nor would they ever be allowed to—compromise either RAF training or safety.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): Does not the incorporation of the prestigious, and hitherto separate, Queen's flight, no less, into an existing RAF squadron—32 Communications Squadron at RAF Northolt in my constituency—demonstrate the high level of flight safety that the service maintains? If RAF Northolt were required to become a civil airport and a satellite of Heathrow, as the Select Committee on Transport proposes, would that not be incompatible with its royal duty, and its communications role in flying Ministers and senior offices—roles which are important, in both peace and war?

Mr. Soames: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who rightly wishes to raise an important matter. I confirm that no decisions have been taken on the recommendations in the report of the Select Committee on Transport on airport capacity. I reaffirm to my hon. Friend the Ministry of Defence's continuing requirement to fulfil its core tasks through the use of the facilities at RAF Northolt. My Department currently has no plans to change either the status of the station or the nature of its operation.

I was saying that it would be folly to compromise either training or safety, and we would never countenance it. It is arrant nonsense to suggest that we would do anything to jeopardise the safety of aircrew by allowing an unserviceable aircraft to fly. No aircraft is permitted to leave the ground unless it is judged entirely safe to do so. The ground crews that service RAF aircraft are dedicated professionals, and are amongst the best in the world.

At the same time, the RAF continues to maintain the most rigorous training standards, which every other country in the world wishes to come and learn from. Average fast jet flying hours are well above minimum NATO levels. Operating levels and skills remain at an exceptionally high standard.

There is no reason to believe that there is any fundamental problem in the way in which operations are conducted or supported, or that this is anything other than a truly, deeply and very unfortunate coincidence. It would be premature to infer that the overall accident rate for 1996 will reveal any new or disturbing trend. There have been similar clusters of accidents in the past, but they did not reveal any new trend. Overall, the general accident rate has continued to decline since the early 1980s.

I assure the House, nevertheless, that there really is no complacency. As the House will know, boards of inquiry are set up to examine the circumstances of each crash. Those investigations are extremely thorough and exhaustive, and although the work is still in progress, I can tell the House that there is no definite pattern to link any of these accidents.

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): Those who put about the scaremongering stories should be reminded that one should look at the number of accidents per 10,000 flying hours rather than just the number of accidents, because in the 1950s we had hundreds of accidents—and I mean hundreds—in a year. In one year, 1956, there were 156 aircraft accidents, of which more than 100 were Hunters and Meteors. Again, those accidents had to be measured against 10,000 flying hours. The RAF operates the finest and safest military operation anywhere.

Mr. Soames: Plainly, as I said at the beginning, much of the comment on these accidents has been extremely ill informed, and on one or two occasions comments from the Labour party have been downright irresponsible.

The RAF is and always has been a forward-thinking operation. I have spoken of its achievements and activities over the past year, but the House will also wish to hear of the heart and spirit of the service, and how they are being sustained through a period of profound structural change and reorientation.

In last year's debate on the Royal Air Force, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), who was then Minister of State for Defence Procurement, explained the effects of rationalisation and restructuring following the "Front Line First" and "Competing for Quality" initiatives. The RAF is now well on its way to completing these processes of change, and although clearly it has been an unsettling and worrying time, it is greatly to the credit of all RAF personnel that they have accommodated these changes while continuing to do their jobs in the excellent way we have all come to expect.

One of the most painful aspects of the changes has been that the RAF of the future will undoubtedly require fewer people. In 1990, the RAF's trained uniformed strength was 83,500 people; today, it is 62,500. By April 1999, it is planned to be 52,200. Sadly, 8,300 redundancies have been necessary over the past and current financial years, although fewer than 1,000 have been compulsory.

I can assure the House that the redundancy programme is being very carefully and sympathetically managed to ensure that the RAF retains the best mix of skills and abilities to meet its future commitments. The needs of those who are being made redundant are also being given high priority. People chosen for redundancy are given every assistance to prepare themselves for life as civilians, including retraining and careers advice. I am glad to say that we do not expect to need any further redundancies to meet our current manpower targets.

Mrs. Ewing: All hon. Members with RAF bases in our constituencies are concerned about these issues. Will the Minister give further evidence, perhaps in a written answer or information placed in the Library, as to how this will impact on particular bases, because in my area, at RAF Kinloss and RAF Lossiemouth, people just do not know what will happen to them. That causes a great deal of uncertainty, not just for them but for their families and for the local economy. Will he give us further information beyond that which appears in the 1996 defence estimates?

Mr. Soames: I will see what I can do for the hon. Lady. I thank her for the great support that she has always given the Royal Air Force. I think she will find that, in the bases to which she referred—indeed, in all the bases of the RAF—everyone knows what their future is following the announcements made in early March. I do not know whether I will be able to give her the figures she requires, but I will try to give her a note to that end.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for keeping in close touch with me over recent months about the closure of Stanmore Park and the plans arising from that. I ask him to keep up that excellent record. I thank him for the close consultations that we have maintained. Will he now keep in touch with me about the projected changes, bearing in mind that he wants to avoid compulsory redundancies and we want to maximise the redeployment effort?

Mr. Soames: I was grateful to my hon. Friend for taking the trouble to see me to ensure that we were carrying out the restructuring operations in the correct way. I assure him that we will keep in touch with him about the restructuring that is taking place in his constituency.

The Government recognise that morale is extraordinarily vulnerable during a period of restructuring and redundancy. The higher command of the Royal Air Force deserves a great deal more credit that it gets for piloting the service so successfully through what has been an extraordinarily difficult time. I utterly reject the criticisms that have been voiced that the Royal Air Force is a demoralised force, lacking direction and feeling, abandoned by its military and political masters. That is a gross and unfair distortion.

It is true that the Royal Air Force has experienced a great deal of turbulence, and it has, like the other two services, had to get to grips with profound change. However, it is also true that it is a force of immense professionalism, which has responded in a good spirit to the challenges it has faced. There is no evidence to link any change in working practices with a degradation in skills in the air or on the ground.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): A few moments ago, the Minister said that the Royal Air Force was a forward-looking body. Will he learn from experience? Does he remember that, during the Gulf war, we lost a number of aircraft because they had to overfly the airfields that they were attacking? Will he give us an assurance that he will look carefully at the provision of stand-off weaponry for the future?

If he does that, will he look carefully at the team put together by Shorts for the stand-off weapons programme, which includes British Aerospace, British Aerospace Systems and Equipment, Royal Ordnance, Lucas Aerospace and MSA in Scotland? We believe that it creates a unique opportunity for us to tie in the skills that are being developed in the United States in relation to its stand-off equipment and for the United Kingdom to reap a considerable transfer of technology and high-quality jobs.

Mr. Soames: That was a formidable intervention from the hon. Member. Mr. Deputy Speaker, the only thing that can gladden your heart and cause your spirits to rise is that it means that he will not have to make a real speech during the debate. I have tried to persuade the hon. Gentleman that these are matters for my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement, and I am sure that he will deal with them.

I correct the hon. Gentleman on one point: the aircraft losses during the Gulf war occurred because the Royal Air Force was charged with dropping munitions of a certain type, which caused it to have to undertake the most dangerous and difficult missions—during which, very sadly, a number of aircraft were lost. They were not lost because they did not have the weapons to do the business; they were lost because they were delivering the weapon of the moment, which required them to be positioned right over the runway.

Our main concern, of course, must be to ensure the health and fighting efficiency of the service. We have an active recruiting campaign, and training that is among the best in the country. These are not hollow words. I saw some excellent training under way when I visited RAF Cranwell, RAF Honington and RAF Shawbury recently.

The Government have announced a number of important decisions on equipment procurement and upgrading—a matter that my hon. Friend will deal with at much greater length later—which is a measure of our firm support for the Royal Air Force and our determination to maintain its position in the premier league. We continue, and will continue, to drive down overheads through rationalisation and restructuring. We are making use of competition from the private sector in the delivery of support services—as is every other air force in the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation. As part of the search for greater efficiency, we shall continue with this search for savings. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement will have more to say about that when he replies to the debate.

However, I am pleased to announce that, following a competition, a five-year contract has been placed with Brown and Root and Marshall Aerospace Ltd.—BRAMA—to provide support services at Royal Air Force Valley, including Hawk aircraft maintenance. After an extended implementation period, this contract will come into effect on 31 March 1997. It will result in savings of £25 million during the contract period, and will provide 400 new civilian jobs at the station—a welcome boost to the Anglesey area.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones (Ynys Môn): I thank the Minister for that announcement, and for his co-operation and courtesy during the time that we have been discussing the issue with him. Now that he has been able to make the announcement that BRAMA has secured the contract, can he confirm, first, that it is aware of the requirements—of which it has been informed informally by ourselves and others—to ensure that the maximum number of local people are employed at Valley in the 400 jobs announced, and, secondly, that it will co-operate with the agencies and the Welsh Office to ensure that, where those skills are not currently available, training programmes will be put into place and it will co-operate with us?

Mr. Soames: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kind words, for representing so clearly the views of his constituents and for being so positive at what has been a difficult time. I am happy to give him the assurances he seeks. I know that the consortium has been closely in touch with all the agencies concerned, and I believe that obviously this will be an astonishing success and will bring great benefit to Anglesey and the wider area. I know that it will be welcome news to local people who were worried about the future of the station.

The terms of the contract ensure that the very high standards set by the Royal Air Force for the provision of support services will continue when BRAMA take over. To that end, BRAMA intends to set up training arrangements to equip personnel with the necessary skills and to establish a long-term training programme to provide individual development and continuity of supply of qualified personnel. Initial discussions with the local training and enterprise council and college regarding provision of training began during the tendering process, and will now be pursued further.

Mr. Spellar: Does the provision with regard to training apply only to upgrading skills of existing trained personnel, or is there provision for apprentice training to ensure a continuing throughput of skilled personnel?

Mr. Soames: I am not able to answer that question, but I will happily let the hon. Gentleman have a detailed note later.

Following the implementation of this contract, Royal Air Force Valley will still employ more than 300 Royal Air Force personnel. I am fully confident that they will, in partnership with BRAMA, continue to deliver advanced fast jet training to the high standards for which they rightly have a fantastic reputation.

We are pressing ahead with the work following on from Sir Michael Bett's independent review of the armed forces' manpower, career and remuneration structures. Good progress is being made. I emphasise again that this is not a savings exercise. Rather, it will lead to better structures and better management of our people. I hope to make a further and more detailed announcement on this subject later in the summer.

Changes following "Front Line First" have highlighted the vital role performed by our reserve forces, and we have been looking closely at how we can make better use of the tremendous enthusiasm and great array of skills that people bring to the Reserves. As I announced on Third Reading of the Reserve Forces Bill on 20 May, we have now decided to form a Royal Auxiliary Air Force support helicopter squadron at RAF Benson in October. I hope that this will prove an innovative concept for the wider use of reserves, and I hope to give the House further details later in the year.

Before leaving the subject of reserves, I mention in particular the members of the Royal Air Force Volunteer Reserve currently called out for service in the former Yugoslavia and Turkey. I have seen the exceptional service and support they give to our regular forces in the provision of intelligence, photographic interpretation and meteorological forecasts. We are extremely fortunate to have such high-quality people on the reserve list.

The Royal Air Force is emerging from a period of great change. This process has inevitably imposed strains and tensions on individuals and the organisation alike. It says a lot for both that these changes have been carried through in a period of exceptional operational activity. I am extremely conscious that we all owe them a debt of gratitude.

I am very proud of the Royal Air Force. It is equipped with modern, capable aircraft, and manned by professional, extraordinarily skilled and dedicated people. It enjoys a superb reputation at home and abroad, and anyone who has the honour to travel in the name of the United Kingdom on defence business knows that that is no idle boast. It is one of this country's great assets, and we intend to ensure that the means are made available to retain and enhance that asset for the future.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): I thank the Minister for a comprehensive report on the current operations of the RAF. I convey to the House the apologies of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), the shadow Defence Secretary, who is today out in Bosnia, meeting our troops, and of my hon. Friend the Member for Motherwell, North (Dr. Reid), who is in Camberley, meeting other troops.

I am sure that we were all shocked this afternoon by reports in the evening paper that the beating retreat ceremony in Horse Guards parade was disrupted by a raucous party of hooray Henrys in the Office of the Secretary of State. I am sure that the Minister of State for the Armed Forces deplores that as much as the rest of us, and I was slightly surprised that he did not take the opportunity, on behalf of the Department, to issue an apology for those unfortunate events.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North–East): Would it not be appropriate to ask Mr. Terry Venables to investigate and to conclude that the doctrine of collective responsibility should apply?

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Offside!

Mr. Spellar: Or, in line with certain civilian air companies, that perhaps handcuffs should be provided for the occasion.

This is the third and last of the services debates in this Session. Like others, it provides a fitting opportunity for the House to pay tribute to the illustrious history and valued current role of our troops. Since the last RAF debate in the House, we have had the 50th anniversary of VJ day, which was so memorably and dramatically highlighted by the Lancaster bomber dropping a million poppies. Recently, we have had a tremendous display of Spitfires, reminding us of another epic period in the last war.

As the Minister mentioned, by chance or good parliamentary management, today's debate is on the anniversary of D-day, when the domination of the air by the allied forces played such a considerable part in the success of that operation. Those events reminded us graphically of the key front-line role played by the RAF in the defence of these islands and our liberties.

As the Minister said, the RAF is still very much in the front line. In former Yugoslavia, it has played a full part in the campaign to restrain the Bosnian Serbs, in a variety of roles including successful bombing missions, combat air patrol and reconnaissance missions. For four years it has been part of the longest humanitarian airlift in history. That humanitarian role has been to the fore again in the continuing flights from our base in Turkey over northern Iraq as well as flights over southern Iraq.

Closer to home, as the Minister said, the RAF has played a valuable role in Northern Ireland, and we all hope that the current talks and engagements in the political process will lead towards a normalisation of the position. We must not take too much for granted and, as the Minister said, must maintain our preparedness.

This year also marked a major break in a long tradition when it was announced that the Tornado squadrons at RAF Bruggen were being redeployed to existing operational bases in the United Kingdom. We all recognise the logic behind that decision, but we should also take the opportunity of paying tribute to the vital role they played in maintaining the peace during the long era of the cold war.

We should also use the opportunity of this debate to pay tribute to the work of the Reserves, which was covered in much more detail during the extensive debates on the Reserve Forces Bill.

The Minister mentioned, and undoubtedly other hon. Members will also discuss, the considerable concern that has been expressed at the spate of crashes earlier in the year, with the loss not only of aeroplanes but of human life. Thankfully, that appears to have abated slightly, but we all recognise that any service can have a run of bad luck. The RAF had a similar spate in 1994. I understand that the United States navy has recently had a similar experience with Phantoms. There will be individual inquiries into the crashes and no one would want to pre-judge their outcomes. However, we are asking for a broader inquiry in order to consider the crashes collectively and see whether there are any common factors and any lessons to be learnt.

We must ask whether aircraft availability and the cost of flying are restricting pilot training. When I asked the Minister on 12 March what was the current average period for completion of fast jet training, I received the astonishing reply that it was 259 weeks and that that would be reduced to 109 weeks by the end of the year. When my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields asked on 25 March about the average air crew training hours for Tornado aircraft, he was told that the monthly average for 1991-92 was 17 hours 45 minutes and that that had been reduced to 13 hours 55 minutes in 1995-96.

[Mr. Spellar]

I do not pretend to be an expert on pilot skills. There are those in the Royal Air Force—and indeed some in this place—who are better qualified to make an informed judgment in that regard.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Perhaps I can assist the hon. Gentleman. The difference results from the fact that, in the last year that he mentioned, there was more operational flying and less training. In the first two years that he mentioned, there was less operational flying and more training.

Mr. Spellar: I think that the hon. Gentleman would agree that the Royal Air Force is determined to retrieve those training hours precisely because it perceives the difference between training experience that is aimed at particular tasks and skills and operational experience. There is concern that the disparity should be redressed, and the RAF's appearance before the Defence Committee last month reinforces that point. I believe that the Select Committee was correct to press the RAF about the issue, and we await the outcome of its deliberations.

Mr. Soames: I must clarify that point. Is the hon. Gentleman calling for another review over and above the individual crash inquiries, which obviously do the same thing as would an overall review?

Mr. Spellar: I hoped that I had made it clear, but I am happy to reinforce that point. I said earlier that proper, individual inquiries are conducted into each crash. We are asking for a broad review that examines features common to those crashes rather than simply looking at each case in isolation. We ask the Minister to undertake that review to see whether there are common faults and lessons to be learnt. I hope that I have clarified my request.

I hope also that the Ministry of Defence will look more critically at contracting out training. We would be alarmed at the prospect of extending civilian training schemes to fast jet pilots. Even in areas of greater compatibility, we should be concerned about eroding the RAF training base. The RAF cannot be simply a project manager: it must have strength in depth and retain an all-round competence. It is important that the RAF provides a proper career structure for its personnel while delivering continuity and security.

The same considerations apply to the maintenance side of the RAF in logistics command and the many skilled civilian staff. We are concerned about the retention of trained personnel in these rather turbulent times to which the Minister referred. For example, 11 out of 12 Tornado flight commanders in Germany intend to exercise their option to retire early at the age of 38. It is from that officer pool that the future station and squadron commanders are drawn. Perhaps the Minister will say what measures the Government intend to take to correct that worrying problem.

In spite of the Minister's bluster on such occasions—we all accept that the Minister in full bluster is quite an impressive sight—the fact remains that people inside and outside the forces cannot understand why billions of pounds are spent on redundancy, including compulsory redundancy, while hundreds of millions of pounds are spent on recruitment and the armed forces remain undermanned. Only last week I received a letter from a man who asked why his son was to be made compulsorily redundant from the RAF next year while it continued to advertise for new trainees.

That is not only a great waste of training and experience—I am not sure whether those factors carry much weight with the Government—but the worst possible advertisement for new recruits. When major international companies such as the Rover Group—which announced its profits today—proudly proclaim their job-for-life concept, does the Minister believe that the RAF, with its hire-and-fire mentality, will be able to compete for the best recruits? That is a real problem for the RAF.

Mr. Soames: Although the hon. Gentleman has extremely limited experience in such matters, he should realise that the services have never been job-for-life organisations. The question of recruiting balance and structure is a matter for the Royal Air Force. It must decide what staff age profile it wants and needs. It must constantly refresh its staff and bring in new and younger blood at all levels and in all ranks. Finally, we cannot compel people to join the Royal Air Force, the Army or the Navy. Therefore, we must spend a great deal of time, money and effort ensuring that we get our message across.

Mr. Spellar: I thank the Minister. I am not entirely sure how long he served in the armed forces. Perhaps he will tell us whether he served as long as Lord Craig, who expressed concern yesterday in another place about flight commanders. The Minister should move away from cheap personal abuse and answer properly the questions that are asked not only by the Opposition but by many in the forces and by their families. They are extremely concerned about the uncertainty of careers in the forces and they are not impressed by the large-scale handing out of compulsory redundancies.

Mr. Bill Walker: The hon. Gentleman is correct to refer to the views of Lord Craig, who has considerable experience in that area. He will know from his own service that flight commanders of that age often leave the forces in order to enter the civilian field and earn large salaries working as captains for major airlines. We must recognise that the reduced size of the Royal Air Force means limited opportunities for flight commanders to become station commanders and air chief marshals.

Mr. Spellar: I thank the hon. Gentleman, but I think that he would accept that 11 out of 12 is a high proportion.

The Government do not seem to have time for continuity and competence in maintenance. How else can one explain the decision to contract out the Tornado repair work at RAF St. Athan, whatever the cost? Hon. Members have questioned the Minister about that matter, but he will not come clean about how much damage was done and what the final bill will be. Perhaps the Minister of State for Defence Procurement, who knows more about such things, will expand on that issue when he replies to the debate. If he does, we shall be able to evaluate the effect of that decision on the alleged savings to be derived from contracting out.

The Government are also considering contracting out maintenance work elsewhere in Wales at RAF Sealand and RAF Valley. The Minister made an announcement to that effect this afternoon. However, he did not answer the question that I put to him regarding longer-term training and apprentice training. Contractors will be able to use redundant RAF personnel to fulfil the contracts and they will be able to bid on that basis. If we are to retain long-term competence through the contracting route, the real question is what training efforts will be made to ensure that we have the skills in this country.

That is the difficulty that the Minister faces, and we must continue to press the Government on that point. When we asked whether contracts would include the requirement to ensure proper training, we received no reply. There has been mention of additional funding to the local training and enterprise council to provide conversion training. That is most welcome, but we still need to look to future competence.

The danger is that such measures could lead to a hollowing out of the logistical capability of the RAF. We are concerned about the potential weakening of our surge capability, particularly if we became involved in two theatres of operation at the same time. We are also concerned about the reduction in the RAF's benchmarking ability, which enables the proper evaluation of bids for contracted work. We firmly believe that any decisions on contracting work must be determined by pragmatism not dogmatism and we shall impose a moratorium on new contracts while we evaluate the schemes that are currently in the pipeline.

In that context, I shall move on to the story of the sale of the married quarters estate—a quite extraordinary saga that is drawing increasing public attention. Frankly, there have been some problems with the estate over the years, particularly with the high number of voids for long periods and the condition of some of the properties—mainly Army properties, but to a lesser extent in the Navy.

It was sensible and pragmatic to examine the forces' long-term requirements and to consider whether all the properties involved were suitable and whether, due to their location or for other reasons, some were surplus to requirements. That process seems to be continuing separately from the overall sale. However, the main sale of the married quarters estate does not appear to be driven by any of those considerations or by anything other than a desperate attempt to fill the Treasury coffers for a pre-election giveaway. It is a "live now, pay later" deal. The Chancellor of the Exchequer will be living it up and the service men and women and their families will be paying—not only in money, but in the loss of mutual support between families in the service community.

The purpose of the scheme cannot be to introduce private sector skills because the management of the estate will continue to be carried out by the defence housing executive, as will the repairs. Only this week The Times carried a substantial advert for positions in the defence housing executive to deal with the management of the estate. The problem has been identified as follows by one of the losing bidders, Johnson Fry:

"If this is viewed as a purely financial transaction then problems will emerge if there is not serious housing management experience in the team".

The only housing management side seems to be with the defence housing executive.

Nor can the scheme benefit the troops of all services. Under the current review, they are faced with rent increases between 10 per cent. and 25 per cent. this year alone, with worse to come as they move up towards market rents. As the MOD pays market rents to the new landlords, there will be increasing pressure to make up the deficit. Individual service men and their families will be paying for that and financing this dubious deal.

We should also recall that service personnel will have lost their rights to the discounted sales scheme that was of considerable benefit to those leaving the service. They are also concerned that the better-quality property—much of which is with the RAF—will be sold and service personnel will be moved into the less desirable properties. Some hon. Members may wish to draw attention to that during the debate.

Nor can it be to the benefit of the services in general. I mentioned earlier the return of Tornados from RAF Bruggen, and the services are obviously considering the return of other units. The sales may close that option. Perhaps that is why the sale is not only unpopular with the service men and families, as was shown by the recent evidence of the Army wives to the Select Committee, but of concern among those in the higher ranks of the forces who are planning for the future.

Looking to the future, will the Minister tell us what will happen after 25 years? According to the prospectus:

"At the end of the 25 year period MOD will be able to renew its leases, subject to a specified right for the landlord to obtain vacant possession for redevelopment or on provision of comparable"— that is an interesting word—

"alternative accommodation."

Where will that leave the MOD and individual service men and women and their families? What certainty does it give them? That is also why it caused such uproar in the other place earlier this week when peers from all parties expressed serious concerns and reservations about the scheme.

What is the driving force behind the sale? It is fair to say that in some of the press publicity some chaff has been dropped to suggest that it is to pay for repairs. If that is the case, perhaps the Minister can say in his reply that the total proceeds of the sale will be devoted to upgrading service houses over and above current expenditure. That seems to be causing some humour in the ranks, so I presume it is not the answer. If he cannot say that, will he tell us what percentage of the money made from the sales will be spent on upgrading the properties? Perhaps he would like to intervene now.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. James Arbuthnot): This is such drivel that it is hardly worth intervening. If the hon. Gentleman were not in a position of supporting the sale, would he find the money to upgrade the properties which need upgrading from somewhere else? In other words, will he commit himself now to spending more on the defence budget?

Mr. Spellar: When Ministers are slightly short on argument, they resort to personal abuse.

Mr. Soames: Certainly not.

Mr. Spellar: "Drivel" seems to me to fall into that category. It is interesting to note that, although the Minister put up a smokescreen, he did not answer my question. I shall answer his question, but I would be interested in an answer to mine. What percentage of the overall sale will be spent on upgrading the property?

Mr. Arbuthnot: As the hon. Gentleman should be aware, it is not possible to know what percentage of the overall sale proceeds will be spent on the property because we do not yet know what the sale price will be. As I told the Select Committee yesterday, the defence housing executive has estimated that it will cost £100 million to upgrade the property to grade 1 standard. Therefore, the overall sale expectations will be more than the defence housing executive could possibly spend on any property. That was why I described the hon. Gentleman's remarks as drivel.

Mr. Spellar: I thank the Minister for that reply. That figure makes it quite clear that the money that could be released by the sale of surplus properties—much of which is taking place at the moment—could easily cover the cost of repairs. Therefore, the overall sale is unnecessary because repairs could be paid for at the margin. That gives us a clue as to the real business of the sale.

Mr. Arbuthnot: How would the hon. Gentleman pay for it?

Mr. Spellar: There is a problem of communication here.

The MOD has already given instructions for the sale of a number of surplus properties. Undoubtedly, more properties will be declared surplus to requirement. The proceeds would go a considerable way towards paying for the repairs. I said earlier that we accepted the need for the sale of surplus properties. If the Minister believes that the sale of surplus properties will not raise sufficient funds, perhaps, instead of hiding behind commercial confidentiality, he will tell us how much was raised from the sale of surplus properties. However, the number of properties being sold suggests that the MOD might not be getting a very good deal if it had not managed to raise £100 million.

Mr. Frank Cook: It might help my hon. Friend if I were to inform him that—as I understand it—11,000 voids are available. If they were sold for £10,000 each, which is not a great deal at today's market values, that would raise £110 million, perhaps allowing an extra £10 million for the Conservative party election fund.

Mr. Spellar: My hon. Friend has put some figures on that, but I would not want to give the Government ideas, as we wish to retain some flexibility within the system. Certainly my hon. Friend has clearly identified that the sale of surplus properties would be sufficient to pay for the rolling programme of repairs.

Let us get down to the real reason for the sale. Its handling gives us a clue. Why did the Secretary of State make a surprise announcement in November and why, with Christmas and the new year intervening, did he require replies by 25 January? That seems an extremely short period. How could one seriously expect considered replies on such a complex project over that period? The sale comprises 60,000 properties over 800 sites. Who would have the resources to evaluate it in that time?

The sale of individual properties is a sweetener, but the real attraction for any bidder is rent payments. The prospectus talks of a guaranteed payment or aggregated market rents, whichever is the higher, and we know what the Government have been doing to market rents. It appears, however, that even that is not enough. Reports in the Financial Times show that the MOD has been asked to consider index-linked payments. And the reason? It is believed that that will enable it to raise the upfront price.

So there we have it in a nutshell. This is not a proper privatisation or a service agreement using private sector skills. There is not even any competing for quality. It is a straightforward sale and lease-back scheme. If it were happening in a company, we would immediately conclude, unless there was a proper reinvestment strategy, that it had cash flow problems. It is a live now, pay later, deal.

I gather that the Minister seemed reluctant yesterday at the meeting of the Select Committee to say who was buying, which is surprising as it has been in nearly every business section of the quality press in the past couple of weeks. It informs us—who knows if it is right, but I suspect that it might be close to the truth—that Nomura bank, Morgan Stanley, Lehman Brothers and ING are buying. A couple of weeks ago, another Secretary of State created considerable fuss about flying the European flag over public buildings for a day. Now, without a murmur from those Ministers, the stars and stripes or the rising sun will be flying over our married quarters estates, airfields, camps and naval bases. It is an extraordinary and disgraceful situation. A previous Tory Prime Minister, Harold Macmillan, talked about selling the family silver. This lot are taking out a second mortgage on the house.

Some procurement decisions need to be mentioned. My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) drew attention to the future large aircraft project, which I know is of considerable concern to my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones). We are receiving confusing messages from across the channel. We and the aircraft industry hope that the Minister can shed some light on the subject, especially the French Government's attitude on development and production of the aircraft, and on their intention to purchase.

I am sure that the Minister heard last week that Volker Rühe, the German Defence Minister, was speaking encouragingly about the FLA's development. We have also noticed heavy advertising in the defence press from German industry about the FLA. I hope that the Minister will give us further encouragement on that important project and on working more closely generally with the French air force and industry, which is to be welcomed.

We all recognise that, after some difficulties, Eurofighter 2000 is increasingly emerging as a success story, especially in terms of its capabilities. It is a tribute to British and to European industry, but the Government can also take some credit, not only over the work-share issue, but over the partnership with industry.

Since taking on this portfolio and more recently on a visit to Warton, I have been impressed by the substantial co-operation and collaboration between the RAF and equipment manufacturers at all stages. The result seems to be an extremely pilot-friendly aircraft. The Government should be claiming more credit for their role, but perhaps this level of Government sector collaboration is slightly politically incorrect in this Administration and they feel constrained from doing so.

Finally on detailed procurement, will the Minister comment on what appears to be the successful thermal imagery airborne laser designation update on the Jaguar aircraft? We have all read reports on a rapid and cost-effective update. It appears that, again, pilots are heavily involved in the process through the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. Again, we could be looking at a significant breakthrough in methodology. The House will be interested in such a report from the Minister.

More generally, all Governments must recognise the impact of purchasing decisions on the size and configuration of the defence industry. The joint Trade and Industry and Defence Select Committee report outlined that succinctly. Let us note that report's conclusions:

"Since the Government is the only significant UK purchaser of defence equipment, it cannot ignore the impact of its decisions on the UK's defence industries. We welcome the changes in MOD's attitude towards procurement, such as the greater willingness to take account of the future of MOD's supply base, the move towards partnership relationships with suppliers, the increased emphasis on dual use technologies and the greater emphasis on collaboration within Europe. However, these changes are tending to be reflected in procurement decisions in an ad hoc way, chiefly in the major decisions. Our recommendations are designed to change this, particularly through taking account of industrial interests more systematically, a longer term approach to the retention of capabilities and leading-edge technology, an increased emphasis on the technology base of the defence industries and related civil industries, and recognition of the importance of the defence industries and their technology and skills to the UK economy."

I would especially emphasise the phrase

"particularly through taking account of industrial interests more systematically".

That is reinforced by the recognition in the defence estimates, which state:

"The Department is British Industry's largest single customer. Our procurement decisions can therefore have a significant impact on the shape of the Defence Industry. We recognise the need to take defence industrial factors fully into account in our decision-making and have reviewed our procedures to ensure that this is done systematically as part of our programming and project evaluation process."

That and the paragraphs that follow are all reminiscent of last year's Labour party document "Strategy for a Secure Future" and a considerable move away from previous Government doctrine.

As the MOD moves towards making key decisions on both aircraft and missile purchases, it must start to develop a view of how those will impact on relationships and the corporate structure of the British and European aerospace industry, as well as our relationship with the United States defence industry. It appears that there may be some divergence of opinion between the MOD and the Department of Trade and Industry on the question of vertical or horizontal integration, but, if it is accepted—and it should be—that there is some urgency about rationalisation, the resolution of this becomes imperative, especially in the light of the rapid consolidation of the United States industry. Labour's policy document "Strategy for a Secure Future" points the way ahead to a more positive and realistic policy.

In that context, I suppose it would be churlish not to congratulate the Government on the decision to proceed with the Tornado upgrade rather than following the option that was trailed of leasing F16s from the United States, but the question that we must ask, as with the extraordinary saga of the Army field ambulance and the contest between Land Rover and the Austrians, is simple: why were those options considered in the first place? It is no wonder that, when defence manufacturers were giving evidence to the joint Select Committee, they said:

"The UK MOD's procurement policies are seen as verging on the hostile to the indigenous industrial base".

Can we imagine that being said in all seriousness about the American, French or defence ministries and their industrial structures? Perhaps that explains the Minister's facile response on the unsuitability of foreign chartered ships for Operation Purple Star, one of which was a Ukrainian ship which, after it arrived in America, was tied up, and then substantial fines had to be paid to get it repaired.

The industry could have gleaned some hope on 23 May 1995 when the then Minister of State for Defence Procurement, the right hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman), said:

"The Ministry of Defence needs to continue to give due consideration to the possible consequences of procurement decisions for the defence industrial base."

With his departure, however, we seem to have slipped back again to relying on two legs of the stool—operational effectiveness and price—rather than also considering the third leg of industrial capability.

Let us be clear. When we buy abroad without proper reciprocation, we pay twice: once for the equipment and then for the people thrown out of work. Then we pay again because of our reduced ability to sell into third markets, so any national purchasing policy should be mindful of the industrial implications.

That is shown by the case of the defence helicopter flying school. Let us leave on one side whether the privatisation is a good idea and concentrate on the procurement process. It appears evident that all the aircraft options would be from abroad. I accept that that seems to be for straightforward availability reasons. When I asked the Minister what level of offset or industrial participation we would be seeking, I was informed that it was being put out to tender, so industrial participation was not appropriate. I pointed out that the formalities of the contractual relationship would not have deterred the Minister's French counterpart.

I am pleased that the position has been reviewed and that bidders have been advised that industrial participation will be sought. Obviously I am pleased about that, and the Minister can take credit for being open-minded and receptive. The question remains why that was not done in the first place. Why do not the MOD Procurement Executive and Ministers get into the frame of mind to buy British first wherever possible?

Will the Minister take the opportunity to make a statement about the replacement helicopters for transporting the royal family? Will the Westland EH101 be chosen, or will we once again be advertising another country's wares? It is bad enough having Lady Diana charging around in a BMW, without providing a flying advertisement for our competitors.

The Minister's opening speech was vintage Soames—full of detail, and rightly proud of the RAF's record through history and in the past year. However, the hon. Gentleman was a little light on analysis and future vision. We need to examine the new role and priorities of the armed forces in the wake of the ending of the cold war.

[Mr. Spellar]

Is not that just what the Joint Chiefs of Staff are doing, in developing the doctrine for our component of the joint rapid reaction force?

Mr. Soames: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's kind words—and I mean that. I fully appreciate that he had to write his speech before hearing mine, but did not the hon. Gentleman listen to my points about the changes to air operations, adjustment to peacekeeping operations, creation of the permanent joint headquarters, rapid deployment force and the new range of joint and combined operations?

Mr. Spellar: Certainly I did, and rightly drew attention to the re-examination by the Joint Chiefs, particularly with regard to the joint rapid reaction force. However, a broader analysis is needed than the Minister described. We must evaluate where our troops might go, how they would get there, what they would do when they got there, the back-up that they would need, how and at what point they would come home, and the role that aircraft would play in the projection of power. We owe such an evaluation not only to our forces but to equipment manufacturers, who need a clear indication of our future intentions. The Minister may believe that he has produced such an evaluation, but that is not clear to outsiders—particularly in industry.

Dean Acheson said that Britain had lost an empire but not yet found a role. Over the past 50 years, our role has been defined by the raw realities of the cold war. We no longer face the single unified threat, but the world is still a dangerous and difficult place. We have the opportunity to redefine Britain's place in that world and the role of our armed forces.

It would be of considerable value to the country if, in arriving at that redefinition, we could maintain broad national consensus on defence policy objectives—which we had in the past under Labour and Conservative Governments. Such consensus would not stifle political conflict or debate. We will still argue about the effectiveness and competence of Ministers in implementing the policy. I am sure that next year, Conservative Members will make such criticisms of us, but less effectively.

We need consensus on broad objectives and policy outlines. That sentiment will find an echo in all parts of the House, apart from the hon. Member for Crawley, and throughout the country. That is the challenge facing us. I hope that the Minister is big enough to rise to it, and I hope that the rest of us will—because that is what the country needs and the forces require.

5.23 pm

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): The part of the speech of the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) that I liked best was his opening remarks about the Spitfire, which were appropriate on a day like today. Some of the Schneider trophy races that took place during the Spitfire's development were held in my constituency, at Calshot Point. Mitchell worked at Southampton university; Spitfire prototypes were flown from Eastleigh, which is close to my constituency; and during the war the Spitfire was made at North Baddesley, which is in my constituency. It was appropriate for the hon. Gentleman to begin his speech with references to that fine and romantic aircraft, but then he lost the thread, and my support for many of his other remarks.

I want to put on record the name of Tom Paravicini, who served on our district council with me for many years. He was a modest man and a good councillor. We knew that he had something to do with Rolls-Royce, but we were never sure what it was until we buried him the last year. From the funeral oration, we discovered that Mr. Paravicini was a leading engineer at Rolls-Royce and was given responsibility and credit for making the Merlin engine more powerful, enabling the Spitfire and Hurricane to fly 30 knots faster. We pay credit to pilots and ground crews, but we often forget the people who designed the aircraft and gave our pilots the leading edge in combat. I am glad to use this opportunity to digress from the general theme of the debate to pay tribute to that remarkable man.

I share the view of my hon. Friend the Minister and of the hon. Member for Warley, West that it is appropriate to hold this debate on 6 June, which is the anniversary of D-day. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for his opening remarks, and give him credit for being a Minister who is more enthusiastic about his Ministry and the armed forces he serves through the MOD than any other Minister of State that I have known during my time in the House.

The only unfortunate thing about the timing of the debate is that the Defence Select Committee is halfway through one of its regular inquiries into the Royal Air Force. It is a bit too early to quote any conclusions that we may reach, but we have been given plenty of indicators that are worth mentioning without risk of upstaging our report. I will concentrate on two fundamental components of any successful armed force: manning and morale.

I acknowledge that, although the RAF may be the youngest of our armed forces, during and since world war 2 it has been the key to winning battles and wars. My hon. Friend the Minister mentioned D-day. Air supremacy—I use that word rather than "superiority"—was vital to that victory. Air supremacy is often difficult to achieve, but it was achieved in the latter part of world war 2 and in the Gulf war—when it undoubtedly led to the low loss of life on the allied side. Air supremacy was not so easy to achieve in the Falklands war, which meant that it was always going to be a close-run thing. Argentina should have achieved air supremacy, but did not—largely due to the vigilance and efforts of the sentinel ships, which ensured our control of upper air space and denied the Argentines the one vital advantage that they could have possessed, being so near the Falklands.

Air power is involved much more in all aspects of the United Nations "Agenda for Peace", in both peacemaking and peacekeeping. The ability to precision-bomb military targets without harming civilians is a useful political weapon: a big stick to back up soft talk. United Nations operations may occur anywhere in the world, but often it is not until they become NATO operations that they are effective. We have seen evidence of that in the former Yugoslavia and then in Bosnia.

It is particularly good news that, at the recent NATO council meeting in Berlin, agreement was reached in principle between the United State of America and its European allies on the proposed joint task force. That must bring France closer to full NATO membership, because French forces will be included in the task force. France may also be signed up to NATO's military committee, which would be extremely welcome.

Since 1989, we have seen the advent of the so-called "new world order". The other day I spoke to people at Jane's Defence Weekly, who described the new world order as world disorder. They said that we are entering the most dangerous decade of human existence, a sentiment which I believe is shared by analysts and political scientists on every continent. Almost a decade after the Berlin wall fell, the world is still gripped by conflict, tension and mistrust. There are 17 major conflicts under way around the world, and a further 20 areas of special concern in which conflict could break out at any time.

Our armed forces still have very important roles to play, and they are currently being deployed in 33 countries worldwide. They must be mobile to meet today's requirements. That is why I am pleased that so many references have already been made to the need for heavy-lift air transports. I see in the statement on the defence estimates that, on the future of large aircraft, the Secretary of State said:

"We continue to work with partner nations and industry to establish a satisfactory basis for the United Kingdom to rejoin the European Future Large Aircraft project, to meet the requirement for the balance of the Hercules replacement programme."

In his closing remarks, I very much hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will bring us up to date on the European future large aircraft, on exactly who our partners are likely to be and on whether there will be sales to third countries.

When the hon. Member for Warley, West referred to procurement matters, he said that we must as a priority buy British. I support that in principle, but buying British need not necessarily mean buying a primarily British product. It may be better to have a share in a bigger project that will enjoy wider world sales than to buy a product that happens to be British but will not sell anywhere else in the world.

Mr. Andrew Hargreaves (Birmingham, Hall Green): As my hon. Friend and other interested colleagues know, the subject of the maritime reconnaissance aircraft replacement is currently very much on everyone's minds. I wonder how he would fit what he has just said into that framework. There are obviously a number of contenders. We perhaps have access to the Minister's ear, and decisions may soon be made. Does my hon. Friend accept that the most important matter when considering that project is that there should be the maximum amount of British involvement, that the overall lifetime cost should be a primary consideration and, obviously, that the best equipment for the job should be procured?

Mr. Colvin: I am delighted to have given my hon. Friend an opportunity to intervene to make that good constituency point; there will no doubt be headlines in his local paper this weekend.

I am not in the business of trying to prejudge the outcome of these contests because I acknowledge that, despite what my hon. Friend the Member for Hall Green said, many of the projects are collaboratory. In the case of the Nimrod proposal, Boeing is very much a partner in that exercise and may well help to sell the British Aerospace proposal to third countries. One must bear that in mind, which is why I think that the decision to replace our aging Hercules with the C130J aircraft, built by Lockheed, was the right decision.

I am particularly pleased that the 100 per cent. offsets that were provided for in that contract—the so-called "industrial participation"—are being honoured. Now that the C130J has successfully made its maiden flight, it would also be of interest to the House if the Minister would tell us how many third countries are likely to buy that aircraft and what the world sales might ultimately amount to. Bearing in mind the very large British component in that aircraft—which is ostensibly an American aircraft—the prospects for British jobs are very good. Thus, while I accept the proposition of the hon. Member for Warley, West that it is a good idea to buy British, that does not necessarily mean always buying British aircraft.

Mr. Mans: My hon. Friend mentioned the C130J. I wonder whether he is aware that Lockheed has decided to review its subcontractors for any export orders that it may obtain for that aircraft. It may well be that the British contractors that are working on the C130J for the Royal Air Force will not be those selected if other exports are produced. That should be borne in mind when a decision is taken on the project that he mentioned.

Mr. Colvin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. A certain amount of rumour is going around and there are press reports to that effect, but again the Minister must have better knowledge about this matter than we have. I have certainly been told by Lockheed that the provision for British work on that aircraft will be honoured for sales to third countries, which is why we would like to know to whom those sales will be made. Obviously every country buying the aircraft will also fight very hard for its own offsets. There must be some flexibility, but we would like to know what the C130J project will ultimately deliver in terms of British jobs.

It has never been more important to have an air force that is fully manned—recruitment is currently not bad, according to the RAF—well trained, with high morale and with the best equipment that money can buy. To my mind, leading edge technology equals the killing edge in battle.

RAF manpower has dropped from 83,000 in 1992-93 to 63,000 next year. It will descend even lower thereafter, to 56,000. On 13 March this year, which I have referred to as "brown envelope day", RAF service men and women received the news about redundancies or premature voluntary retirement. Reportedly the terms were very generous, but slightly more than 3,000 people who asked to leave under the voluntary redundancy terms were not fortunate enough to be granted it. They wanted to leave and were told no. I should like to know what will be the effect on morale of their having to go on serving and how they are regarded by their unit commanders, superior officers and warrant officers.

Morale is very important. Out of a total reduction of 8,300, there are to be 5,500 redundancies this year, of which 1,000 will be compulsory. What about the promotion prospects for those who remain? That question is often asked of the Select Committee by airmen when we visit RAF stations—as are questions on the consequences of contractorisation. When the Committee took evidence from the assistant chief of the air staff on 1 May, he said:

"over the last few years there has certainly been a dip in promotion opportunities as a result of the turbulence that we have gone through. That dip is now coming to an end and we are now returning to the historic levels of promotion opportunity across the board for airmen and officers."

The Committee has for some time taken note of the turbulence that the RAF has been through. Over the years we have been increasingly concerned about the stresses and strains experienced by service personnel and their families. Last year, in our report on the statement on the defence estimates, we said:

"The development and publication of detailed measures of turbulence in the RAF is long overdue; we will expect such measures to be available by the time of publication of SDE 96."

We now have SDE 96, but we have no reference to the RAF's objectives or targets on turbulence or tour intervals. That is a worry. The Army has managed a target, as has the Royal Navy, and I really think that the Royal Air Force should be able to do so. That would have a marked effect on morale.

I should also like to know the effect on morale of the Government's plans for the sale of married quarters, a subject mentioned by the Opposition spokesman. When the Minister of State for Defence Procurement gave evidence to the Select Committee yesterday, he was batting on a very sticky wicket but he carried his bat and carried it well and he managed to allay some of the fears expressed. I hope that he will be able to tell us today that the Treasury is not going to plunder all the proceeds.

The Minister issued to his parliamentary colleagues a letter which states:

"In defence terms, our need is to provide the services with the right housing, in the right places, at the right time."

I would also suggest that it should be at the right rent. The letter goes on to say that there are two key misapprehensions:

"Misapprehension number one. It has been suggested that recent rises in Married Quarter charges are somehow linked to the Sale—almost as though there were some 'hidden agenda' to discourage Service families from living in married quarters . . .

Misapprehension number 2. It has been suggested that the Sale will lead to the break-up of Service communities, and the introduction into Service housing 'patches' of undesirable neighbours."

I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity to allay such fears today, as he did yesterday when giving evidence to the Select Committee. That, too, would have a marked effect on the morale of our armed forces.

Germany has now taken over responsibility for the defence of German air space. Two Phantom squadrons have already been disbanded, withdrawal is planned from RAF Bruggen which is closing in the year 2002, when four Tornado GR1 squadrons are to move back to the United Kingdom. The other station, at Laarbruch, is due to close in 1999. What savings will be made as a result of those closures and of those squadrons returning to this country? A figure of £25 million has been mentioned, but is that the gross figure—simply the expenditure saved in Germany—or is it a net figure for the savings made after the provision of additional facilities for the squadrons in this country has been taken into account?

The changes will mean, for example, that 2,500 RAF staff and their families will return to the United Kingdom. Where will the squadrons be based? Will an adequate number of married quarters have been retained in close proximity to the bases to enable them to be manned at an appropriate level?

I am sorry to ask a barrage of questions, but that is what these debates are for. Are we negotiating with our German allies for the use of their airfields in the event of our participation in NATO or United Nations operations, even if Germany may not be involved in them?

Reference has already been made to the difficulties experienced with spares and the support for aircraft. The Committee has visited stations and talked to ground crews to whom the Minister has already paid proper tribute. The ground crews are working longer hours, especially on Tornados. Surely it is just as important to ensure that they do not get over-tired as it is to ensure that aircrews are not over-tired. The ground crews complain about a lack of spares and about having to rob other aircraft for spares to keep the front-line aircraft flying. Perhaps "borrow" would be a better word than "rob", but, however one describes it, it involves double labour costs—crews have to take the spare part off one aircraft, put it on another and then replace the part on the first aircraft. At some stations we heard the expression the "rolling rob" because it is a continuous process. Why is it necessary?

In spite of these and other difficulties, we still have the world's finest Air Force, which is looking forward to a period of greater stability so that it can get on with the job of defending the realm, as it did with such valour exactly 52 years ago.

5.42 pm

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I am surprised to be speaking in today's debate on the Royal Air Force, but I am pleased to do so. I have always enjoyed contributing to what is usually an interesting and informative debate. I am glad to see that the usual suspects are here, plus one or two others. It is an important debate and we should have as many contributions as possible. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) on his excellent speech. I do not wish to detain the House for long, but I have a serious constituency problem that is entirely the Government's fault, and it is my duty to bring the matter to the attention of the House.

During the 1992 general election, the Conservative candidate in my constituency claimed that a Labour Government would close RAF Carlisle, but that, if the electors voted for him and there were a Tory Government it would be kept open. Just as the Conservatives broke their tax pledge, they broke their promise about RAF Carlisle, and it is to close in March next year.

Mr. Hargreaves: The electors in Carlisle voted for you.

Mr. Martlew: Yes, but I did not decide to close RAF Carlisle; it was the Minister's decision. The blame lies not with the Labour party but with the Tories. However, as the Chief Whip has just reminded me, we must not get too excited.

The Government then undertook a sham consultation. It started in December 1993 and finished in June 1994. During that time, the trade unions suggested some very good alternative proposals that would have saved 50 per cent. of the jobs and still have provided the Ministry of Defence with the savings that it required. The Government rejected those proposals, but delayed the decision until the week after the European elections for political reasons. The Tory candidate in those elections was heavily defeated anyway, so it made no difference.

During the consultation process, several delegations went to see Ministers, who said that, if it was decided to close the base, they would help to provide alternative employment and to make the best use of the site, which is very large and in a prime area next to the motorway.

I remind the House that, in November 1994, the Select Committee on Defence said of site disposal that criteria other than the highest price should be taken into account, and the Government accepted that aspect of the Committee's report. The Government therefore accept the importance of community provision. Nevertheless, we have a major problem with RAF Carlisle.

After the decision to close the base was taken, the local authorities, although they were very angry, decided to work with the Ministry of Defence and English Partnerships to develop a scheme to market and manage the site. There was talk of creating a joint venture company. It appeared to be working and the MOD was very enthusiastic. Four major companies are interested in moving to the site.

This spring, however, a bombshell was dropped. The Government decided to pull out of the joint venture and to sell the site in one go to the private sector. This has created tremendous problems in my constituency. At the very least, it will mean serious delays in getting businesses on to the site. It will mean the loss of European money and a loss of money from English Partnerships. I have grave doubts about whether the whole of the site will be developed, because the private sector will cherry-pick, selling the good parts of the site and leaving other parts derelict. That is not a sensible way to develop the land.

I informed the Minister that I would be asking this question and I am hoping for a reply this evening. Will he reconsider the decision to market-test the site, so that we can return to the previous plan, whereby the local authorities, the Ministry of Defence and the private sector will work together to get the best deal for my constituents and to make up for some of the 800 jobs that we have lost?

As if all that was not bad enough and my constituency had not suffered enough, the Government suddenly came along with a new idea. I accept that they have problems with the culling of cows due to bovine spongiform encephalopathy, but I blame them for the BSE problem. They had originally decided to store bonemeal and the end product of the rendering of cull cows at a former RAF base, RAF Quedgeley in Gloucester, but the decision was then changed. One wonders whether it was changed because Gloucester is an extremely marginal Tory seat and the idea was not very popular with the people there.

Will the Minister confirm that, instead, hundreds of tonnes of bone meal will be sent to RAF Carlisle? He must realise that not only will there be a smell in Carlisle that we do not want, but we shall have a terrible job trying to market a site with hundreds of tonnes of stinking waste in its hangars. In his winding-up speech, will he give Carlisle some good news for a change—first, that he will reconsider his decision on market testing of the site and, secondly, that the bonemeal will not be sent to RAF Carlisle?

5.50 pm

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): I should like to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) in saying many things about the Royal Air Force, of which we are all very proud, but I shall not, with reluctance, because of the amount of time that I promised to speak. I am very grateful for catching your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so early in the debate. Although I would be very glad to follow my hon. Friend in his argument, I shall refrain from doing so, and will concentrate on two local matters that affect the RAF and are connected with the forthcoming closure of a local base.

In echoing what other hon. Members have said, I am very proud of the RAF and rightly regard it as the greatest air force in the world. It does not matter intrinsically if it is not necessarily the biggest. I am full of admiration for the way in which it has coped with its retrenchment, the inevitable reductions following the end of the cold war, and its changing role.

As I said in an intervention, I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces for keeping closely in touch with me on the forthcoming closure of RAF Stanmore Park, on which I shall concentrate my remarks. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement and the House—it is another reason for my deliberate brevity—for being unable to be present at the tail end of the debate due to constituency meetings. I shall therefore read the debate in Hansard carefully. I would not expect my hon. Friend to respond to the questions I ask if I am not present. Perhaps they can be answered later by letter and I hope that he will keep in touch, as I shall with my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces.

It is obviously very sad for us to accept that, as has been expected for many years, RAF Stanmore Park is to close. It is to close on 1 April 1997, although it will function in a residual way for at least a few months after that, with some RAF and civilian personnel carrying on working there, as it is gradually run down. The closure is sad for all sorts of reasons. The base has a 60-year history since it was created in 1936, which has been a most wonderful period. All the people who have worked there over many years—RAF personnel and civilians—are rightly proud of what has been done, but, again, I shall not go into detail. The greatest sadness is caused not only by the sentimental history of the base, although that is important, but by the loss of jobs, even though the number may seem small in comparison to what has happened in the private sector over many recent years and in other RAF facilities and installations.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces wrote to me on 23 May to confirm the most recent stage of the plans, having considered all the options and having taken option 3B. The reality, even in an area that is considered traditionally prosperous—the outer London borough of Harrow—is daunting. We have had enough job losses in all respects and do not want any more. In his letter, my hon. Friend the Minister said:

"In addition to the closure, and in keeping with the RAF's overall manpower plans, we propose to contractorise that catering function at RAF Bentley Priory and RAF Stanmore Park while it remains in use. The total number of posts assigned to RAF Stanmore Park is currently 146 Service and 62 Civilians. Of these 57 Service and 25 Civilian posts would transfer to RAF Bentley Priory, RAF Northolt and RAF Uxbridge".

Although I am glad that some of my hon. Friends will benefit from those changes, naturally I am sad that the emphasis, changeover and shift of physical and human resources will not concentrate overwhelmingly and exclusively on RAF Bentley Priory. My hon. Friend goes on to say:

"36 Service and 20 Civilian posts would be subject to contractorisation and 53 Service and 17 Civilian posts would become entirely surplus to requirements."

My hon. Friend said that RAF Stanmore Park will officially close as an independent unit, but Bentley Priory will be expanded, in a modest way, but at least creating some additional RAF and civilian jobs. New facilities are also to be built for NCOs and other ranks in respect of catering, accommodation, and so on.

I naturally welcome that. Since RAF Bentley Priory is the not only primordial base of the two bases concerned but one of the main important bases or sub-bases in the entire RAF panoply—at least in southern England, if not nationally—I welcome the fact that it is not only to be preserved but enhanced.

My hon. Friend the Minister said that a period of consultation with trade unions and other interested parties is beginning. I should very much like to keep closely in touch with him and his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence as the stages unfold. I am willing to assist in any way in the painful process to ensure that we minimise as much as possible compulsory redundancies—I hope that there are none at all—and create the most enhanced redeployment so that everybody is placed elsewhere. Indeed, I am more optimistic about that possibility than I was a year or 18 months ago.

I should be grateful for regular and intensive consultation and contact as the matter unfolds and I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for the contact so far. Even though I am unable to be present for the end of the debate, for which I apologise again, I would be grateful for anything that can be said, and shall keep in touch.

This is a good opportunity to put on record another local matter that is of great concern, even though it is proceeding out of the hands of the MOD and the RAF to other Government Departments and local agencies—mainly the Department of the Environment. I mention it in this debate because one of the principal buildings on the site concerned, Government Buildings, in London road in Stanmore, was the old RAF directorate of recruiting building, which dealt with a considerable number of personnel about five years ago and is now closing down, like all the other buildings. The site has become surplus to requirements and available for redevelopment.

Naturally, there is enormous anxiety among residents in the area about what will happen. As the Member representing their interests, who is in regular and frequent touch with them and the newly created residents association in the north-eastern corner of Stanmore, I should like to make a plea. Since the Ministry of Defence has a residual involvement and there are connections with the Department of the Environment and consultations between officials about the site, I very much hope that any redevelopment will be kept to the very minimum. It would be right to return most of the site to its original green belt designation. Since it has such a designation, there cannot be other than a marginal change of use under the regulations.

It is very important that the public agencies responsible for the disposal of the land ensure that the wishes of the local residents are the most important. It is quite legitimate, regular and important for me to request that of the relevant Government officials in this debate. If there is any development, I hope that it will be extremely marginal, only at the southern end of the area, and that the rest of the site will be returned to its original green belt usage.

There is no need for the Treasury to become over-obsessed with the apparent possibility of maximising every disposal to the detriment of local residents, who want only marginal, high-quality housing that is consonant with the existing housing provision. That would be right and proper for all concerned.

I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, once again for your indulgence in calling me early in the debate.

5.58 pm

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North–East): I begin with a proposition that I believe will enjoy support in all sections of the House—that the Royal Air Force needs a period of stability. Even the bald numbers by means of which the Minister explained the changes in Royal Air Force personnel at the beginning of the debate are themselves sufficient to justify that argument. In 1990, when "Options for Change" was first discussed—at almost exactly this time of year, if my memory serves me correctly—there were 90,000 people in the Royal Air Force. As the Minister told us, by 1999 that figure will have been reduced to 52,500.

By reason of "Options for Change", the defence costs study and other minor reviews, those in the Royal Air Force must sometimes have felt as though they were engaged in a perpetual cultural revolution—and it is a revolution that still has three years to run. The "turbulence"—the euphemism that is sometimes used to describe such change in the services—has a long time to run before we shall be able to say that it has been overcome. In that context it is reasonable to say that, to manage those changes properly, a period of stability is required.

As well as the reduction in personnel, there has been substantial restructuring of the Royal Air Force itself. There has been the merging of 11 Group and 18 Group, the moving of 1 Group headquarters to High Wycombe, and the total disbanding of 2 Group. If we considered the effect of changes of that sort on any comparable civilian organisation, we would not have to think for long before realising that they must have consequences affecting efficiency, capability and morale.

When those changes are coupled with the commitments that the Minister explained in detail—commitments to the implementation force in the former Yugoslavia, to the force keeping guard over Kurdistan and northern Iraq and to that engaged in connection with southern Iraq, plus our continuing commitment in the Falklands and other places—it is hardly surprising that this has been a period of perhaps unprecedented change for the Royal Air Force.

In such a debate it is important to recognise those difficulties, and not simply to pretend that they do not exist, or that they would not in any circumstances have serious consequences. One consequence has certainly arisen. Questions have been asked about the readiness of Tornado squadrons in particular. We are told that, on one day in September last year, only six of the 36 GR1 Tornados stationed at Bruggen were serviceable.

For many of us that raises eerie recollections reminiscent of the state of British armoured units in Germany at the time of the Gulf war, when we were able to meet our requirements in the Gulf only by substantially cannibalising the tanks and other armoured vehicles left behind in Germany. The capability of the Royal Air Force is right at the centre of the justification for its existence, so in such a debate it would be wrong not to recognise that the present situation gives rise for concern.

We know that Royal Air Force NATO inspections have been suspended during the transitional period, as have what are called tacevals—tactical evaluations of particular units. RAF Leuchars, a front-line air base in my constituency, used to be subject to regular tacevals, but they have been suspended in an attempt to reduce the burdens on Royal Air Force personnel dealing with the dramatic changes that I have already mentioned.

That is understandable, but inevitably it affects our degree of knowledge about the state of readiness of those units. If we take away regular assessment, we cannot know which areas of activity or potential activity are up to standard and which are not. That is why I say that in such a debate we should not conceal the difficulties. Difficulties can be managed properly only when they have been acknowledged.

Our natural admiration for the Royal Air Force, which has been expressed by almost every hon. Member who has spoken, and I guess will also be expressed by everyone who speaks later, should not lead us to conclude, rather after the manner of Voltaire's "Candide", that everything is for the best in the best of all possible worlds.

I remain, as I suspect does the whole House, wholly committed to Eurofighter 2000. It is vital for the Royal Air Force, and unquestionably vital for the United Kingdom aerospace industry. It is a matter of some relief to many of us that the work-share agreement now appears rather more firmly based than previously, and that the co-operation and agreement, between ourselves and Germany in particular, appears to be at a much more acceptable level than it has seemed to be on some of the more fraught occasions since 1992.

As others are, I am attracted by the idea that there may be an additional purchase for the Royal Air Force of up to 70 more Eurofighters than those for which we are presently contracted. I understand that that would mean that, by about 10 years into the next century, the fast jet fleet of the Royal Air Force would consist of the Eurofighter and the Tornado GR4. I can see economies of scale arising from that arrangement. We would not have to retain such a wide range of spares, and we would also have the advantage of specialisation. There would be a whole range of advantages for us if the fleet were configured in that way.

However, there might also be disadvantages in terms of operational capability. If the fleet consisted only of Eurofighters and Tornado GR4s, the flexibility that we presently enjoy would be prejudiced. I therefore hope that, when we think about whether to purchase a further tranche of Eurofighters and to proceed as I understand is under consideration, serious attention will be given to the effect that such a decision could have on the operational capability of the service.

The single big procurement issue of the moment is the replacement maritime patrol aircraft.

Mr. Arbuthnot: No, there are lots of issues.

Mr. Campbell: In the minds of those who are beating a path to the doors of members of the Defence Select Committee, the RMPA, and perhaps CASOM—the conventionally armed stand-off missile—and the anti-armour weapon, are the three issues of the time.

It is generally accepted that the RMPA has long been needed, and clearly the resolution of the three competing bids will take great sensitivity and require very careful and accurate decision-making. One of the difficulties is that all three bids, in different ways, have substantial United Kingdom components. In that sense, they all involve our national interest. As we have already heard, for some Members they involve acute constituency interests, which have conditioned and coloured some of the contributions that we have heard today.

When dealing with such an issue, it is relatively easy to state the principles; it is in the application of those principles that the difficulty arises. The first principle is that the Royal Air Force should get the best aircraft for the job. The second principle is that that should be done at reasonable cost, and that acquisition cost and through-life costs should both be considered. The third principle is that we should support United Kingdom industry.

Again, I doubt whether there would be much dissent from those statements of principle. It is when we come to make the decision, and to decide how much weight to attach to any one of the principles, that the difficulties arise. The same principles apply to the CASOM and the air-launched anti-armour weapon.

I do not know what other Members' experience is, but, as I have hinted already, I do not think that any projects have ever produced such intensive lobbying of those of us in the House who have an interest in defence matters. That is no reflection on the companies involved, because they have a clear and legitimate interest in trying to put their agenda before those Members.

However, if we do not have access to the information that is normally considered commercially confidential, much of that lobbying, however sincere it may be, has little significance. Unless one has access to the detailed acquisition and through-life costs of the project believed to be the most economical, how can one make a judgment? That is an advantage that the Minister enjoys—perhaps it is a burden that he carries—that is simply not available to others.

I share the reluctance of the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin), the Chairman of the Defence Select Committee, on the matter. How can those of us who do not have access to all the information make informed and intelligent judgments about decisions which, by their nature, are extremely complex? Therefore, like the hon. Gentleman, I have avoided making a commitment in any direction. Of course, I have the good fortune not to have a direct constituency interest, and that has rather assisted me to adopt this purist position.

I do have an interest, in that RAF Leuchars is based within my constituency. Two squadrons of F3 aircraft are based there, and I had the privilege of being flown in the back seat of one of those aircraft nearly 12 months ago.

[Mr. Campbell]

It was a remarkable experience that I recommend to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although the white knuckles that you find yourself subject to during the flight are likely to stay with you for some time after.

I am sorry that the Secretary of State is not here at the moment, because I wished to offer him my personal and uninhibited congratulations on the fact that he was responsible for an outbreak of common sense in the Ministry of Defence. We have now put aside what many people regarded as the wholly intolerable suggestion that we should not have the mid-life update of the F3, air-to-air missiles and avionics, and that we should embark upon what most of us thought was the improbable course of action of leasing from the United States F16 aircraft, some of which would have to be updated anyway.

In addition, these aircraft were not in any way compatible with the existing tanker capacity of the RAF. We would have appeared peculiar if, while being the landlord and leasing F3s to the Italian air force, we were simultaneously being the tenants by leasing F16s back from the United States. More seriously, that would have raised substantial doubts in the minds of many people about our commitment to the Eurofighter. I congratulate the Government and the Ministry of Defence on the entirely sensible decision, although I have the suspicion that it was more than a little influenced by the attitudes of hon. Members.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement has received so many requests to respond during his reply that it may end up being of almost marathon length—if I can say that within three or four weeks of the opening of the Olympic games. Will he tell me, however—either now or later—the precise state of the Jaguar upgrade? When will the thermal imaging and laser designator be brought into service? Will he confirm that the Hercules replacement is still on schedule? In particular, what is the position with regard to the EH101?

Some reference has been made to the married quarters estate. I do not presume for a moment to try to anticipate the conclusions that the Defence Select Committee will reach on that matter, but the Minister may feel that the questioning on it was not so much friendly fire as intensive cross-examination. I have not been persuaded that the Government's proposed scheme is appropriate.

There is some attraction in the proposition by the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar), who is no longer in the Chamber, that the Government consider selling those properties and those parts of the defence estate that are superfluous to requirements, and applying the sums raised to the rehabilitation of the existing housing stock. That would bring about the required improvement and would reduce the burden of management that the MOD bears in relation to the overall defence estate. In addition, it would have the advantage of placating those wives who have been fired up by the proposals, and who may make a formidable enemy for the MOD.

More seriously, there is no doubt that the proposals have caused a great deal of apprehension in all three services, and the Government should be slow to proceed unless they can satisfy themselves that that apprehension has, in all substantial parts, been alleviated. So far, I do not feel that the Government have reached that state of grace.

I also offer my congratulations on the decision to withdraw the RAF from Bruggen. As recently as the previous RAF debate in May last year, the Minister of State was making a most robust defence of the need to maintain RAF Bruggen because of the political and military significance of the base. Not much has changed in politics or in the military in the past 12 months, but the arguments in favour of retaining the RAF presence at Bruggen have long since been diluted. In particular, the fact that low flying is inhibited in Germany—meaning that the aircraft had to return to the United Kingdom anyway—raised substantial questions in the minds of many people about the utility of maintaining the RAF presence at Bruggen. It will be the end of a remarkable historical connection, but, in my view, it is entirely justified.

Two questions were asked by the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside on the matter. First, where will the squadrons go? That is, obviously, a matter of some concern. Secondly, from a tactical and strategic point of view, what facilities will be available to UK aircraft in Germany if the squadrons are required for operational reasons in the future? Germany is our partner in NATO and is taking an increasing responsibility within it. It also has an increasing ability to support UN operations because of the views taken by its constitutional court. There is nothing difficult about that, but it is clearly an important matter when considering the consequences of the withdrawal.

On an occasion such as this, it is right to look ahead. The issue of procurement is one about which we should have some concern, as it relates to the future of the RAF. Remarkable though it may seem—as the first Eurofighter is not due to come into service until 2000—we must now consider what will replace the Eurofighter, and we should certainly consider the replacement for the Tornado GR1, or GR4 as it is to become. The Government have signed a memorandum of understanding with the United States to participate in the JAST programme.

I have been gratified by some of the observations made by the Secretary of State, who has now joined us, about a greater recognition of the need for a coherent European defence industry. In my judgment, the European defence industry will shape and will be shaped by the procurement decisions of European air forces, particularly the RAF. I hope that the conclusion reached by the Trade and Industry and Defence Committee, to whose report reference has been made, and the greater recognition of the European component on the part of the MoD will apply when decisions are taken about which aircraft are to replace Eurofighter and which are to replace the Tornado.

The matter of capability is one for the future. In my judgment, we must try as far as we can to maintain an all-round range of capability so that the RAF is able to operate at high, medium and low levels. Some people appear to believe that if we acquire the conventionally armed stand-off missile, it will be a substitute for low-level operations. In my judgment, that is a wholly flawed analysis.

Those who believe that CASOM will bring to an end the requirement for low flying simply do not understand the purpose of the acquisition of this weapons system. It is not a substitute for our ability to press home low-level attacks, if those are necessary, but an additional capability. Its acquisition should be seen as a supplement, not a substitute. I hope that those who are so enthusiastic in their support for CASOM—justifiably, in my judgment, because we require such a weapons system—will understand that it will not mean a reduction in low flying or the capacity to press home attacks at the lowest level. If we are to maintain an all-round range of capability, we must be able to operate at high, medium and low levels.

We who legislate on such matters bear a moral obligation. On occasion, we ask the Royal Air Force to meet the worst case and to operate under the most stringent and acute conditions. We may need to deploy our forces against some of the most advanced weapons systems in the world.

If we compromise on the capability of our air force, two problems may result. We may be unable to contribute to United Nations or NATO operations at the level that we would prefer, and it may also result in casualty rates to Royal Air Force aircrew that are politically unacceptable. That is the argument for ensuring that capability is maintained at the highest level, because we cannot legitimately ask those who put their lives at stake to fly in inadequate aircraft with insufficient weapons systems and inadequate defence systems. We talk here blithely about the contribution that the Royal Air Force makes and is likely to make, but we bear a moral obligation not to ask our young men—and perhaps our young women in the future—to put themselves at risk unless we are certain that we have provided them with the best possible equipment for the job.

Contractorisation is an issue for the future, but it contains a substantial element of risk. If there were a change of Government in 12 months' time, most people probably accept that there would not be a wholesale reversal of contractorisation. The Labour party's defence team has not confirmed that and I doubt whether it will, but if we have started down the road of contractorisation, the likelihood of a reversal is remote. The question that cannot be answered until an emergency arises is whether the private sector will be able to respond rapidly. That question may be unanswerable now, but we are entitled to be determined to ensure that when contractorisation becomes part of the support for the Royal Air Force, it is at the highest level available.

Those companies that are now under contract to provide many of the services previously performed in house—especially engineering—are currently using the skills of fast-jet mechanics, most of whom are former Royal Air Force personnel. That is fine, reasonable and a piece of good fortune for those companies, but those skills will degrade over time. The quality of training provided by the Royal Air Force will no longer be available.

We must ensure that the most stringent standards are written into the contractual arrangements between the Ministry of Defence and those who become contractors. The hon. Member for Warley, West suggested apprenticeships and there may be other ways to impose those standards, but we are entitled to insist that the terms of private contracts are sufficiently rigorous to give us the same standard of performance as we might have expected if the operations were carried out in house.

I have little doubt that the future of the Royal Air Force is most likely to be assured by increased European defence co-operation, although that opinion may be unpopular with some—not all—Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside, the Chairman of the Defence Select Committee, referred to the return this week of the prodigal France into the bosom of the family and the recognition by the United States that combined joint task forces should be more than a concept and capable of implementation. Those decisions make it clear that there will be continuing pressure to recognise that the effectiveness of defence in Europe is best achieved on a combined and joint basis.

The Minister's opening speech referred to the Franco-British air group as an important example of the open-mindedness of the Ministry of Defence, and the Royal Air Force in particular, in such matters. I understood the Minister to say that the expansion of that group to other members of the WEU was being considered. That is the direction for defence policy, and the Royal Air Force will have an important and significant role to play in the evolution of concepts of defence that recognise far greater co-operation in Europe.

Political and economic considerations will have an equal influence on the degree of co-operation. At best, Europe will have stable defence budgets for the foreseeable future. In reality, defence budgets will probably continue to reduce by a percentage point here or by £500,000 there. I would not wish to lay serious money on the likelihood that defence budgets will increase materially in the next five years. That being so, common procurement, greater integration, interoperability and even force specialisation will become more important in the future.

I have an interest in the Royal Air Force in three separate capacities. I am the spokesman for my party on defence and I am a member of the Defence Select Committee under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside. He is no longer in his place, but he is a most vigorous and skilful Chairman who provides great leadership. As I have mentioned, I also have a constituency interest in RAF Leuchars. That front-line air base now alone provides the quick-reaction alert against intrusion into United Kingdom air space over the North sea. In all three capacities, I have the good fortune and the honour to view the Royal Air Force. As I do that, I am convinced that the men and women of today are a credit to the heritage of the Royal Air Force to which the Minister referred earlier. They continue to display the commitment, dedication and professionalism that has characterised the Royal Air Force for so many years. I am confident that, with the support of the House, they will continue to do so for a long time.

Sir John Cope (Northavon): I agree that the Royal Air Force serves this country exceptionally well, and my hon. Friend the Minister of State made that point effectively at the start of the debate. That was also apparent at the excellent recent presentation to Members of both Houses by the Royal Air Force presentation team and some senior officers.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) began by calling for stability for the Royal Air Force, and the Government have committed themselves to stability in defence organisation and spending. From the point of view of the Royal Air Force, the hon. and learned Gentleman must hope for continuity of Conservative government in the next few years. That is the only result that could guarantee the continuity of defence spending, as set out in the White Paper and elsewhere.

[Sir John Cope]

My concern arises from my constituency interest and involves the defence industrial base. I shall follow on from and, to a certain extent, agree with some of the remarks made by the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar). Towards the end of a somewhat thin speech, the hon. Gentleman complimented the report of the Select Committee, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) when he was at the Ministry of Defence, on the emphasis that they placed on the importance to this country of the defence industrial base.

The view has occasionally been expressed in some quarters of the Ministry of Defence that the health of the companies involved is a matter for the Department of Trade and Industry, not the MOD, which should look for the best equipment for the forces at the best prices and allow companies' health to be the responsibility of others in government. But that is a narrow view. It is certainly in the national interest that the great defence companies of this country, both large and small—many small businesses are involved in defence—should continue to contribute a great deal to this nation.

It is said that 395,000 jobs in the United Kingdom are supported by defence goods and services, of which about 80,000 are dependent on exports. There are more people in the defence industries than there are in the armed forces—there are about 215,000 people in the armed forces in total. That should not surprise us, as 39 per cent. of the defence budget is spent on equipment and 29 per cent. on service personnel. Those percentages back up the relative importance of the defence industrial base.

For those companies to flourish, it is essential for the Ministry of Defence to take account of the direct and indirect effects of its massive purchasing decisions on British companies. I would not express it quite as crudely as the hon. Member for Warley, West did by saying that we should always buy British or always try to. It is more complicated than that, as the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East made clear.

The maintenance of the industrial base is not only in the interests of the companies and industries involved, but in the interests of our defence. We are not asking the RAF or anyone else in the armed forces to accept lower standards of equipment or safety. The equipment produced by British companies is of as high a standard as any in the world, but we also know that we can rely on our companies.

During the Gulf war, it was interesting to note how many civilian personnel went out to help back up the armed forces in the field. We have not always been able to rely on defence equipment bought from other countries—a serious incident involving ammunition occurred in the middle of the Falklands war. The more general point is that, unless British industry—both the defence sectors and other sectors—prospers, we shall be unable to afford the defence that we should have and that we wish to have. The health of industry in general provides important underpinning for this country's defence.

I know that some people, particularly some Opposition Members, are embarrassed that our export effort and employment depend to such a large degree on the building of defence equipment. That has led people to think up the ridiculous idea of a defence industry diversification agency. The idea that a Government agency should help defence companies turn over to civilian production does not bear examination, and I am glad that the idea has not been repeated this afternoon. I have lost track of where the idea has got to within the hierarchy of defence thinking among Labour Members—perhaps I am about to find out.

Mr. Frank Cook: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to comment on his last assertion. The assumption that Labour Members are opposed to export sales of arms per se is misleading. Labour Members oppose the export of arms to regimes that will use them for suppression and repression—that is the point.

Sir John Cope: There are two separate arguments—I accept what the hon. Gentleman said. Of course, we can disagree about the particular regimes in question and the particular sales that are made, or are likely to be made, to them. However, some Opposition Members—I acquit the hon. Gentleman of this charge—seem less keen for us to be in the defence production business at all. That must be true; otherwise, what would be the point of a defence industry diversification agency?

The idea that some such agency could tell British Aerospace in my constituency or Rolls-Royce, which also affects my constituency, how the defence sections of their business could be switched over to peaceful activity is ridiculous. British Aerospace is already among the world's leading suppliers of airliners—particularly through its European connections and the airbus. Rolls-Royce is one of the world's leading aero-engine suppliers to both civilian and military aircraft. The idea that an agency could tell those businesses how to sell more civilian aircraft or aero-engines is ridiculous.

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen): I shall have the pleasure and honour of visiting Rolls-Royce in Bristol next Monday. The last thing I shall be telling it is to diversify in the way that the right hon. Gentleman suggested. I am sure that he would agree that defence diversification in this country and others does not involve telling industry what to do. Because of the way in which the world has changed in the past few years, industry is looking for other ways to develop its skills and potential—there is nothing wrong with that.

Sir John Cope: I am all for that. I am happy that the two companies that I mentioned, and many others, are extremely active in civilian as well as military markets. The idea on which I was pouring cold water was that a Government agency could push them from the one to the other.

I shall return to the main points that I wish to make in support of the defence industrial base. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces will have to give close attention to the three forthcoming purchases for which bids have been submitted. It is important to consider the British content of those bids not only in terms of quantity, but in terms of quality.

The bids are made to look as British as possible: all the literature that has poured in to us recently has been covered in Union Jacks and has contained great lists of subcontractors in every possible constituency. All those bidding do their best to demonstrate that they are the most British. But what matters is the quality of the contribution, not merely the quantity or percentage of the contribution.

Therefore, although I entirely accept the difficulty that Back Benchers face when judging competing bids objectively, I think that British Aerospace makes an exceedingly good point when it draws attention to its prime contractorship in the three bids in which it is principally involved—the maritime patrol aircraft, the stand-off missile and the air-launched anti-armour missile. In all cases, it is necessary to look extremely carefully at the quality of the contributions in the bids of all the companies when deciding between them—I appreciate that it is always an extremely difficult choice.

The decision by my hon. Friend the Minister of State and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have great significance for the future of those sections of British industry and for potential exports. They should give the closest possible attention to that aspect of the purchasing decision.

I agree with some of what the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East, who sits on the Liberal Benches, seemed to say at the end of his remarks about Europe. In looking at the three purchasing decisions, I believe that there is sometimes a danger in becoming too involved with the American, as opposed to the European, contractors. The base from which the American contractors operate is massive. It is backed by massive Government research—the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, and in other ways—and, of course, it has the benefit of a huge home market.

Mr. Wilkinson: Could not the converse equally be true? Participation in American programmes, for the benefit of our armed forces, to meet a British need, gives British industry an incomparable opportunity to maximise its participation over large production runs, especially in the export markets, to meet American requirements. Dowty in Cheltenham is building the propellers for the C130J, and there is a huge benefit. The same could apply if that propeller was chosen for the Orion 2000.

Sir John Cope: I do not argue that it is wrong in every case or that there are no advantages in co-operating with the Americans, but the fact is that the United States is extremely reluctant to export any of its technology. One is not dealing with an equal partner when one takes on a partnership with the United States; whereas one tends to deal more with equal partners in the deals that are put together in Europe.

Mr. Bill Walker: My right hon. Friend should remember, when speaking on behalf of British Aerospace, that the collaboration and co-operation on the present generation of modern Harrier aircraft is an example of American and United Kingdom co-operation.

Sir John Cope: Of course, and that is one of the reasons why the AV8B has been extremely important to my constituency, among other things. That is one of the reasons why I am not putting it in absolute terms. Nevertheless, I still believe that we should look to increase European co-operation when we can.

Part of the reason why we joined the European Community in the first place was to increase the size of our home market as the base from which to do business with the rest of the world. We sometimes forget that nowadays, when looking at the statistics of trade within Europe. I do not and would not suggest that the European Union is the base from which we should do business in relation to defence. Clearly, the Western European Union is the right body from that point of view. The EU contains some countries that are neutral—why should they not be neutral if they so wish?—and that makes it a different organisation.

One of the areas of least co-operation in the WEU and the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation is in deciding the specification for defence products. Now that there is new vigour in achieving WEU co-operation, more attention should be given to trying to agree the specifications for defence products. Again, that is not a universal point—before any of my hon. Friends intervenes again. I recognise that the Eurofighter is an example of specific agreement on the specification, and the future large aircraft is another, to a degree, but such examples are relatively limited. I gather that our requirements and those of the French on the stand-off missile are similar, but they are not the same at this point. The two Governments and Air Forces are trying to combine, as was done in the case of Eurofighter, where a limited number of countries worked together.

My general point is that companies work right across Europe—

Mr. Wilkinson: The world.

Sir John Cope: And the world. They need to do so. The Governments and air forces are showing that they need to get their specifications closer together, as much as they possibly can. More attention should be given to that aspect of future planning for defence procurement.

6.45 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): The right hon. Member for Northavon (Sir J. Cope) criticised the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), the Liberal Democrat defence spokesman, for having made a fairly thin speech. I think that those were the words. [Interruption.] I accept the correction, but I take issue with the comment anyway, because if one measures one performance against the other, frankly there is no competition.

Our pattern of debates on defence issues must be renewed and reconsidered. We currently have a one-day debate each year on each of the three services, followed by a two-day thrash on the defence estimates. We do not get to grips with it. The Minister of State for the Armed Forces has, on more than one occasion this evening, both in his speech and in interventions, stressed the importance of the joint command, joint training and the joint control centre. As we are moving into a joint force activity, especially with the combined joint task force, we should debate defence issues in a less compartmentalised way.

I appeal to both Front Benches to get together, please, and review the approach for next year, because if they do not, they will have to the year after, as that is the way in which we are going, and it makes sense to look at it in that way.

[Mr. Frank Cook]

We have heard much about EFA, CASOMs and SWAARMs—all the acronyms that we are pleased—

Mr. Arbuthnot: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cook: By all means.

Mr. Arbuthnot: I am sorry to interrupt what will clearly be an interesting speech, but the problem with having a day to debate procurement and then, perhaps, an extra day to debate the armed forces, is that we would lose a day's debate on the armed services. I do not think that anybody would wish to see that.

Mr. Cook: I am asking for a review. I do not want the Minister to have to find the answer this evening. Let us just talk about it through the usual channels before next time. If both Front Benches do not review it next time, they will have to do it the time after that. That is my point.

Let us return to the acrimonious acronyms. I heard a complaint from the Liberal Democrat spokesman, who said, "I don't know how long I'm going to be, as I have to cover so many subjects." I think that that is a fault, and I shall not fall into that trap. I want to talk about just one topic in essence, with a small conclusion later.

I shall concentrate on sustainability because I have seen press reports that have said that it is one of the main anxieties of Sir Peter Inge, the Chief of the Defence Staff. I was puzzled by that, so when I attended the plenary session of the North Atlantic Assembly in Athens a couple of weeks ago, I took the opportunity to nobble—I do not know whether it is spelt with a k—Sir Peter at an evening reception at the ambassador's residence, to ask him what he meant.

Sir Peter was very helpful and he said that he thought that our draw-down was at about the right level, that he was satisfied with manning levels and with the equipment that was available, and that we had it about right for now. He said that he was worried about sustainability. I asked him what he meant, and he referred to the number of personnel that we currently have in Northern Ireland—and we intend to maintain that number until we get some sort of a guarantee of a lasting improvement in that awkward climate.

We also talked about our commitments elsewhere in the world. Sir Peter is proud of the fact that 12,000 United Kingdom military personnel are taking part in exercises in the United States. We apparently knocked America for six because they did not think that we were capable of providing a force of that size. That is good—as long as we stay where we are.

The Defence Select Committee recently released a report on what we call overstretch in the military. We heard a considerable amount of evidence, and two days before we published the report, we got the famous add-back. It seems that, even at this stage, add-back is proving hardly sufficient. When we visit units, we get reports not just from rankers, but from senior NCOs and the commissioned ranks, that personnel are being pushed to the limit.

Some weeks ago, we visited a type 23—HMS Lancaster in the Irish sea—and we were told by the senior warrant officers, by commissioned ranks and by the stokers that working 17 hours a day, seven days a week, even on a home base, was a regular thing. While there was decent morale in terms of esprit de corps and confidence in one's workmate—one's marra—there was considerable dissatisfaction on the home front because it was thought to be unnecessary in those situations.

I was further disturbed when I visited RAF Marham—similar criticisms were commonplace. That is not the result of a lack of morale or a lack of commitment; the individuals, in all three forces, give their best—more than their best—at all times. How long can we expect that to be sustained? Today we are talking about the Royal Air Force, so I shall keep my comments specific to it. I have mentioned RAF Marham, where we found criticisms about duty hours, guards and the like.

I refer to the Charlie 130s—the famous Hercules that are operating in the Falkland Islands—which are used for refuelling purposes. Some people have said that the Charlie 130s are the result of lash-ups that were designed on the back of a fag packet. They are somewhat Heath Robinson in appearance, they are single-skinned, they have unarmoured flexi-pipes and they are a serious source of risk. They need to be replaced, as they have been working there for an awful long time. I remind hon. Members that the subject of my speech is sustainability. They are sustaining themselves at the moment—but how long can we expect them to do so?

Our visit to Yeovilton allowed us to learn from squadrons 800 and 801, which had been flying Harriers on a six-month-on, six-month-off, basis with the Invincible and the Illustrious in the Adriatic. There was an admission that there were degrees of jading, if not with the aircrews, certainly with the aircraft. We have heard comments from the Chairman of the Defence Committee, the hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin), about rolling robbing in the RAF. How long can we allow it to go on?

Most embarrassing of all was when the Defence Select Committee visited Bosnia—I can see smiles on the faces of Government Members; in a way it was humorous, but it could have been somewhat less humorous. We relied on the famous Chinooks, which had undergone their mid-life update. The commanding officer was proud of them, to the point that he said that they were infinitely better than anything that could be produced from the EH101 as a replacement.

We got into the first Chinook and flew about 15 miles before we had to return to transfer to another Chinook. It got us about the country for the next day and a half until, when we sought to depart from the American garrison at Tuzla, it refused even to cough into action. We were rescued by the United States cavalry in the shape of two Black Hawks, and we got back to Split for our connection a great deal faster than we would have done in the Chinook.

The point I am making is simple: how long can we expect equipment and people who are under pressure to carry on? There is not a lack of commitment on the part of those who maintain the equipment, there is not a lack of courage on the part of those who operate it and there is not a lack of dedication. I refer to the case of Corporal Wayne Mills—the first recipient of the conspicuous gallantry medal. He won the medal in Gorazde some time ago, for behaving in a particularly exemplary way in protecting his section of eight men when they encountered a numerically superior force of Serbs who were somewhat undisciplined and probably inebriate.

Wayne Mills defended his lads by telling them to leg it for safety and creating a one-man ambush. Wayne Mills, in characteristic British understatement—note that I said British—said that the whole thing was more to do with breathlessness than with bravery. In other words, the lad probably could not have run any further, but he still had the guts to create a one-man ambush out of his own ability.

I am talking about sustainability. They will turn it on in all three forces. Why? Because they take pride in the fact that all three forces are can-do forces, because we, as politicians, send them out to do a job, because that is why they joined the forces and because that is what they are paid to do. It is our responsibility to ensure that, when we send them out to do the job, they have the wherewithal with which to do it. It is as easy as that. A few Government Members are smirking. I am not telling them what I think; I am telling them what Sir Peter Inge, the Chief of the Defence Staff, is anxious about. If he is worried about it, by God, we should be worried about it, too.

Let us not plead breathlessness at a late stage. Corporal Mills did not plead breathlessness. He was a very brave man; they were all brave in that unit, regardless of whether they received awards. I say that with pride, because my son was with them and received a commendation.

Lastly, I wish to discuss the suggested sale of married quarters. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East described the reaction to the suggestion in the services as apprehension. That is the wrong word. I tell the Minister of State for Defence Procurement: the right word is anger—downright anger; anger at lack of consultation, anger at an unheeding response, anger at the risk to which those people feel they will be put.

I add my support to the idea that the current voids should be put on the open market. I believe that 10,000 or 11,000 voids would be snapped up at £10,000 apiece. I add another suggestion. Many local authorities have written to the Government, pleading for the move to be stopped because they want the opportunity to take those properties into their housing stock. If those local authorities were allowed to put to use some of the assets that have accrued as a result of the sale of council housing, the MOD's problem could be resolved a great deal more rapidly than it previously supposed.

If that cannot be the case, I say to the Minister, "Take your current idea of selling married quarters on the open market and dump it; forget it altogether."

7.1 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip–Northwood): I shall begin with a comment and follow it up briefly with a quotation. In comments attributed to Field-Marshal Earl Haig after the first world war, he said that, looking back on that horrendous conflict, to him two things were of importance—barbed wire and Trenchard. Barbed wire we can all understand—there are memorials to it throughout the length and breadth of Picardy, Flanders and the Gallipoli peninsula—but Trenchard? We are debating his memorial tonight. He was of course the commander of the first independent air force in 1918.

Earl Haig, being unable to carry the war to Germany itself, had alongside him in the headquarters at Nancy, further down the front, in Trenchard, the architect of independent air power and, night after night in the concluding months and weeks of the war, the independent air force struck into Germany—Mannheim, Stuttgart, the Ruhr and so on.

Trenchard came to be Chief of Air Staff and, when the great demobilisation began after the great war, he found himself trying to keep the air force in being. He wrote a memorandum to the then Secretary of State for Air—and War, actually—Sir Winston Churchill, the grandfather of my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces. I regret that my hon. Friend is not here. Sir Winston presented the memorandum to the House in the form of a White Paper on 11 December 1919. It said:

"The force may in fact be compared to the prophet Jonah's gourd. The necessities of war created it in a night, but the economics of peace have to a large extent caused it to wither in a day, and we are now faced with the necessity of replacing it with a plant of deeper root.

As in nature, however, decay fosters growth, and the new plant has a fruitful soil in which to spring."

We have the economics of peace with a vengeance today, and the Royal Air Force has gone through the turmoil of readjustment, not least many families whose breadwinner probably aspired to a lifelong career of service in the Royal Air Force and found himself prematurely not wanted; but now we have an opportunity to nurture the service and to create the political environment to establish a Royal Air Force that will endure as an effective fighting service at least into the first two decades of the next century.

The withdrawal of the RAF from Germany was the culmination of a period of contraction. Many of us had urged that withdrawal long years heretofore, saying that the characteristics of air power did not necessitate a presence of the Royal Air Force, once the Warsaw pact was disbanded, on the soil of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Now, as an island country, we are in a position to create in our Air Force a powerful instrument to preserve peace in a very uncertain world. The Air Force has all the attributes that are requisite for the purpose—speed of intervention, flexibility, economy of force, the potential for a minimum risk of casualties, and minimum collateral damage as a result of the application of precision munitions.

Let us first consider what Trenchard regarded as most important—the men and women of the service. What will they most require, now and tomorrow? Above all, I would say discipline—discipline, and again discipline, and yet again discipline. Nothing is more fundamental for a fighting service. Therefore, the whole training programme, the development of commissioned and non-commissioned personnel throughout their service career, should re-emphasise that cardinal point.

The profession of arms calls for unnatural qualities of sacrifice and dedication, so the inculcation of qualities of character and devotion from the earliest years is crucial. That is why Trenchard founded Royal Air Force college Cranwell and the apprentice school at Halton, among other things, and they stood the service well and proved themselves in war and peace, and enabled the service to endure and to be one of which we are justly proud.

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

With discipline must come education and training, both technical and physical; that is why I query what I would call the blazer and flannels ethos in the flying training schools. The Assistant Chief of Air Staff, in the session with the Select Committee on Defence, rightly said that it was his hope that a high proportion of qualified flying instructors would be reservists and therefore able to wear uniform.

I endorse him wholeheartedly. I think they all should be, and the great opportunity of the sponsored reserve category which we have created with our Reserve Forces Bill is that it enables contractorisation to be compatible with the exigencies of military service, with the requirement to serve anywhere at any time at the behest of the Crown in the defence of the realm.

I mentioned the blazer and flannels ethos with regard to the air crew, but it applies equally to the ground crew. My hon. Friend the Minister of State mentioned what is happening at RAF Valley. It comprises an advanced flying training school and a tactical weapons unit, which is supposedly a reserve squadron that can be mobilised rapidly in times of emergency or war.

If the Brown and Root and Marshall personnel are sent from Anglesey overseas at short notice into an inhospitable theatre, unless they are auxiliaries and have signed the Air Force Act 1955, I suppose that they could refuse to go. That could cause complications. It is why I urge Her Majesty's Government to make full use of the sponsored reserve's potential in that way.

We must achieve a balance between the Regulars and the reservists. The problem in recent years is that the balance has favoured the Regulars, and the potential of the reservists has never been adequately realised. I hope that this situation will be put right. The signs are good in that regard. For example, the No.1 maritime headquarters unit at RAF Northolt in my constituency does a first-class job supporting the naval headquarters at Northwood and the 11/18 group RAF headquarters at Bentley Priory. The support helicopter squadron at Benson is a precursor of things to come.

I recall another Trenchardism. In response to his suggestion about establishing the Royal Auxiliary Air Force, Churchill replied, "Weekend squadrons, Boom? Never." Of course, those weekend squadrons were formed, and they achieved a third of the victories in the battle of Britain. That battle could not have been won without them, any more than it could have been won without the Poles, whose memorial stands at the threshold of my constituency. Their No. 303 squadron, which operated out of RAF Northolt in my constituency, shot down more enemy aircraft in the battle than any other squadron, even though it was not officially operational when it plunged into the fray.

When considering the force structure in personnel terms, we must address also the equipment issue. I am pleased that the "Front Line First" exercise has enabled the Government to find extra money for equipment. If the Air Force is small in size, it must be equipped to the very highest standard. I am thrilled that the C130J has been introduced into service. The companies which are participating in the programme will benefit from the operational and industrial potential that it presents.

As to the future transport force, it will need a strategic lifter. If we operate primarily from this island—we will have no overseas commands or groups, and few overseas bases—and if we are to project power, we will need an aircraft that can carry a large volume. That is why I advocate the C17 as a complement to the C130Js in the next century. There must be a mix of those aircraft.

As an island nation, we must concentrate on our maritime role. It is pointless looking to aircraft that are near the end of their useful lives or to hand-me-downs out of the desert: we must buy new aeroplanes that offer the very best in technology, good industrial participation for the United Kingdom and export potential for companies involved in the programme well into the next century, as well as a commonality with other allied air forces and navies that operate the P3.

The argument is fairly straightforward. I recall the VC10 tanker conversion programme. The refurbishment of those aircraft proved extremely costly, and there were hideous problems. With hindsight, it was probably not a very wise decision. Let us not make the same mistake again.

I make no comment about the weaponry—the AST1236 and 1238 or the advanced stand-off radar—except to say that the Royal Air Force must always be ready to buy the best equipment from any source. We must not have political preconceptions. We must not allow our participation in the European Armaments Agency or any other rationale to lead us to buy equipment that does not best meet the RAF's needs. Cost-effectiveness must be the criterion.

For example, the lesson to be learned from the European fighter aircraft 2000 is not that it will not meet the requirements—it probably will—but that an agency and superfluity of management, with a capital "M", is not what is required, as much as a commercial orientation to drive the programme forward, maximise profits for the participants and lead to the aircraft's early entry into service for the RAF.

In conclusion, I shall raise a subject to which my hon. Friend the Minister of State alluded in his speech. The sole No. 11 Group sector station of the battle of Britain—RAF Northolt—is situated in my constituency. It was founded as a Royal Flying Corps station in 1915, so it must be almost the oldest station in the country. The Transport Committee has suggested that it should no longer be a Royal Air Force station, but should become a civil satellite airport—Heathrow north, no less. It is proposed that the Royal Air Force be allowed to make requests from time to time regarding military movements.

The Royal Squadron No. 32 meets the communications flying requirements for the royal family and Her Majesty's Ministers, as well as for the permanent joint headquarters at Northwood, headquarters fleet at Northwood, the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation 1 East Atlantic headquarters at Northwood, Royal Air Force headquarters at Bentley Priory at Stanmore, the No. 11/18 group, the headquarters of RAF Strike Command at High Wycombe, the new NATO Command North-West Europe, which is also at High Wycombe, and diplomatic, and for highly sensitive Government movements of all sorts. To fulfil those roles—which are crucial in times of peace, emergency and war—a discrete dedicated facility is required. That role would not be compatible with reverting RAF Northolt to the status of a civil airport, which it became very briefly following world war 2.

Residential development around Northolt has increased enormously since those early post-war years, and the Royal Air Force and the civil community enjoy a very satisfactory relationship. The civil executive jet fraternity are allowed to use the airport for a maximum of 28 movements a day with prior permission, five days a week from 08.00 to 20.00 hours. That is perfectly acceptable. If it were turned into a civil airport, it would prejudice one of the Royal Air Force's key roles, and I hope that it will not happen.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I shall follow up several points raised by the hon. Member for Ruislip, Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). First, I was particularly interested in his comments about training. I recall suggesting in debate two or three years ago that elementary flying training within the service was not simply about teaching people how to fly: it was about teaching people to fly into very hostile environments. The traditions, record and indoctrination that are necessary parts of military training confirm the hon. Gentleman's argument.

As to the reserve service, I hope that civilian instructors—who may not have received the same training as the hon. Gentleman and one or two other Conservative Members—will not become reservists as an excuse for administrative convenience.

The hon. Gentleman rightly paid tribute to the Auxiliary Air Force. He will also acknowledge that the sergeant pilots of the Volunteer Reserve made what was perhaps a greater contribution in Fighter Command during the second world war.

I wish, however, that he had continued his historical analysis. There were those who would have threatened the independence of the Royal Air Force, but Trenchard convinced them that the RAF could police the empire very cheaply, and that it would be cheaper to have a few squadrons of biplanes patrolling Kurdistan or the Himalayan areas of the Indian subcontinent than to have large numbers of infantry—whether British or imperial troops—stationed there.

Without that, it is unlikely that the Air Force would have survived the economic crises of the 1920s and 1930s. However, it did, and, as the hon. Gentleman said, we now have the oldest independent air force in the world. It is one of enormously high quality, to which the rest of the world looks with admiration. Is standing is probably higher abroad than it is in England. One reason for that was that, until the Minister's speech this afternoon, Government tributes to the Air Force over recent years have been somewhat grudging.

Although the debate so far has been forward-looking, we have all referred to the mistake that was made five or six years ago at the end of the cold war. All Governments in the west, including ours, reached out to grab the peace dividend because they thought that it meant there would be peace. Certainly, once the iron curtain had fallen and the Warsaw pact had disintegrated, there was no prospect of huge armies surging across the north German plain, the response to which was the Royal Air Force's principal obligation for most of the post-war period.

However, the end of the cold war and the grasping of the peace dividend was followed by an extremely large number of new commitments that presented new problems, anxieties and costs that may not have been anticipated. Ten years ago, the Royal Air Force had far fewer commitments than those to which a response has been given in the past 12 months.

The RAF has been operating in more locations during the past 12 months than it did at the height of the cold war. The Minister said that they were low-key commitments, and perhaps they were. They may also have been a great deal less comfortable and hospitable than those to which the service was accustomed during the cold war. Shrinking numbers of aircraft, squadrons and personnel have had to bear an increased burden.

It is all very well for the Minister to pay tribute to the RAF, and I welcome that, but the fact remains that the air crew, and the ground engineers and communication people who travel with them, spend an inordinate amount of time away from base and their wives and families. Recently, I saw a squadron diary showing how many weeks in the year the pilots, engineers and communication personnel spent away from base. It is not fair.

It is all very well to pay tribute to them for their dedication, but they pay a bitter price. It may be that the price they have paid is the reason why a substantial proportion of quite senior officers find it necessary to leave. The Air Force has lost some excellent people in the past few years, and we should ask why.

We are asking too much—not of them, as they are professionals, but of their families. They tend to be family men. The public image of an RAF pilot is a fresh-faced 19-year-old, but he is probably in his 30s, married with 2.1 children, and he likes to see his wife and children occasionally. More importantly, they want to see him. I trust that we will see a more positive and healthy approach from the Government.

Over the past few years, the Government have taken the lead in Europe's response to crisis. Perhaps they feel that, as a member of United Nations Security Council, we have to take the lead in accepting obligations and commitments although other wealthier members of the western alliance in Europe have been slow to offer a meaningful response. Perhaps they are incapable of offering one. If we are to accept those commitments, we have to speak a little more bluntly to some of our European colleagues about fair deals.

The hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood has joined us on the delegation to the Council of Europe and the Western European Union. He may recall the meeting at Church house a few months ago when we were discussing the future organisation of security in Europe. A number of delegations from other countries—left, right and centre politically—spoke about the need for adequate logistics, training and police and medical staff. I moved an amendment stating that, if they planned to discuss proper commitments and undertakings, they would have to have people capable of firing guns and serving at the sharp end of conflict. The amendment was defeated.

Our allies are quite happy for Britain to provide a large proportion of the troops currently serving in Bosnia. The hon. Gentleman may recall that, in April, when we were in Strasbourg, it was proposed that the IFOR troops should remain in Bosnia a great deal longer. I was asked to move a amendment to that effect, but the people who asked me to do so represented countries that had no personnel there.

[Mr. Peter Hardy]

I asked why I should expect my constituents to serve in Bosnia and expect Britain to provide a quarter of NATO troops, when they were not sending anyone at all. "We are behind you," they said. "Yes, I have noticed that," I replied, "and I shall not move the amendment." I did not do so. However, we may have to accept there will be an extension. That will give the British Government an opportunity to speak bluntly, but unfortunately they are not doing so.

On Monday, the Secretary of State for Defence addressed the WEU assembly in Paris. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis), who has replaced me as leader of the Labour delegation because I retire at the next election, has persistently followed up the argument that I had been advancing for some years—along with hon. Members on both sides of the House—about breaches of sanctions in the former Yugoslavia.

About four years ago, the Italian Minister told a Conservative Member and me that the Council of Ministers had all the information about breaches of sanctions, but would not tells us, or do anything about them. My hon. Friend the Member for Hodge Hill has taken over that initiative, but we still have not learnt anything more. He raised the matter with the Secretary of State for Defence, who unfortunately is not here, but no doubt will hear about it later.

When he was asked why the Foreign Office or the Ministry of Defence had not replied to my hon. Friend's persistent pursuit of the matter, the Secretary of State's response in Paris was to blame the nationalised British Post Office. That is hardly the mature comment that one would have expected from him in such an environment.

I also endorse the point raised by the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood about the future equipment of the service being of the highest quality. We give our service men inordinately heavy tasks, and we ask a great deal of them. It is essential that they have the proper equipment. Much of the equipment is British or part-British, and it is superb, but the Air Force should not be seen merely as a customer.

If it is to be a customer, however, privatisation should not be taken so far that the Air Force lacks the capacity to be an intelligence customer. Last year, I asked the Minister to ensure that the Air Force retained sufficient capacity in its operations to be able to judge whether the taxpayer was getting a good bargain and to perceive whether the contractor was providing adequately for training—an important matter, to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

I have a number of questions. I do not want to speak too long, but may I ask the Minister, in his reply to the debate, not to overlook the future large aircraft. I went to a briefing across the road attended by other hon. Members, where the French advised us that it was our duty to buy the FLA. The committee of the WEU on which I serve went to Toulouse, where we were given a programme and a timetable for the development of the FLA. I made the following remark: "Your timetable shows the FLA entering Royal Air Force squadron service 18 months before it has its maiden flight." Their response was, "We do a great deal by simulators nowadays."

The fact remains that we were properly committed to replacing, as was necessary, at the earliest possible stage, the older Hercules with the C130J. I spoke strongly in favour of that partial replacement, but the Government hit on what seemed a satisfactory compromise by replacing the older Hercules with the FLA.

Where, however, are we going now? Chirac seems likely to cancel the FLA. If we had done what the French had wanted, we would not have the C130Js, but would be waiting for the FLAs, which, even if they did replace the Hercules squadrons at Lyneham, would not do so for another 10 years. Meanwhile, the Hercules, which entered squadron service in 1964, bringing Britain back from its east of Suez policy, would have continued to serve long after it had reached its sell-by date.

I hope that the FLA will fly and that the Royal Air Force will be able to use it, but, even if it does, what will the Minister do about adequate heavy-lift capacity? What is going to lift the helicopters and all their appurtenances, which will be required in future regions of conflict in Africa, Europe, Montserrat or wherever the Minister may guess they might be? The Air Force will have to have such capacity. Europe may not be able to provide it, but it can provide the replacement air-to-air refuelling aircraft. There is no reason why the airbus could not be reasonably and economically converted to serve that purpose to replace the tankers currently in use by the air force.

I give this advice to the Minister. A year or so ago, I conducted—imperfectly, because, for one reason, of delays in some member states' response—an analysis of the capabilities of western European air forces. I found, for example, that the vast majority of western European air forces had no experience or ability in air-to-air refuelling, a singular omission; that many air forces had no all-weather-strike capacity, which is not acceptable if Europe is to provide properly for its security; that their capacity to undertake intelligence gathering and reconnaissance operations of the sort that the Sentry and Nimrod undertake was, in most cases, non-existent; that some of their pilots fly only when the weather is fine, during the day, perhaps after a good lunch; and that there is an inordinate number of different types of aircraft.

As ours is the most admired service, as we bear most of the burdens and as we serve as the model for and are admired by Europe—as the Minister has said, people come rushing from Europe to see how our contracting and hard-pressed service is operating—we are entitled to say, "Don't expect Britain to continue to bear burdens that you must share more frequently than you are doing at present."

If we do not say that, it will be unfair on the air crews and ground staff who serve them, who know very well that that is the position, but who are too discreet and too loyal to say it. We are imposing too much on them, which is not fair. It is time that the Government sought to ensure a much fairer deal in the responsibilities for air operations in the western alliance. Until that is achieved, we are entitled to feel aggrieved.

May I make one mischievous suggestion? The Government's current position with regard to Brussels and European negotiations is absurd. It is equivalent to a child taking its bat home because someone has bowled him out. However, I have sympathy with Conservative Members who think that we should show some criticism of the fact that one or two member states have been less helpful than they might have been; perhaps Germany is one of them.

As a tribute to the enormous sacrifices that were made in the history of the oldest independent air force in the world, and as a little reminder of the genuine independence that Britain displayed between 1940 and 1944, why not give Bomber Command the medal that it should have received after the second world war? Go back to negotiations, but make a little gesture. It would be much more sensible.

Mr. Bill Walker (North Tayside): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy). No one can deny that, in relation to the Royal Air Force, his heart and mind are in the right place, and we always welcome his contribution to the debates.

I remind the House that I have an interest. For many years, I have been a volunteer reserve pilot and instructor and I hold an honorary appointment. I have been thinking about the debate for some weeks, wondering what we would be talking about. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) and I must have been thinking about similar things because I had begun to think about the period between the wars and how Lord Trenchard had laid down the foundations that led to the expansion in the late 1930s.

The lessons of the second world war are that control of the skies is a necessary objective. Who could ever forget the sinking of the Prince of Wales and the Repulse, two capital ships that were lost because they had no air cover? The absence of air cover was critical and the lesson was brought home to us, if we needed it, that even men-of-war that were thought to be invincible were vulnerable to air attack. Who can ever forget the battle of Britain, a close-run thing? I could go on and on about that period, but I have made my point. We must therefore consider today's Royal Air Force against the evidence of history.

If we are to continue to have the broad range of capability, which is the task that Parliament has required the RAF to meet, again history will assist us. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood probably, I have been re-reading some books about the pre-war RAF and about the battle of Britain. Like most people of my generation, I have a library of such books and from time to time I return to them. Having read them, I asked myself: do we today have the ability to expand within, say, three years to defend United Kingdom air space against aggression from the continent?

People will say, "Who are the enemies?" but I remind them that in 1930 no one had heard of Hitler and, by 1940, in 10 short years, he had created the most massive military force known to man and had occupied most of Europe. In fact, in 1932, no one had heard of him. I pick on three years deliberately because the years 1936-39 were critical for the RAF and the year 1939-40 was vital to our survival.

So I ask the question: do we have the capacity to create a strike force capable of taking modern weapons deep into enemy territory? Could we create a modern equivalent of Bomber Harris's Bomber Command? Do we have the capacity today to create a transport and maritime capability, the modern equivalent of Transport and Coastal Command? More important probably, do we have a logistics and training capability to meet the demands of supplying front-line expansion capabilities? My concern is primarily directed towards our ability to expand logistics and training. If we fail in either or both of those sectors, front-line expansion will not take place.

My reading of the expansion years of the late 1930s is that the ability to produce and to maintain aircraft and spares was vital. Attrition losses in the early years of the war, particularly in France in the first year, required new equipment quickly and squadrons to be created to meet the demands of defending the skies of the United Kingdom.

Will one fast-jet training unit be capable of turning out the number of aircrew required if expansion is necessary in the circumstances that may evolve? The hon. Member for Wentworth and others reminded the House that the unexpected always happens. Will we have the capacity to train sufficient technical staff for the extra squadrons? I can envisage the Royal Air Force having the aircraft but empty seats, because it will be incapable of producing the required number of fast-jet pilots in time.

The present Chief of Air Staff and the Air Force Board are to be congratulated on following the example of Trenchard and learning the lessons of the pre-war years. I am sure that the present Chief of Air Staff would be the first to admit that there must be some risk in the way that financial pressures have forced the RAF to produce training structure logistics that may not expand as the service would wish in times of emergency.

The hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) used the word "sustainability", and the combination of that in current circumstances with the ability to expand will ultimately determine whether or not policies decided and decisions taken now were wise. I heard that with some feeling because we often hear from people—sadly, some of them on the Opposition Benches—the nonsense that a defence review will solve the problem. All experience of such reviews is that they are designed to save money. If we are creating structures that are the direct result of financial pressures—the so-called peace dividend—heaven help us if we go down the route of a defence review designed to save more money, because that will mean cutting planned defence procurement. That is the only way to produce quick savings.

I am pleased with the actions of my hon. Friends the Ministers in respect of defence procurement. I welcome the upgrading of the Tornado F3, which was a wise and sensible decision that had the added advantage of protecting the vital Eurofighter 2000 programme, which we must do nothing to undermine. We are depending on that aircraft, and on it coming in on time. Can my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement give an assurance that decisions on the following programmes will be announced before the summer recess? [Interruption.] I pause while my hon. Friends have their collaborative chat, and I am happy that they should chat. The programmes to which I refer are the replacement maritime patrol aircraft, SR1236—the CASOM, and the SR1238 anti-armour weapon. May we expect decisions before the recess?

The first duty is to buy the maritime patrol aircraft that is right for the job. The second is to get it at the best possible competitive price—I do not argue with that. We must also consider UK involvement. Collaboration is a fact of life and not something that one can discard. In military aviation manufacturing, collaboration is not an option. No single company or country can today provide the high-cost, leading-edge, sophisticated and modern military equipment required to give our air force the edge that it needs. Purchasing decisions cannot ignore that factor. It is important to consider not only price but work share, future capability, the retention of a UK research and development and manufacturing capability, and the vital export potential and through-life costs.

It is nonsense for Members of Parliament and the Government to spend taxpayers' money on something that will not offer export potential. That is where collaboration is vital and important. Are we collaborating with countries whose markets will be open to us, or not? I commend my hon. Friends on the selection of the C130J, which was the right decision, as subsequent events have shown, because one should not be persuaded to buy a paper or political aircraft—aircrew do not like the idea of flying, either.

Whatever the pressure on my hon. Friend the Minister—and it will be huge—he should bear it in mind that the companies involved in all the runners for the maritime replacement aircraft should have a large UK content. It is also nonsense to say that, because a company is a leading fuselage manufacturer, it is the only choice—it is not. I hope that the replacement's specification and price will be carefully examined and that the RAF will get the right aircraft, which will have implications for sales world wide. Also, can my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary give some idea when a decision on procuring the SRA1239 is likely to be made?

People tend to think of the Royal Air Force in terms of fast, noisy, low-flying jets. Sadly, that is often the only evidence the public have of an RAF presence. With that in mind, I congratulate my hon. Friends on sanctioning and agreeing the successful Red Arrows tour of the far east, which was one of the most valuable exercises in many decades. It had a huge impact and did enormous good for UK export potential.

Opposition Members mentioned the time that individuals must be away from their home base as a result of the overstretch faced in some areas—a critical factor in maintaining morale and professional standards at home and abroad. We should not be surprised if people have domestic problems if we continue to require them to be away for six months of each year.

Housing is another matter of concern, and answers can and should be found. It is important that we communicate effectively to the people who are affected so that they can clearly receive the message and understand what is happening. I believe that those at the highest levels of the RAF understand what the Government are trying to do, but I am not sure that people at the lower levels understand.

I welcome today's announcement on the RAF Valley contract. I join my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood in suggesting that there should be a pilot scheme for sponsored reserves. I believe that sponsored reserves is the way to go forward. As a volunteer myself, I have always felt that the volunteers' value was not always properly understood by the Government or by the services. Given the opportunity and the training, volunteers are as professional as full-time people. The RAF Valley contract should be a good way to get the sponsored reserves moving.

I cannot forget that, in the immediate post-war years, people such as those from Airwork manned the reserve flying schools, with which I was associated. All the people from Airwork at those flying schools were reservists. Those were the days when the volunteer reserve was a very large organisation. I should like to see those manning levels restored through the auxiliaries. I therefore welcome the decision on the helicopter composite squadron at Benson, which is a move in the right direction.

I should now like to turn to a topic that is very close and dear to me. My hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement will not be surprised to hear that I am going to mention something that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces did not mention in opening the debate—the cadets. The Air Training Corps, which currently has 37,000 cadets, not only provides training in citizenship, leadership, team work and many other attributes sought by potential employers; it also remains a valuable source of recruits for the RAF.

Recruiting is not one of the ATC's main objectives, but it is worth noting that the cadets who join the RAF not only have a lower wastage rate in training but remain in the service longer than those without Air Training Corps experience. Moreover, as the RAF significantly decreases its manpower and its geographical spread of bases, the Air Training Corps increasingly represents the only blue RAF uniform that the public ever see.

It is interesting to note that, according to the figures given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, by 1999 the service will be down to 52,200 people. The ATC, including the adults in uniform who are associated with it, will be nearly the same size. We will have a cadet force that is almost equal in size to its parent service. It is therefore important that my hon. Friend the Minister recognises, and agrees, that the air element of the Air Training Corps is the vital feature that distinguishes it from other organised youth activity, and that it is an important way in which to raise the RAF's profile in the public eye.

My hon. Friend the Minister will not be surprised to learn that I want to draw attention to volunteer gliding schools. There are problems with those because sites are becoming increasingly difficult to find. As the RAF shrinks and RAF stations decrease in number, we find it difficult to find sufficient sites for our 28 volunteer gliding schools. The situation is particularly difficult in north-east and south-east England. In some places we have entered into shared agreements with the Army and the Navy, by which they have taken over former RAF bases and shared the airfields with us.

I should like to make it clear to my hon. Friend the Minister that the Army and the Navy must realise that the volunteer reserve gliding units are a part of the RAF training machine, that airfields are for aeroplanes, gliders and other aircraft to fly from and that airfields are not meant for other things. It would be useful if the Army and the Navy—at local level, because there has never been any problem at the highest level—understood that.

I also ask my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement—I have already written to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence about this—to understand the need for additional Vigilant motor gliders, which will provide the flexibility that is necessary because of the lack of sites. I do not expect an answer today, but I ask the Minister to have a word with the Secretary of State about my bid for seven more Vigilant motor gliders. They are necessary because of the difficulty with sites.

We have found that fewer summer camp places are now available because of the reduction of RAF stations. It has therefore become increasingly necessary for us to find other ways in which to get the cadets to camp. I should like my hon. Friends the Ministers to realise that that problem must be examined in some depth. There may be new solutions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) has a direct interest in air experience flying. We will be considering replacing the Bulldog aircraft, which is used for university air squadron flying and for the air cadet air experience flying. I hope that soon we can receive some answers on the replacement for the Bulldog. If my hon. Friend the Minister accepts—I am sure that he does—that the air element is the important element of the air cadets, Bulldogs and the replacement aircraft are important and should have a fairly high priority. As it is not an expensive project—as are the projects I mentioned earlier—I should think that, even with our tight budgets, we will find ways to replace those aircraft.

I always find it interesting to listen to debates on the RAF because, fortunately, there are still some hon. Members who have direct RAF experience. One of the great tragedies of the modern Parliament is that so few hon. Members who are elected to it now have direct experience of the military. We are blessed to have colleagues with direct experience of the military. We are also blessed to have such hon. Members as the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), who has a keen and direct interest in the military. The RAF benefits from that.

The message that I should like the House to send out to the people in the RAF is that we care, that they are important and that we want to do the right things for them.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker), who speaks with a very patriotic insight. My speech will be unashamedly constituency-oriented. When I heard the Minister's remarks about Normandy and about those years of crucial importance to the future of our nation, I was reminded that from 1940 the Vickers company built and operated a shadow factory in my constituency, where the Wellington and later the Lancaster bombers were made. My constituents' skills greatly helped the RAF in the war effort.

I will deal first with the future large aircraft. In my constituency, 2,200 plane makers make the wings of the airbus and they also want to make the wings of the FLA. One of the reasons I want them to be able to do so is that, in the past two and a half years, my constituents have lost some 2,000 jobs at Airbus, British Aerospace and Broughton, which has had a great impact on the local economy. If we were to make the wings for the FLA, it would be the icing on the very successful airbus cake. That is our hope and our plea.

The airbus activity is the linchpin of my constituency's economy, but it is also the linchpin of the Wirral area, Cheshire and the city of Chester. The airbus activity has meant that my constituency in north-east Wales has a reservoir of skills arguably unparalleled anywhere else in the country. I should like Ministers to acknowledge that the FLA project is crucial for the future of the whole industry. Do they comprehend the strategic importance of the aerospace industry itself?

I would itemise the industry's importance as follows: it represents sales of £10 billion a year and 2 per cent. of the nation's gross domestic product; three aerospace companies are among Britain's top five exporters; there are some 130,000 employees in this great industry and tens of thousands of people are indirectly employed; the industry has very competitive labour costs and, above all, it contributes about £2 billion per year to Britain's balance of trade.

No one could doubt that Britain's aerospace industry is truly world class—it is perhaps our last world-class industry in terms of skilled activity. I ask Ministers to ensure more Government support for this great industry. Will the Ministry of Defence use its undoubted weight to get positive Treasury backing? The industry is now in a state of flux on the mainland of Europe, so why should Britain not urgently seek to take the lead? The Ministry can help it to do that.

I should also like the Ministry to ensure that the Government give the aerospace industry a much bigger research and technology budget. That is an urgent requirement, as it is the seedcorn that will deliver the profits in the years ahead. Will the Ministry acknowledge that the aerospace industries of other European countries and of the United States have far bigger research budgets?

Are Ministers still committed to the FLA, and specifically to the 40 to 50 aircraft that it is mooted that the Government will buy? Are Ministers stressing to France and Germany the importance of the FLA project? I should like the Government, and especially Defence Ministers, to say that they have done everything possible to bring the project into being. Many of my constituents are dismayed at having to endure the lengthy delay in making the decision.

Are the Government using every diplomatic device and all possible pressure to persuade the French to make up their mind about the FLA? I very much want Defence Ministers to take the lead in the Government in putting more pressure on the French Government because I feel that the French interest, activity and approach is very weak—indeed, wimpish. It is up to our Ministers to use all their weight to ensure a positive outcome.

Having said all that, I must thank the Minister of State for Defence Procurement for being so accessible and courteous when I raised these matters with him, and specifically when he patiently received the deputation that I brought him in respect of the FLA project. I am most grateful to him. I now invite him to visit the Broughton factory, where he can see the making of the airbus wings. Were he to visit the factory, he would surely boast about the skills and successes of my constituents.

I also draw the Minister's attention and that of his colleagues to the chilling headline in the authoritative Financial Times earlier this week:

"Aerospace industry sees 30,000 job cuts".

My constituents who work on the airbus were dismayed to hear of proposed cuts on that scale. Cuts were mooted for the whole aerospace industry, of course. I would argue that a successful FLA project would be helpful in the context of those cuts. Are Ministers anxious about the signposting of redundancies on such a scale?

My second constituency point relates to RAF Sealand. Of the 1,600 people working there, 1,300 are civilians. I believe that it is the best maintenance unit in western Europe. It has a fine team—flexible, co-operative, productive and successful—and it did not let the RAF fliers down in the Falklands war and the Gulf war. In a way, it received battle honours.

[Mr. Barry Jones]

At present, RAF Sealand is under a cloud, and that cloud—to put it bluntly—is market testing. My constituents say that market testing is a despised phenomenon. It sits uneasily alongside the task of a maintenance unit. That task is, at the drop of a hat, to respond in an emergency to war and to look after the interests of our fliers. We simply do not like the prospect of market testing. My constituents say that market testing is in effect ensnaring a loyal work force into what they believe is an ideologically inspired experiment. We do not want it and we do not see the need for it.

I want to put it on record that RAF Sealand has demanned in considerable numbers over the years. It is a co-operative unit and very positive and innovative. I have also found it to be very responsive. Market testing and the failure of an in-house bid would be a very poor reward for being loyal and carrying out a patriotic duty.

My advice to Ministers is, if it works, don't fix it. My plea is that they make this part of Wales a market-testing-free zone. The deal that we are offering is this: if they take market testing away from RAF Sealand, we will continue to deliver the goods and to find the savings. I urge Ministers to place a moratorium on market testing. Why not kick it into touch?

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement was also accessible and courteous when he received my deputation from RAF Sealand. Equally speedily, he accepted my invitation to visit RAF Sealand. I express the thanks of those who work at RAF Sealand for the trouble that he took to see the base for himself. Perhaps I may therefore put a few questions to him on RAF Sealand.

Why was the deadline for bids to take over the work at RAF Sealand delayed yet again? That rankles at RAF Sealand. The leaders of the work force, who have been so loyal to the unit and have worked so hard on the in-house bid, believe that private contractors may be getting an unfair advantage by being allowed more time to gather information for their bids. As we see it, more time means a more competitive bid against those who have made the in-house bid in good faith. My constituents are wondering what answer would have been given if the in-house team had sought an extension. Suspicions have arisen and I draw them to the attention of the House in good faith.

Mr. Arbuthnot: In view of the detail of that question, I should like to answer it immediately. The reason why the tender was extended by five weeks was that more time was needed to answer bidders' formal questions and to provide them with up-to-date detailed Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations data, and to update the invitation to tender.

Mr. Jones: I am grateful to the Minister, as I am for his written answer on pretty well the same subject. However, suspicions remain, and it was worth making the point in the House.

The Minister might agree that the prize in the market-tested bidding is the maintenance and repair contracts. The big boys in play are GEC and Brown and Root. The fear back home at RAF Sealand is that there will be redundancies if either big company wins the contract. If the in-house bid fails, it is our sincere view that the Ministry of Defence will lose in the long run because the unit will not work as effectively as it does now.

It must be emphasised that the large predators bidding for the contracts at the expense of my constituents are bidding for profit. My loyal, patriotic and co-operative constituents at RAF Sealand want the in-house bid to win—for the sake of RAF Sealand, Wales, Britain, and ultimately, those brave and most professional aircrew.

Now that the Minister has visited RAF Sealand and gained a full understanding of the unit's complexities, and bearing in mind the difficulties with the recently contractorised Nimrod major servicing unit at RAF Kinloss, which follow major difficulties with the Airworks Tornado contract at RAF St. Athan, how can the Government remain convinced that the risks of a contractor operating the far more complex organisation of RAF Sealand are justified?

That is a genuine concern. On Deeside, we believe that the Government must take that into account. I know that the Government care about the future of the RAF. Do the Government agree that the taut but flexible contract that will be required to enable a contractor to operate RAF Sealand is unachievable in practice? We believe that it is. I express those views on behalf of my constituents.

I do not usually refer to the Daily Mail, but I shall do so in this debate. On 1 May, a large headline read: "Air defences down as Nimrods are grounded". The defence correspondent said:

> "A quarter of the RAF's 24 Nimrod spy planes have been grounded because of a maintenance crisis.
> Repair and servicing was handed last year to a contractor as part of the Defence Ministry's programme of switching such work to the private sector to cut costs.
> But sources at Kinloss, Grampian, where most of the Nimrods are based, claim the contractor is dogged with problems ranging from a lack of expertise to poor morale. One said: 'It is a nightmare.'"

My constituents at RAF Sealand do not want that nightmare. They want, very proudly, to continue to deliver a fine service to the Government and the RAF. I speak on behalf of a work force who delivered during the Gulf and the Falklands wars and who know what they are talking about.

I very much hope that Ministers will give fair play to my constituents who have submitted the in-house bid, bearing in mind that the Ministry of Defence wants long-term success, not a short-term response to an ideologically motivated approach. After all the wonderfully co-operative work at RAF Sealand, it would be a terrible kick in the teeth if the in-house bid lost. My full support must go to the maintenance unit. I am sure that the RAF's high command is very proud of RAF Sealand and does not want market testing to lead to an outsider winning the contract. I certainly put on record my pride in that wonderful base.

I have received messages today from those who work at the unit in my constituency. They have noted that Brown and Root and others in the consortium have gained contracts at RAF Valley in Anglesey. Their message to me is that that will not improve the spirits of those who work at the unit. Mr. David Barratt took the trouble to telephone me at 7.50 pm to say that the bid at RAF Valley had been lost to the outside contractor. He said:

"I think this will have an effect on RAF Sealand."

I know this councillor and I respect his concern, which I have put on the record on his behalf and on behalf of my constituents.

Having told the House of two thundering successes in my constituency—RAF Sealand and Airbus—I wish to refer briefly to a tragedy, an injustice and the loss of hundreds of jobs. Seven years ago, 1,200 skilled men and women made a world-class, two-engined executive passenger jet that could fly the Atlantic. So good was the product that a United States multinational, Raytheon, accepted an offer which could not be refused and bought the business for a song—just like that. Although jet production continues for the time being, half the original jobs have gone and the rest are scheduled to go soon. The jobs will be exported from my constituency to the United States, and that wonderful, world-leading aircraft will be made not in my constituency but in Wichita in Kansas—the home state of that powerful and influential politician, presidential candidate Bob Dole.

Mr. Mans: I have a certain sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but I am slightly at a loss to understand what his remarks have to do with a debate on the RAF.

Mr. Jones: If the hon. Gentleman will listen for a few more seconds, I will show him why I am entirely in order. I invite him to make the same statement in my constituency in front of my Raytheon workers: he would need my protection. However, I know that he made it in the best sense and was not being mischievous. If he will listen, I will explain.

Before I so foolishly gave way to the hon. Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans)—I note his origin—I was saying that Senator Bob Dole might perhaps have had a hand in the move. Later this year, the Raytheon jet makers in my constituency will suffer considerable job losses. I believe that they deserve better.

I thank the Minister of State for receiving a deputation of Raytheon workers. The Minister, who comes from the same party as the hon. Member for Wyre, gave a lot of his time to allow my constituents to make a passionate, well informed case for Britain's future as well as for their own. I thought that they made a wonderful case, and the Minister's reception of us was most helpful and hospitable.

I invite the Minister to my constituency once again, to visit the Raytheon plant, where he will be astonished and astounded—and very proud—to witness the skills of my constituents, who on current probabilities are soon to lose their jobs when the making of that wonderful machine moves for ever from Great Britain to the United States. That is madness. It is unjust and it is wrong. I know that the hon. Member for Wyre will now agree with me and will wish to show his support for the campaign that we are mounting.

I should like the Ministry of Defence to reward my excellent Raytheon work force with the contract to service the Hawker jets that the Ministry of Defence owns. The hon. Member for Wyre forgot that my constituents have made—and the Ministry of Defence has bought—25 to 30 of those machines, which I believe are now known as Dominie aircraft. As my constituents see the loss of their manufacturing jobs drawing ever nearer, they have had to ask themselves what they will do. They have made a fine business plan whereby the current manufacturing centre would become a service centre for the whole of Europe, for all the machines that the work force has made over the past quarter of a century and longer.

It is in the gift of the Ministry of Defence to award the service contract to Raytheon. If that happened, we could save many jobs and a presence would remain in Britain. The Government have admitted what I once described as the breakfast sale of the century—the sale of the Hawker jet to the United States—so what special help will they give? The work force have been so positive that they deserve a reward. They seek to make that plant a service centre for the whole of Europe, maintaining and servicing those fine machines, and that is a reasonable ambition for my constituents to have.

I have thrice thanked the Minister for his reception of our deputation, which was of great consequence for my area, and I hope that he will ponder my request carefully. So far, I am most grateful to him.

8.22 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): Unlike some of my hon. Friends, I can claim neither personal military experience nor personal memories of the great days of the Royal Air Force in the 1940s, which for me must come alive through film and newsreel, or through the tales recounted by those honoured veterans who were there.

However, in my constituency there are many members of the Royal Air Force, ranging from the most junior ranks in the service to some of the most senior and decorated. At RAF Halton, just outside the village of Wendover, is the centre of the Royal Air Force's basic recruit training, and about 12 miles along the Chilterns, in the village of Naphill, lies RAF High Wycombe, which is the base of Strike Command and now also the home of the new Anglo-French group.

In the years since I was elected to the House, what has impressed me enormously is the tremendous pride that every member of the service, from the rawest recruit to the most senior air marshal, takes in the Royal Air Force. With that pride in the service goes a strong sense of duty to the nation that the RAF serves.

Last summer that was brought home to me strongly, when I had the honour to be invited to act as the reviewing officer of a parade of new recruits leaving RAF Halton after their basic training. Talking to those new members of the service—young men and women in their late teens or early twenties, and to their families—what struck me was the fact that they could draw on the history of the RAF, not as an arid museum of experience but as a living tradition. It was a history that gave them meaning, a sense of corporate identity, and a continuing sense of duty and purpose as they entered on their careers in the service.

There is no doubt that, for both the RAF bases in my constituency, the last couple of years have been times of great challenge and some difficulty. Some problems have been specific to each base, and others have been shared with the rest of the service as it has made its adjustments to the defence costs review.

At RAF Halton there has been a switch from technical training to basic recruit training. The base has also seen the reorganisation of the medical provision for the armed forces, which has led to the closure of the Princess Mary

[Mr. David Lidington]

Royal Air Force hospital, and the reorganisation of dental services, which has also affected Halton. I hope that it will not be too long before Ministers will be able to resolve the uncertainty that still surrounds the future of the Princess Mary hospital site and the associated office space at the Halton base.

Various hon. Members have mentioned RAF quarters. For Halton the problem lies not with the policy change that is in train, but with the fact that question marks persisted for some years over the future of the base, until the decision was taken to relocate basic recruit training there. That meant that very little was spent on the buildings on the base, so there is now a substantial backlog of work, which I hope Ministers and senior RAF officers will ensure is tackled.

RAF High Wycombe has had to cope with the reorganisation of headquarters functions, and both stations have had to manage the problems associated with the overall reduction in RAF personnel and the contracting out of support services. Those policy decisions have certainly caused difficulties for my constituents, but I am sure that they were the right decisions.

Senior RAF officers who gave evidence to the Defence Select Committee only a few days ago said that the RAF's savings from the defence costs study would contribute about £300 million each year once the changes were implemented in full. At a time when not only the defence budget but all areas of Government spending are subject to scrutiny and to great pressure, it is clearly right for Ministers to look for every opportunity to make savings in administration and support services, so as to concentrate on providing our young men and women in the armed services with the best equipment and training, to enable them to do their job on behalf of the nation.

I would find some of the criticisms that Opposition Members have made during the debate slightly more compelling had they not coupled their critique of the Government for making savings or for seeking to contract out support services with additional demands for expenditure on defence procurement, or for taxpayers' support for defence industries. There is an inconsistency in the position of Opposition spokesmen, which Ministers have every right to expose.

I was glad that my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces acknowledged that these necessary policy decisions have led to problems for individuals. Personal hopes have been disappointed and career ambitions frustrated, and far-reaching changes have been made to the organisational culture of many parts of the RAF. I therefore welcome his acknowledgement of the scale of the challenge facing the RAF in the next few years, and his tribute to the professionalism that the services are showing in tackling those changes and seeking to manage them in a way which deals as sensitively as possible with the real dilemmas and difficulties facing service men and women.

As the service comes through a period of turbulence, the duty lies with Ministers to demonstrate clearly to service men and women of all ranks that the RAF will continue to offer a fine career to new recruits and that it still has a central role to play in the United Kingdom's defence strategy. That cannot be done by exhortation alone, although exhortation and reassurance from Ministers—who must showing solidarity with the officers and men in the services—is important.

We must also think clearly about the future of the service in the post-cold war world. There is still a great deal of uncertainty about the nature of future threats to the United Kingdom and the interests that our armed forces might be required to defend in various parts of the world. I therefore welcome the steps that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his team have taken to enhance the role of the Western European Union in the Atlantic alliance.

I see no contradiction between a sceptical attitude towards some of the more extravagant ambitions of the European Union—although I could add a scepticism that would be recognised by my distant predecessor Edmund Burke, if not by one or two tabloid newspapers—with an equal desire to search for ways in which the countries of Europe can co-operate more effectively in the field of collective security.

Mr. Mans: I am interested in what my hon. Friend has to say about the WEU. Does he agree that, if we want European states to collaborate, we have a perfectly good way of doing so through NATO? The WEU is surely not the way forward.

Mr. Lidington: The Government are right to make it clear that NATO should remain the cornerstone of the western Atlantic alliance, but it is compatible with that principle for the Government also to try to strengthen the European pillar within that alliance. The recent White Paper on the intergovernmental conference proposed that we look for a strengthened role for the WEU as one way of giving effect to that policy.

I am pleased that we have seen some fruit from our efforts to woo France back into the main stream of the western alliance. It was a difficult courtship, conducted with the delicacy and the restraint appropriate to a Jane Austen novel. I am glad that we seem to have received a favourable response from Paris, although, as some Opposition Members have said, there is still a long way to go.

In addition to the importance that the Government rightly place on the Anglo-French relationship, I hope that they will have regard to the need to bring Germany more fully into the defensive arrangements of the Atlantic alliance. I know that there are differences between our approach and that of the current German Government, who hope to develop a defence role European Union. I personally do not think that that is desirable.

Speaking to younger German politicians, one realises that members of the Bundestag are quite rightly confident about their national identity, and take an understandable pride in the achievements of a democratic Germany during the past 50 years. They accept that one aspect of their maturity as an advanced democracy will be to play a more active role as a partner in western defence arrangements in the future. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends in the Government will be able to strengthen our relationship with Germany in the years to come.

8.35 pm

Mr. Hugh Bayley (York): A characteristic of our debates on the armed forces is that many things are said on which there is agreement. I listened carefully to the hon. Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker), who is well informed and speaks with great experience on these matters. As always, I learned something from listening to him. He said, rightly, that one of the things that the House must be concerned about is that relatively few Members entering the House for the first time have served in the armed forces.

The hon. Member for North Tayside said that that small number were supplemented by some hon. Members who take a particularly close interest in the armed forces, and mentioned in that context my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), who has a long-standing interest in the RAF. He forgot, however, that my hon. Friend has served in the RAF. I know that because I travel to and from Yorkshire with him frequently. As a graduate of the armed forces parliamentary scheme, he suggested to me that I might usefully spend some time in the scheme. I did so last year and the year before and, as someone who has not served in the armed forces, I learned a great deal from it.

I want to say some things that the Government may not agree with, but I base my remarks on what I have learnt during my visits to a considerable number of RAF bases, and I believe that this needs to be said. I am sorry to have to say it, but this has been a bad year for the RAF in terms of the number of aircraft that it has lost. In five months, the RAF and the Royal Navy have lost 11 aircraft, and two air crew from the RAF and two from the Royal Navy have lost their lives. That is a considerable number, and compares with the six aircraft lost by the RAF during the Gulf war.

In his opening speech, the Minister suggested that it was irresponsible to ask questions about what has been happening and why. I do not share that view. The House should be asking deep, serious and penetrating questions about these accidents. I do not intend to detain the House for too long, but we should remind ourselves of the aircraft that have been lost.

In January, two Tornado F3s collided in mid air in the middle of a training exercise. The following day, one of the attack GR1 Tornados was lost in Germany, and a Jaguar was lost that month as well. In February, a Hawk aircraft crashed on take-off at RAF Valley. The pilot, an experienced man, was killed. The press reports about that accident suggested that the reason for the crash may have been that the ailerons had been disconnected for servicing and had not been reconnected before the flight. I do not expect Ministers to comment on that until the air investigation report is published, and when it is published it will, of course, be made available to hon. Members in the Library.

Two Royal Navy Sea Harriers were lost, together with an RAF Harrier and another Tornado GR1 that month. Last month, a Tucano, from RAF Linton-on-Ouse near my constituency, crashed in Wetwang in Humberside and, last Monday, a Hawk aircraft was lost at an air display in Portugal.

The losses in the five months of this year have been twice the average rate of loss in the past four years. In his opening speech, the Minister, who is now in his place, said that those losses were nothing other than an unfortunate coincidence; that the loss of those aircraft and lives was simply bad luck. That could be the explanation, because accidents by their nature do not happen in a regular cycle.

The figures for air accidents are fickle and they go up and down. In 1991, the armed forces had a bad year and lost 20 aircraft, but those figures—in an especially bad year—showed a lower attrition rate than was suffered in the first five months of this year. Of course, five years ago, the armed forces had more aircraft in service than now.

Of the 11 aircraft that have been lost—nine RAF aircraft and two Royal Navy aircraft so far this year—10 were fast jets. In 1992, the Royal Air Force had 647 front-line fast jets in operational use or in in-use reserve. Now 580 fast jets are in use. In 1992, three fast jets were lost, or one for each four months of the year, but in 1996, so far, 10 fast jets have been lost, or two per month. The loss rate is eight times higher than in 1992.

It is right and acceptable for the Minister to hope that the high loss rate that we have had in recent months is just bad luck. I, too, hope that that is the cause. I hope that the loss rate will right itself in time and that it is an unfortunate statistical quirk, but it is irresponsible to assume that the only cause is bad luck that will right itself. We must consider the alternative explanations and discount them only when we have firm evidence that we should. When an accident happens, there is a thorough investigation and the reports of those investigations are placed in the Library. Each of those investigations considers a single accident.

I was not convinced, by the Minister's intervention in the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar), that sufficient attention is paid to trends from one accident to another and whether there are any common factors. My hon. Friend was right to say that a special inquiry should be set up to consider whether there are some common factors in the high loss rate.

I understand that none of the aircraft lost this year has been maintained by contractors. We have had evidence that contractors can fall down on the job. All hon. Members present will know about the Airworks problem when 18 Tornado aircraft were damaged, causing a repair bill of some £100 million. The same company damaged 11 Hercules aircraft. According to the Defence Select Committee's report of December last year, the company caused serious damage to the aircraft by cutting away load-bearing stringers, omitting fasteners, deviating from drawings and drilling holes in the air frames in the wrong places.

I shall give the House a long quotation—longer than I would normally use, so I ask for the House's forbearance—from the evidence given by Hunting plc to the Defence Select Ctte in its inquiry into market testing. Hunting plc said:

> "Notwithstanding the policy that value for money and quality are now the key determinants in the award of a contract, practice suggests that the cheapest tender still wins. As a consequence, contract prices are being driven down to levels which will, in the final analysis, create longer term problems or possibly failures. There is already sufficient evidence to show that the lowest price bid is not always the most cost effective."

The cost-cutting approach that contractors necessarily follow is copied by RAF engineering teams who seek to retain work in house, as my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) pointed out. That, after all, is the very intention and purpose of contractorisation—to consider whether the job is being done in house as cost-effectively as possible. But the House must ask at what point the competitor pressures and contract culture start to undermine standards of RAF engineering.

A second hypothesis has been put forward by certain hon. Members about a possible—I say no more than possible—cause for the current high incidence of aircraft loss. That is that the defence drawdown has reached a point at which it is beginning to compromise the operational effectiveness of the armed forces and the RAF in particular. I was sorry to hear the Minister suggest that to raise that issue is an irresponsible act by a few maverick Labour Members. The same fear has been expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and one of them is present tonight.

The Independent, on 28 February 1996, in a report on a meeting, stated:

"Fears that cuts in defence spending may be partly to blame for the string of crashes by RAF aircraft are to be raised with ministers by senior Conservative MPs."

From the context of the article, I believe that one of those who attended that meeting, and who was also probably the provider of the information to the journalist, is here on the Conservative Benches tonight.

During my year with the armed forces parliamentary scheme, I became acutely aware of the enormous pressure on those serving in the Royal Air Force. Hon. Members have made that point already today and I will not dwell on it. The RAF is now smaller than at any time since the second world war. In March, 5,600 officers and men were made redundant from the RAF, although the RAF is now deployed in more places overseas in an operational role than at any time since the second world war. I will not list all the places but during my time on the parliamentary scheme I had the opportunity and privilege to visit the RAF detachments at Palermo, Gioia del Colle and Aviano to see what life was like and what the job—at least, the job at the base—entailed. I also observed the morale of the people involved in the front line on operational duties.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) spoke about the huge pressure on front-line jet pilots, who spend perhaps 200 days a year away from home in either a front-line operational role or training; they are away from their homes and families. When a detachment is deployed, it is not just the air crew who go—engineering staff and ground crew provide back-up.

There are 450 RAF personnel at Gioia, and most of the air crew are deployed for a three-month period. One evening in the sergeant's mess—the bar in the big hotel where most of the NCOs were billeted—a young airman told me that his wife had given birth to a baby shortly after he had come out on deployment. He would not have an opportunity to go home to see his wife or baby for two months; it was impossible for him to go home for a weekend while on an operational assignment. Those who have served in the armed forces will know that that is forces' life, but it seems to me, as someone who has not served in the forces, a hard burden to bear.

However, if someone signs up to the armed forces, that is part of the deal. If someone is deployed away from home for a quarter of the year—that is the average—that is what he comes to expect. But as the pressure to be away on operational duties more frequently steps up, the pressure on the individual and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North said, on that person's family, increases too.

The problems of pressure are compounded by problems of job insecurity and lack of promotion prospects. At RAF Odiham I met an extremely able young aircraft engineer who had served in his rank for seven years. He was told that he had no prospect of promotion; in the past he would have been promoted two or three years earlier. That happens not just at NCO level, but at officer level. Hon. Members have talked of the numbers of middle-ranking officers leaving the RAF because there is no a career ahead of them if they stay. Morale is, to say the least, fragile.

On 25 February this year an RAF officer was quoted in The Observer as saying:

"We have a problem. Frankly some of our guys are just worn out."

The RAF trains harder and flies better than any air force in the world. It is an incredibly valuable and prized national asset but it is currently being squeezed from both sides: its budget and its manpower are being cut while its operational obligations are increasing.

The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell), who is no longer in his place, reminded the House that NATO inspections of RAF bases have been suspended. Annual formal inspections of RAF bases have also been abandoned. Participation in the royal tournament has been reduced to a minimum because the resources are no longer there. That reflects the pincer pressure—the RAF has greater commitments and fewer resources. The strain is beginning to show. The House and the Government need to answer the question: are we now, and have we been, expecting and requiring the Royal Air Force to do too much with too little for too long?

8.53 pm

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): I was interested in the remarks of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Bayley) and pleased that he has had such a pleasant time with the RAF under the parliamentary scheme that we have with the armed forces. I shall not dwell too long on what he said, but I want to make one point in relation to the accidents that he mentioned.

During his time with the Air Force, the hon. Gentleman may not have picked up the fact that a continuous inquiry is being held into the relationships between different accidents, as well as near-accidents and incidents. Every such incident, near-accident and crash is looked at to see whether something has gone wrong which could affect other aircraft in that fleet or with that role. Therefore, the idea of another special inquiry is superfluous. I am confident that that exercise is continuing all the time. If there are lessons to be learned from the spate of accidents, they have already been learned or certainly will be learnt when the full findings of those accidents are made available in the normal way.

A number of other speakers tonight made a series of requests of my hon. Friend the Minister, and I shall start with a personal one. As my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside (Mr. Walker) said, he is a member of the Royal Air Force Reserve, as I am, and a pilot. I have been personally affected by the changes in the Royal Air Force over the past two years. The aircraft that I have been flying for the past 19 years sadly left service with the RAF on 31 March after a period of 49 years, 10 and a half months. It was perhaps a little churlish of those in charge of the operation not to postpone that for an extra six weeks, to ensure that the aircraft had been in service and had flown for 50 years.

I have been forced in my middle age to learn to fly a new aeroplane. I was slightly worried by what my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside said about the possibility of the air experience flights and the university air squadrons having yet another new aircraft, as I can see myself having to prepare for that in a special way. All I ask of my hon. Friend the Minister is to let us have a little information about that as soon as possible, as I should like to know whether, in the near future, I shall be required to go through the exercise that I have been through over the past month yet again.

Compared with previous years, the RAF has, over the past year, been in the news a great deal. As we have heard, the news has not always been welcome, and it has not been an easy year for the RAF. What is sometimes forgotten is that, when politicians sign off decisions, service men have to implement them and do so for a considerable period. As Lord Craig said in the House of Lords on Monday in another debate, the devil is often in the detail.

It is a tribute to the service men of all three services, but particularly the RAF, as it is the subject of tonight's debate, that they have got on with the job and done what has been required of them in a year when manpower has been reducing rapidly and many non-core activities have been contractorised. I agree with my hon. Friends the Members for North Tayside and for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), and I worry that we might have gone a bit too far.

I very much want to see the new Valley contract operate properly and successfully. I am certain that the people employed will be first-class, but we need to look closely in the medium and long term to ensure that we have the balance right.

That also relates to flying training, for which an element of discipline is necessary. That has to be taught at some stage during training, but if there are too many civilian instructors, it will be harder to do so. We must be careful and analyse in detail the effects of the changes. One can easily add up the figures, save money on flying hours at the beginning of training and turn out a pilot with wings, and show that one has saved the taxpayer money in doing so, but one must then see whether that individual is as effective on his squadron as his predecessor was two or three years before who went through the previous system.

As far as I am concerned, the jury is still out. We may well have got it right. We may well have saved money. We may well have retained the operational effectiveness of which the Air Force is rightly proud, but I want squadron commanders in front-line air squadrons, front-line aircraft, to tell the Ministry of Defence how the new pilots who have been trained in the new ways are performing; whether they need further operational training to bring them up to the required standard; or whether they are achieving that standard just as quickly—I hope that they are—as their predecessors did a few years ago. Only then will we know whether the changes have been successful. I hope that they are, because we want to move forward, but we should not count our chickens just yet.

Also occurring this year—I hope that it is transitory and will not continue—is the changeover from manning by airmen to manning by contractors. Undoubtedly, gaps will be created as a result. We have already seen that. The RAF, quite rightly, has curtailed activities that are not essential to its front-line duties. I fully approve of that, as it is a reasonable response. It is a difficult year, and I look forward to the time when most of the contracts can be awarded and we can create more stability in the running of the armed forces, particularly the Royal Air Force.

Indeed, while suffering a cut of 42 per cent. in its strength over seven or eight years, the RAF now operates in more locations overseas than it did before the change. Its tasks are greater, while its resources are fewer. It is worth saying that the RAF has always had a tradition of getting on with the job and doing it well, and that is precisely what is happening this year in the units that I have visited, in which there is still the same professionalism and commitment to the job. A good illustration of that, which has already been mentioned, was the Red Arrows' highly successful trip around the world, which did much for the quality of the RAF, its professionalism and, indeed, the serviceability of the excellent Hawk aircraft they flew. They performed well, and I am certain that that will lead to many exports.

For the reforms that have taken place to bed down, it is important that we have the period of stability that we are always promised. I agree with a number of hon. Members, from both sides of the House, who said that we should look more closely at the proposal to sell off the married quarters estate. I shall not dwell on the matter. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell) was right. I believe that we can gain what we need by getting rid of the vacant quarters and at the same time provide the necessary resources to upgrade quarters that are below standard, without having, at this stage at least, to go through the much larger operation of selling the whole estate, which is envisaged. In a slightly parochial sense, the RAF has always spent a bit more than the Army on its estate, with the result that it is likely that the proceeds used to upgrade the estate will go in the direction of the Army rather than the Air Force, although that is probably right if one is to bring all the quarters up to a particular level.

In talking about stability, I shall make one other point. The Labour party—I welcome this—tries to suggest that defence is an issue on which we can combine, that there should not be a diversity of view in any sense and that it is an issue on which we agree. I would like to see, in that spirit of bipartisanship, the Labour party drop the silly idea of a further defence review. I cannot think of anything more likely to create the very conditions that we and the Labour party least want to see.

A defence review would not promote stability. It would promote anxiety across the whole rank structure as to what would be the next change. If the Labour party is serious, it should say, "The armed forces are about the right size; we have got it about right. We shall not have a defence review—we shall have to make the odd change here or there, but we shall not have a review." I do not understand why those on the Labour Front Bench cannot make—or have not made—that commitment. I hope that they make that commitment later tonight.

[Mr. Keith Mans]

I had planned on making a few remarks about air power. However, my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces—who is a former Guards officer—made a tremendously supportive speech about the use of air power, and I was encouraged by that. I am unable to add anything to what my hon. Friend said about the importance of air power in the future.

If aeroplanes and air forces are to carry out the tasks that they are asked to do, they must have the right weapons and platforms. Eurofighter is of vital importance to the future of the Royal Air Force. Despite some of the knocking copy that we have seen in the media, the programme is doing relatively well compared with previous programmes. The workshare arrangements seem to have been worked out.

I congratulate my hon. Friend on the excellent work that he has done in that area—he has ensured that the Germans understand that, if they buy fewer aircraft, they cannot expect the share of the work that they had in the past. That has been a highly successful outcome and I am pleased about the new management structures, which may even reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) that the programme has some chance of succeeding in the future—he seems to think that it has not in the past.

Mr. Wilkinson: I have confidence in the aeroplane, but I query the need for a European Armaments Agency. That is a separate issue from the management of the aircraft.

Mr. Mans: I apologise to my hon. Friend.

I shall refer briefly to some of the other programmes. Many hon. Members have referred to the criteria for the Nimrod replacement. I acknowledge the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside and of the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East on ensuring that we have the right aircraft.

We had a similar debate about 25 years ago, and the Royal Air Force decided on a pure jet solution. We have to ask why we want to change our minds. It raises a number of questions, such as whether the right decision was made all those years ago, to go for a particular concept, which was different from the concept that the Americans went for at that time. However, I noted that the Japanese Government recently said that their new maritime patrol aircraft should be a pure jet and not a turbo-prop.

I suggest caution in relation to export potential. We all want to export and to ensure that the aircraft that the RAF buys has export potential. However, we must not be beguiled by the idea that a huge number of orders will flow directly from a particular decision being made. Export potential is important, but it does not happen quite so soon and is not as lucrative as people make out when the original decision is made.

We need decisions on the two missiles that have already been mentioned today. I hope that those decisions—as well as the decision on the Nimrod replacement—will be made before the summer recess. I disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood about the missiles. I believe that there is a lot of sense in some of the collaboration that is taking place, provided that it can be done cost-effectively.

When it comes to the conventionally armed stand-off missile, we should look at the opportunities of moving it forward, so that we can get the benefits of a reduction in research and development expenditure when we combine with NATO and others to produce new systems.

I hope that we can find out exactly what the private finance initiative is that is associated with university air squadron and air experience flight aircraft. That is important, because it is a way of ensuring that, in future, cadets and students at universities get a bit more flying than they have had until now.

It is dangerous for politicians to make predictions, but I make one tonight about air power in all its facets. The Air Force has not gone through a very easy patch in the past year or so. The very basics of the use of air power have been challenged by, I suggest, many people ignorant of those matters, who have drawn completely the wrong conclusions. I was very pleased by the remarks that my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood made on that subject.

I believe that, in future, air power will be more rather than less important. It allows one to project military force over great distances speedily. Technology is driving its capabilities forward very fast. In practice, politicians find it an effective way of responding to crises speedily—and with a minimum of casualties, which, although it is always important, is even more important in our multi-media age than it was previously.

I strongly believe, therefore, that despite the difficulties in the past year or two, the Royal Air Force has a great future.

9.11 pm

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I am very pleased to be able to speak for just a few minutes at the end of this important debate.

I was almost put off by the enormous experience of my hon. Friends the Members for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), for North Tayside (Mr. Walker) and for Wyre (Mr. Mans), who have just spoken from their experience as serving RAF personnel. My experience of the Royal Air Force was confined to only 18 hours of dual flying in the university air squadron before the RAF decided that a 6 ft 5 in, substantially framed gentleman in a flying helmet and a Chipmunk were completely incompatible.

Over the years, my constituency has led me to speak frequently in the Army debate, the Royal Navy debate and the defence estimates debate, although infrequently in the Royal Air Force debate. We have had Chatham dockyard in my constituency, and we still have the Royal School of Military Engineering. I believe that the nearest RAF establishment was at RAF Detling, which is quite a long way outside the constituency, but we do have a substantial interest in the defence industry.

Shorts started its life in the Medway towns, and we still have one of our leading-edge technological firms in GEC-Marconi Avionics. There is scarcely a procurement project that does not involve GEC in some consortium or other, and I make no apologies for pushing its claims for the replacement maritime patrol aircraft. I think that it offers the only new aircraft among the three contenders. The idea of refurbishing a 25-year-old airframe appears highly speculative.

I have visited GEC. The company has an impressive simulator of its mission system avionics suite. I understand that the combination of the P3 aircraft with GEC avionics makes a formidable contender for that contract. I hope that, when my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement takes that difficult decision—which I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre needs to be taken very soon—he will take into account the fact that that aircraft is likely to have a long service, and make up his mind as to which will be the best option for long service with economic through-life costs and so on, and not simply choose on the basis of a figure for initial purchase.

My final point concerns married quarters. A substantial garrison is situated in my constituency—although it is not a Royal Air Force establishment—comprising several married quarters. My constituency home backs on to married quarters. Service personnel in my constituency are worried that, although my hon. Friend wishes to ensure that those who are entitled to married quarters should continue to have that entitlement, little has been said about availability. Entitlement does not guarantee availability.

I am particularly worried that we may build in unnecessary rigidities in terms of married quarters. I am concerned about potential purchasers' proposals to dispose of married quarters at the time of renewal if they wish either to develop the site or to offer a comparable alternative site. I am worried that comparable sites may be remote from the establishment that the married quarters serve, which could affect the ability of wives and families to find work in the area. If the purchaser decides to develop a married quarters town site—there is such a site in my constituency—alternative provision some distance from that site would involve substantial hardship for families.

I believe that the proposal should be rethought. I have seen my hon. Friend's letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier), who is very interested in the issue and had hoped to participate in the debate. I share my hon. Friend's concerns about the matter and I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to rethink the proposal to sell the entire stock.

I understand the problem caused by the 11,000 voids. Are those voids associated with closed establishments? Do they relate to married quarters that have no future use and could be sold off readily? Are they voids within established estates around existing and continuing garrisons, such as the one in my constituency? I should like answers to those questions. Some of those 11,000 voids could be sold in order to raise substantial capital, which would be sufficient to renovate some of the estates that I know are in bad shape. Some married quarters in the Medway towns are in a poor state and need capital spent on them. I question whether my right hon. and hon. Friends'' proposal is the best way of raising the necessary capital.

9.17 pm

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen): I am sure that all hon. Members will agree that the standard and the quality of the speeches in today's debate has been very high. That is due in part to hon. Members' associations with the Royal Air Force. My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) served in the RAF and my hon. Friend the Member for York (Mr. Bayley) spent some time with the RAF as part of the armed services scheme. The hon. Members for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), for North Tayside (Mr. Walker) and for Wyre (Mr. Mans) brought to the House a diversity and richness of experience that has made the debate particularly interesting.

In addition, a number of hon. Members have in their constituencies RAF stations or defence industries which employ many people. The Minister of State for the Armed Forces began the debate, quite correctly, by referring to the recent activities of the Royal Air Force in Bosnia—my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook) gave a vivid account of his experiences in the former Yugoslavia—in the Gulf and in Northern Ireland. Since the unfortunate ending of the ceasefire, the RAF has played a very important role—as it always has—in preserving peace in the Province.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth, among others, said, the world has changed considerably in the past decade and defence cuts were inevitable. However, the scale has been pretty enormous. The hon. Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin), in his capacity as Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence, said that morale has inevitably suffered because of the cuts. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) spoke about turbulence in the Royal Air Force, and the hon. Member for Ruislip–Northwood also mentioned those difficulties.

By the year 2000, the Royal Air Force will be down to 55,000 men and women. That represents a 38 per cent. reduction in manpower. I agree that defence is a matter of consensus, but at the last general election the Conservative manifesto stated:

"They"—

that is the Labour party—

"would devastate our conventional forces by cuts of at least 27 per cent. which would lead to huge job losses."

The Government have exceeded that.

The hon. Member for Wyre, who is not in his place, said that there was no need for another defence review. Tonight is not the time to go into the rights or wrongs of that, but some of the more devastating effects of the cuts might have been less devastating had there been a well thought-out defence review as we have suggested.

By March 1997, there will have been 8,600 redundancies in the Royal Air Force—the largest cut since the second world war. Many of those redundancies are compulsory and 5,000 of them occurred in the current year. Strike command is particularly affected, contributing the largest number at just over 3,000. My hon. Friends the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) and the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) all referred to the effect that that has on RAF stations up and down the country. Stations at Brize Norton, Lyneham, Brampton, St. Athan, Cranwell and others are due to lose considerable numbers of personnel. Some operational stations were better stocked in 1935 than they are in 1996.

I would like to give the House the first quote of the evening from the Royal Air Force News, which is a semi-official newspaper. This is what it said about the redundancies:

"Coupled with the fact that not all applications for redundancy have been accepted, this creates the seemingly anomalous situation in which some who want to go have been told they must stay while others who want to stay have been told they must go."

[Mr. Paul Murphy]

That is not right. If, instead of Treasury-led cuts, there had been a proper review of our defence in terms of resources and matching commitments, it would have been a different story.

I should like to quote the hon. and learned Member for Fife, from last year's RAF debate.

"I do not believe that we could contemplate any further reduction in funding for the RAF, without affecting its front-line strength. There is a limit to the reductions of the numbers of personnel or the contracting out of support services that can be made".—[Official Report, 4 May 1995; Vol. 259, c. 491.]

We all agree with those sentiments and a number of hon. Members referred to them this evening.

A year or two ago, Air Chief Marshal Sir Michael Graydon publicly disagreed with the Treasury—and then had to publicly retract that disagreement—when the then Chief Secretary to the Treasury, who happens now to be the Secretary of State for Defence, was asking for cuts. The air chief marshal was particularly concerned about the comparison that was made—presumably by spin doctors—with the Israeli air force. He is reported as saying:

"the Israeli comparisons were deeply misleading. Whereas the Israeli Air Force was simply defending its own air space and could mobilise reserves overnight . . . the RAF had to maintain bases as far afield as the Falklands, Hong Kong, Northern Ireland and Germany plus a NATO headquarters."

That is perfectly right. I sometimes wonder how such stories get about. Labour Members have mentioned and will mention again the advice that the Secretary of State for Defence receives. Perhaps some of these advisers were at last night's infamous party, and we wait for the Minister to give us some explanation of what happened there. I refer to Mr. David Hart, who, in The Spectator on 6 February 1993, attacked the RAF as top heavy,

"with too many command groups controlling too few front-line squadrons."

I do not deny that all sorts of people can have views on the RAF, but in an article in The Observer in January this year, Mr. Hart was described as

"unelected, without the responsibilities of a civil servant and lacking any military experience. Mr Hart is a millionaire property developer, failed playwright and novelist."

I hardly think that such people should be providing advice to the MOD and House of Commons.

I note that, in December, The Daily Telegraph, not normally a friend of my party, managed to discover a Christmas card sent out by Mr. Hart, on which he was dressed as a pilot. The newspaper said:

"For certain sections of the MoD, the sight of him tricked out as a fighter pilot is enough to curdle the bread sauce."

People such as Mr. Hart should return to their previous professions and leave giving advice to people in the armed forces and the MOD who know what they are talking about.

Mr. Hart was probably responsible for initially advising that we should lease American second-hand airplanes—which eventually did not come—instead of updating Tornado F3s. I am delighted that hon. Members on both sides of the House were responsible, I hope, for changing the minds of the MOD and Ministers, who sensibly take no notice of people such as that.

We have talked a lot in the debate about the relationship between the defence industry and the MOD and procurement. I hope that, in his winding-up speech, the Minister of State for Defence Procurement will make announcements on the replacement maritime patrol aircraft. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East and the hon. Members for North Tayside and for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) have all referred to that.

Perhaps the Minister will make an announcement on the future large aircraft. My hon. Friends the Members for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) and for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) talked at some length and with great feeling about the FLA, and my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside discussed its effect on his constituency, which I hope to visit fairly soon. I hope that the Minister will tell us what is happening. Has France announced that she will pull out of the programme? What will happen? Will he look into that? What pressures are there in the negotiations that are proceeding between ourselves and the French Government?

The right hon. Member for Northavon (Sir J. Cope), who has now left the Chamber, talked about the relationship between procurement decisions and the defence industry. As my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, West said, it is about time that we thought about that relationship. When the MOD makes decisions, they have enormous consequences for employment prospects, research and development and this country's manufacturing base. There is a unique relationship between the two. All hon. Members believe that that is the case.

My hon. Friend the Member for York in particular and the hon. Member for Wyre referred to the tragic and costly aeroplane crashes. I understand what the Minister was saying: that there is not necessarily a link between the 11 crashes. They have cost lives and nearly £200 million. We must consider the fact that that compares with an average annual loss of 14.2 aircraft between 1991 and 1995 and that the losses occurred in a front-line fleet that is approximately one third smaller than in 1991. I do not know whether training cuts or "over-stretch" have anything to do with it. I do know this. When the individual inquiries are opened, it will behove the Ministry of Defence to consider the incidents as one to discover whether there is a link. If there is, Ministers should tell the House what must be done. We cannot answer those questions.

My hon. Friends the Members for Warley, West and for Alyn and Deeside mentioned RAF St. Athan, which is also of interest to me as a Welsh Member of Parliament. We have been told that market testing is important to cut costs and ensure that money is properly spent. That may be true in some cases but has proved devastatingly wrong for St. Athan. The Minister has a duty to the House and the nation to say exactly how much money taxpayers must provide to pay for what has happened there.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces referred to the Bett report in respect of married quarters. I assume that the House will be informed of the Government's response before the summer recess, because that report is of enormous importance to all the armed forces and especially to the RAF. Pensions are a significant and worrying issue. On 30 May, no fewer than five former Chiefs of the Defence Staff wrote to The Times to express their concern about service widows in particular. I hope that the Minister will take those views into account. As he knows, the value of the pension has dropped since 1980. The immediate pension for personnel leaving at age 40 has been justified by the need to compensate them for their low salary expectancy in civilian life.

Sexual harassment in the armed forces is of concern to many hon. Members. The Government should produce reliable figures and tackle the problem seriously if they are genuine about wanting to attract more women to the armed forces and to the RAF in particular. There is no excuse for harassment, which should be dealt with effectively. In 1995 there were 10 reported cases, four of them in the RAF. Those were only official complaints. No central record is kept. All complaints should be recorded. I have no doubt that many women are afraid to complain about harassment, so proper methods should be introduced to make it easier for women to express their concerns.

The hon. Members for Wyre and for Gillingham spoke of the significance of the RAF. The Chief of Air Staff has said that the Air Force is at the heart of national security. We all agree. We are familiar with the problems that change has brought and sympathise with personnel who have lost their jobs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, North made an important point about sustainability. We must plan for not just the next two, three or five years but for decades ahead, which requires much thought and a proper defence review. The move to the contractorisation of support services, and to reducing stocks of spare parts and ammunition, carries elements of risk. There are other areas of concern.

We have not ended the review of the Royal Air Force or of the other armed services, because the world has changed and will undoubtedly continue to change. A number of hon. Members, including the Chairman of the Defence Select Committee, said that we live in a highly dangerous world—more dangerous in a way than in the days of the cold war. I believe that the United Kingdom's role will be centred on our international obligations as a member of the United Nations and, of course, as a key member of NATO. The RAF will play its important role in that, as it has done in the past.

It is significant that we are debating the RAF on the anniversary of D-day. It is significant that my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth talked about a medal for Bomber Command, because all hon. Members—particularly those of my generation—owe a great debt to all the men and women who served in the RAF in those years. We pay our warmest and most sincere tribute to them.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. James Arbuthnot): This has been a valuable debate. It has raised such a large number of issues of considerable importance that, inevitably, I shall not be able to deal with them all in the time available. I apologise for that. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forced or I will write to hon. Members whose points remain unanswered.

I have received a number of requests for contracts, for visits and for information. I think that the most delightful was the request from my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) that he not be forced to retrain on a different aircraft. I have bad news for him, because the Bulldog aircraft is used to provide university air squadrons and air cadets with air experience flying. Earlier studies suggested that there were potential value-for-money benefits in replacing the Bulldog early. That process is now under way. It is a private finance initiative project, and we aim to secure the best value for money achievable through a negotiated contract.

Mr. Frank Cook: Is there any truth in the rumour that the Bulldogs will be replaced by Sopwith Camels?

Mr. Arbuthnot: That remains for negotiation.

We aim to place a contract in 1997, so it is likely that my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre will have to retrain fairly soon. I suspect that he might like to do so in a Sopwith Camel, but he is a young man and I know that he will make it through without any difficulty.

We have heard some outstanding speeches in this debate, including those from my hon. Friends the Members for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes), for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), for North Tayside (Mr. Walker), for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington), for Wyre and for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), and from my right hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Sir J. Cope).

My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) made a powerful speech, which we have come to expect from him as Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence. One of the important points he made was the value that this country receives from buying equipment—as we sometimes do—overseas and from industrial participation coming into this country, making use of outstanding British skills and providing jobs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside also raised the issue—as did the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) and my hon. Friends the Members for Aylesbury and for Gillingham—of the married quarters estate. I am happy to accept the invitation of my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside to dispel the misapprehensions that surround that issue. He referred to a recent letter of mine, in which I said:

> "Misapprehension number one. It has been suggested that recent rises in Married Quarter charges are somehow linked to the Sale" of the married quarters estate,

> "almost as though there were some 'hidden agenda' to discourage Service families from living in married quarters".

That is absolutely not the case. We have no intention whatever of discouraging accompanied service. Obviously we will not force people to live in married quarters. We must recognise that many personnel have an understandable wish to live in their own homes, which we could not and should not sensibly try to frustrate. We are completely committed to the value of "the patch", to the value of cohesive communities and of mutual support, which do so much to foster the service ethos and to reduce unnecessary worry about families left behind when the services go overseas.

We are committed to providing the right quarters in the right places for service families who wish to exercise their entitlement. Charges for quarters—here I deal specifically with an issue that was very inappropriately raised by the hon. Member for Warley, West—are recommended not by the Ministry of Defence or by the Treasury but by the Review Body on Armed Forces Pay, a fully independent body whose independence should not be impugned or doubted.

[Mr. Arbuthnot]

Also in my letter I referred to the second misapprehension:

"It has been suggested that the Sale will lead to the break-up of Service communities, and the introduction into Service housing 'patches' of undesirable neighbours."

That is not so. The real issue is how to reduce the high vacancy rate in MOD homes while at the same time keeping down social tensions, but that is going to be a challenge whatever happens to the estate.

Several hon. Members, including the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) and my hon. Friends the Members for Wyre and for Gillingham referred to the possibility of selling the surplus homes we already have. I agree that, if it were possible to continue to pursue the policy that we have been pursuing for a number of years, and if it had the effect that we would all like, we would do so, but, unfortunately, that policy has proved unsuccessful.

The change that occupants of the married quarters estate can expect from the transfer that we are proposing is that significantly more money will go to the upgrading of quarters where standards are poor. Without the sale, of course we would try to find the money and do our best as far as the money would stretch, but only a sale can give us the sort of capital injection we need to get what we want within a reasonable time scale and without it being subject to the ordinary and inevitable pressures of the public spending settlement.

The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) asked about RAF Carlisle. I have two pieces of news for him. First, there is no market testing at RAF Carlisle. As he knows, we are closing the site progressively and looking for expressions of interest in it, but no decisions have been taken about the most appropriate means of disposal. Secondly, we have had no requests to store bonemeal at RAF Carlisle and, under current plans, no bonemeal is likely to be stored there.

Mr. Martlew: I am grateful for the Minister's remarks, and my constituents will be, too. However, is it not a fact that the MOD has said that it will withdraw from the joint venture and be subjecting the site to market testing? I have the minutes of the meeting in question if the Minister would like to see them.

Mr. Arbuthnot: I do not want to create any confusion in the hon. Gentleman's mind. Market testing is very different from asking for expressions of interest in the site. As I said just now, we have not made any decisions about the appropriate means of disposal of the site. When we start to make decisions, the hon. Gentleman will of course be one of the first to know.

The hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) made an interesting speech. He suggested that defence was a matter of consensus. I have news for him, too: the consensus is that Labour cannot be trusted on defence. Labour is committed to a fundamental defence review. That is no more than a device to cloak the party's desire, driven by Back-Bench and conference pressure, to cut defence spending. A review would cause precisely the instability that the armed forces wish to and must avoid, which the hon. Member for Stockton, North (Mr. Cook), in an excellent speech, said that he did not want.

At the end of the last decade, the right hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) believed that all nuclear weapons should be removed from British territory. That position remains the gut feeling of the Labour party. Labour's problem is that defence is simply not one of its spending priorities. It would be its natural target for cuts to pay for things that are priorities.

One need only look at the letter from the Transport and General Workers Union, which has sponsored the right hon. Member for Sedgefield and one or two other prominent members of the shadow Cabinet. It calls for defence spending to be reduced from £22 billion to £4 billion. That reflects the genuine views of many Labour Members. I exempt from that accusation several Opposition Members who have spoken in this debate, including, for example, the hon. Members for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) and for Stockton, North, who have always taken a very sensible view on defence. Unfortunately, that view is not shared by the majority of their party.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister accept that, year after year, the Labour party has made it clear that it is fully committed to membership of NATO? Does he also accept that over the past few years his party has sought to create division in the House of Commons in public party political utterances, but is desperately eager to present a united front when dealing with the Western European Union, the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe, and so on? He cannot have it both ways. The Government cannot have our co-operation when we are abroad in serious debate and expect to play silly party games of the sort that he has just indulged in.

Mr. Arbuthnot: The hon. Gentleman is a valiant defender of defence, but he is a rare voice in his party. He asks what was happening year after year, and I will tell him. Year after year, Labour party conferences called for cuts in defence spending and for the removal of nuclear weapons. That is what the Labour party believes in.

Mr. Spellar: As has been pointed out to Ministers a considerable number of times, their Government have been implementing those cuts. Indeed, the Minister has not yet answered the question posed by my hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) about the level of cuts in the RAF being greater than those that the Conservative party claimed at the last election would take place under Labour. That is the reality: the Government say one thing and do another.

Mr. Arbuthnot: That is nonsense. The problem is that the Labour party does not believe in defence. It believes in a number of different concepts, and defence comes at the end of the queue for spending. It might be a good idea if I moved on—[Interruption.] I think that I should move on to more sensible policies than those of the Labour party.

The House has taken the opportunity today to reaffirm the vital role played by the Royal Air Force in support of the United Kingdom's security interests. The Government are firmly committed to providing the men and women of the Royal Air Force and their civilian support with the means necessary to fulfil that role. There can be no question but that the effective use of air power continues to be vital in the changed strategic setting that we face.

We have moved away from planning for defence against the monolithic threat that the Warsaw pact represented. Now we need to be ready to respond to the many and varied risks to our security that might arise. It is necessary to consider only the crises to which our forces have reacted in recent years to realise the breadth of possible tasks.

In the Gulf, we were part of the largest allied operation since the second world war, which successfully liberated a friendly country from unprovoked aggression. In Bosnia, we worked to safeguard the supply of vital humanitarian aid to civilians caught up in a tragic civil war. We form the second largest contingent in the NATO force which ensures the peace.

At the same time, we have maintained our commitments to the defence of our territory and our presence in the dependent territories, as well as our continuing commitment to NATO. The withdrawal from Bruggen by 2002 will enable the RAF to make more effective use of time available for training and does not in any way imply a weakening of our commitment to the alliance.

The operations that I have mentioned are examples of the wide range of missions that the RAF of today carries out. The importance of different facets of air power has been clearly demonstrated and we must be prepared to ask the RAF to perform those and many other kinds of duties in the next few years and into the new century.

I should like to take this opportunity to record my personal gratitude to the personnel of 5 squadron at RAF Conningsby, who afforded me the privilege of taking a flight in a Tornado F3 just before Christmas. The hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East was right when he spoke about white knuckles. I was able to see for myself, when my eyes were not shut, the brilliance of our Air Force pilots, who are rightly respected the world over, and the formidable power of the F3 as an air defence fighter.

The importance of "Front Line First" was founded in the need to develop the right support structure for the new kinds of forces that we need for the 21st century. We are seeing a worldwide progression towards smaller but more capable forces. Quality is of ever-increasing importance as quantity reduces.

The reform of the RAF logistics community has meant enormous efficiency improvements and savings. New management systems building on best commercial practice have been effective in promoting better management of stocks, without compromising either safety or the RAF's ability to respond to contingencies.

The "Competing for Quality" programme has generated further efficiency improvements. Across the Air Force, more than £155 million-worth of business has been market-tested, generating £41 million of savings. That is crucial, because, by bearing down on the costs of support for the front line, we have managed to sustain increased investment in Air Force equipment within a stable defence budget.

We aim to identify, and realise, the full potential for improving long-term value for money in defence support by systematically exposing all RAF non-core activities to private sector involvement. Significant "Competing for Quality" programmes in the near future include that at RAF Sealand, which the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) mentioned, and that at RAF St. Athan. Both those programmes are proceeding well.

The Air Force has been active in pursuit of the opportunities offered by the private finance initiative. Many Air Force projects, at varying stages of maturity, have been identified as having potential for PFI. Those include the provision of simulators and associated training, and the replacement of the Bulldog elementary flying trainer, which I mentioned in connection with the speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre. It was also mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside, who has such a valuable contribution to make in all matters concerning cadets. Other projects with private finance initiative potential include the provision of utilities at various RAF stations.

As a result of "Front Line First", CFQ, PFI and other initiatives—I am sorry about all those initials, Mr. Deputy Speaker: CFQ stands for "Competing for Quality"—we are now able to devote a greater share of our resources to providing the right modern equipment for the RAF's front line. By the end of the decade, Logistic Command's expenditure will fall from one third to one quarter of the RAF's budget, yet, as a result of efficiency improvements, we shall be able to continue to support a front line for which equipment expenditure is expected almost to double by the turn of the century. That is a remarkable achievement. The RAF will be smaller than in the past, but it will be prepared for 21st-century military combat.

The sheer breadth of the forward equipment programme demonstrates clearly our commitment to that vision of highly resourced, flexible and responsive air power. All areas of the RAF's front line will benefit from massive investment in fighting equipment, which will amount to nothing less than a technological revolution in the RAF's inventory.

Much has happened since the House last had a debate on the Royal Air Force. Important progress has been made on a number of major projects, including the Eurofighter, which several hon. Members have mentioned. Following upgrades, the first two development aircraft resumed flying in May 1995. Those were joined shortly afterwards by the third development aircraft, which is fitted with the EJ200 engine specially developed for Eurofighter. The flight test programme has now notched up over 160 sorties, steadily expanding the aircraft's performance envelope. Last month, the aircraft made its debut at a major international air show when it took part in the flying display in Berlin, and it is expected to appear at Farnborough later this year.

I announced on 5 March that we have decided to upgrade the weapons systems of the Tornado F3, and that was welcomed on both sides of the House. That programme will enable the aircraft to carry advanced short-range air-to-air missiles and advanced medium-range air-to-air missiles, and will thus improve the F3's capability against modern airborne threats.

Also during the past year, we have signed a contract with GKN Westland for 22 Utility EH101 medium support helicopters for the RAF, and another with Boeing for 14 new-build Chinooks. Together with the programme to upgrade our existing Chinook fleet to HC2 standard, which has now been completed, those programmes will provide the RAF with a flexible and highly capable support helicopter force, which is vital for the support of joint operations.

The first Hercules C130J aircraft, 25 of which will be delivered to the UK from 1997 onwards, had a successful maiden flight in April this year. I listened with care to the interesting points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood about strategic lift and the C17. We have joined the United States production programme for an upgrade to the radar system of the E3D Sentry airborne early warning aircraft. This will ensure that the RAF maintains an effective early warning capability against modern aircraft and missiles. Within the tanker fleet, all but two of the VC10 aircraft undergoing conversion to the air-to-air refuelling role have now been delivered.

The programme to update 142 Tornado GR1 interdictor strike aircraft to GR4 standard is progressing well. This will greatly increase the aircraft's ability to prosecute its targets in all weathers, using new generation smart weapons. The first Tornado GR4 aircraft will enter service in 1998, and the aircraft will remain the UK's front line attack aircraft for another 20 years. We have also undertaken a programme to improve the capabilities of the Jaguar—a matter referred to by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East—pending its replacement by Eurofighter in the next decade. That has involved giving the aircraft a thermal imaging and laser designation capability, together with certain enhancements to the aircraft's avionic systems. Twelve aircraft have been upgraded as part of the initial programme, and we expect the remainder of the long-term fleet to have completed their upgrade by 1998.

Of great importance in the near future are the competitions to provide the RAF with new air-launched, stand-off and anti-armour weapons. The conventionally armed stand-off weapon was mentioned by the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross) in relation to the work by Shorts that is going into one of the contenders for that programme. These weapons will significantly enhance our capabilities against high-value infrastructure assets and modern armoured vehicles respectively. We expect to announce our decisions shortly.

In December last year, we issued an invitation to tender for the future medium-range air-to-air missile, which with the advanced short-range air-to-air missile will provide Eurofighter's key weapons for the air defence role. We also expect to announce shortly the winning bid in the competition to supply a replacement for the RAF's aging fleet of Nimrod maritime patrol aircraft. [Interruption.] I say "shortly", because I have been asked whether the decision will be made before the recess. Unfortunately, I do not know when the recess will be. I shall address my inquiries to the Refreshment Department, which always seems to find out before Ministers.

The maritime aircraft proposal was referred to by my hon. Friends the Members for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason), for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. Hargreaves), for Wyre, for Romsey and Waterside, for Ruislip-Northwood, for Gillingham and for North Tayside. My hon. Friend the Member for North Tayside correctly said that the most important thing was to buy the right aircraft.

We have continued to work with industry and our partner nations within the future large aircraft programme to ensure that we can rejoin the project, provided that the conditions we set out in our announcement in December 1994 are met. That matter was mentioned by the hon. Members for Warley, West, for Wentworth and for Alyn and Deeside, as well as by my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre. We await clarification of the French position. It is not wimpish to do that, as the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside suggests. The French position is crucial to the future of the project.

Looking slightly further into the future, we are examining how we might best meet the requirement for an airborne stand-off radar system to support land-based operations. There are several significant decisions to be made in the near future. Expenditure on equipment for all three services as a proportion of the defence budget will rise over the next decade. This coincides with a period of change within the defence industrial sector itself, and will be of great benefit to British jobs and firms that rely on that sector. In our reply to the report of the joint inquiry by the Select Committees on Defence and on Trade and Industry, we gave several important pieces of evidence and I do not need to repeat them.

In answer to the thoughtful speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Northavon, I agree that we need to collaborate more with Europe, but not at the expense of collaboration with the United States, which is an important partner.

The equipment programme that I have outlined displays clearly the Government's firm and lasting commitment to the Royal Air Force. We will ensure that RAF personnel are given the training, equipment and support that they need to do the job. The whole country can take pride in the Royal Air Force.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Computer Systems (Century Date Change)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Dr. Liam Fox.]

10 pm

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): This is my second attempt to raise a matter that should concern everyone who has or uses a computer. Thus it is one that will concern most businesses and all Government Departments, not just in this country but throughout the world. It is the effect that the change of date at the turn of the century, from 1999 to 2000, will have on computers. Quite simply, if they are not prepared, they will fail.

Articles in computer magazines and, more recently, in the national press have sensationally described the situation in terms such as "Millennium Meltdown", "Catastrophic Computer Crash" and "Doomsday 2000", and I have been prompted to pursue the matter in the House. I asked a question of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister last December; I have sent a series of written questions to every Government Department—most recently, to my hon. Friend the Minister for Science and Technology; and I have corresponded with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. It appears that I am the only hon. Member to pursue the matter thus far, and the publicity that I have provoked has produced expressions of relief that, at last, someone is doing something.

I am pleased to have the opportunity tonight to enlarge on the problems, and I am sure that I am not the only one to look forward to the Minister's reply. I fully confess to being computer illiterate, a fact which may become even clearer during my speech, although I value the immense advantages that computers provide, and over the years I have been blessed with staff who have been fully educated to take advantage of them.

Computerisation of our parliamentary offices has enabled us, as Members of Parliament, to increase our throughput a hundredfold and has improved our ability to communicate with and respond to our constituents efficiently and effectively. No doubt those improvements will be as nothing compared to the promised revolution to come, when we are linked up to the Internet and the World Wide Web.

A constituent came to see me at my surgery last autumn to share his concern that neither business nor Government appeared to be aware of, let alone ready for, the century date change. Even I was able to grasp the potential seriousness of the problem, and my initial inquiries confirmed that my constituent's fears were far from groundless.

All but the most recent computers have been programmed to recognise a shorthand standard date format—dd/mm/yy—with two figures for the day, the month and the year. For example, my hon. Friend the Minister's date of birth would be given as 18/04/45.

Because memory is or was very expensive, programmers economised by cutting out the first two digits of the year—19—to save money and memory. Thus two-digit year dates exist on millions of data files used as input to millions of applications. Therein lies the problem. Those computers will recognise the double zero digits of 2000 as 1900. As a result, all calculations, logic and date-driven processes will fail to function properly at midnight on 1 January 2000. If my hon. Friend's computer does not recognise the century date change, it will show his age to be not 55, but minus 45 in the year 2000. I would not want that prospect for my hon. Friend.

All of us with personal computers can apply a simple test to see whether they will fail at the end of the century. We can set the date to 31 December 1999 and set the time at 23.58. We can switch off the computer and, after a few minutes, switch it back on to check the date. It should say 1 January 2000, but my computer said 4 January 1980. Some 95 per cent. of all personal computers fail that test.

The vast majority of our information systems are based on the original, faulty standard date format, which will cost billions of pounds to reprogramme. One estimate of the cost is put at £400 billion worldwide and £20 billion for this country alone; the cost to the United States Government will be $30 billion. Those costs are rising daily, as the shortage of skills available to undertake the necessary reprogramming and recoding is realised.

There can be no doubt that, unless organisations are prepared and have taken the necessary action, they will face catastrophic consequences, including a disastrous loss of trade and revenue—it is no exaggeration to say that some of them may go out of business very early in the new century. Many of them will have experienced a minuscule taste of what is to come on 29 February this year, as some computers did not recognise the extra leap year date. A piece of medical equipment in a hospital failed to work on that day.

I shall give a few everyday examples to help to explain the wide-ranging consequences of what might happen. The competitive position of many exporting companies will be severely threatened unless they have anticipated the problem in time. Any timetable for a 1999 single European currency will require new computer systems to be in place. Supermarket computers will fail to replenish stocks and will throw out existing stocks, calculating that everything will have gone mouldy on the shelves after more than 99 years. The time locks of buildings will be unable to recognise the correct date, so staff will be locked out and vaults will be open. Trains will not run because their control systems will be unable to say what else is on the track that day. Flights will be cancelled as computers in airport maintenance will have grounded all aircraft because they are 99 years overdue for overhaul.

The turn of the century will have similar consequences for the computers of Government Departments and agencies unless they have been properly prepared—the most obvious being the automatic payment of benefits systems and the pay-as-you-earn system that generates millions of tax returns.

Such a computer failure would affect our system of court orders, the child support maintenance system and car licence expiry dates. Traffic lights and school bells will operate their weekday schedules. Libraries will send out notices of fines for some seriously overdue books, and any programme that prints a date on a cheque or invoice will stop working properly.

The potential for disaster lies most in the financial sector. The interdependency of computers and the complex computer systems used in all financial transactions will create huge problems for City institutions. Even if their own systems have been reprogrammed and are working correctly, other firms with which they are dealing may not have had the same foresight.

A firm may be awaiting the processing of a derivatives contract in Singapore which, if not correctly processed, may undermine that firm's short-term liquidity. The huge sums that are transferred every day in settlement of bond, equity, trade or foreign exchange flows bring the danger of a systemic breakdown of the banking settlements system, which could lead to temporary liquidity crises, and perhaps bank failures.

London, as we know, is the centre of the global financial services industry, so it is vital that the UK takes a lead on this issue. Most major financial institutions will, I hope, have their systems in order on time, but interrelation of the industry means that all firms will have to be made aware of the seriousness of the problem. What assurances or policy proposals has my hon. Friend received from the Bank of England, the London stock exchange, city regulators and the European central bank to prepare the markets for 2000?

Last month, I tabled written questions to every Government Department to find out how they are responding to the problem. I was encouraged to learn that most Departments seem to be aware of it, but not all are treating it with the seriousness that it deserves. Many of the replies I received showed undue complacency.

I hope that their confidence is justified and that, with the advice of the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency—CCTA—and computer suppliers, they will be prepared for the century date change. However, because public sector systems are in general larger and older than those in the private sector, I should like to know my hon. Friend's understanding of the percentage and the number of Government computers that will need to be reprogrammed or replaced, and his estimate of the cost involved.

As my hon. Friend knows, I also tabled a question on his Department's recent survey of the problem in this country and the action that it will take to alert and help businesses to respond to it. In his reply, he said that the survey revealed

"a high level of awareness amongst IT directors of organisations."—[Official Report, 8 May 1996; Vol. 277, c. 152.]

How does that square with newspaper reports that only 8 per cent. of businesses have conducted an audit to assess the extent of the risk, and that more than 90 per cent. are failing to deal with it?

A recent survey of IT directors of major UK firms undertaken by the magazine Computer Weekly shows that most large firms are aware of the problem, but most are still undecided what to do about it. I look forward to learning from my hon. Friend precisely how the Government are alerting business to the problem and precisely what help and advice will be available, especially to small businesses, which I imagine will find responding to the problem much more difficult than larger corporations.

As one of the essential messages seems to be that the chain is only as strong as its weakest link, and most computers are dependent on others, it is not enough to adjust one's own computer and rely on others to do the same. Inevitably, there will be those who will not respond.

Is the problem not serious enough to contemplate, as the Singapore Government are doing, the introduction of statutory guidelines for businesses to follow? Perhaps we should consider following the example of the United States, which recently held congressional hearings on the problem. I urge my hon. Friend to read the testimony from that hearing, as it makes very interesting reading as well as being alarming.

Fortunately for us, it appears that, because ours is a more sophisticated information technology market, European companies are in a worse position than ours in planning for 2000, so I put it to my hon. Friend: is this not an opportunity for British skills to be exported abroad and to establish a crash course for those prepared to offer those skills?

It would appear that much has happened since I drew the Prime Minister's attention to the problem in the House last December; that the Government are taking appropriate action regarding the computer systems for which they are responsible, and are now alerting others of the need to do the same. I welcome that.

The century date change should be treated as the most devastating virus ever to affect our information technology system. The message from the debate must be clear. This is urgent. The majority of computer systems will fail if action is not taken, and the majority of companies are not aware of the problems they face. There are fewer than 850 working days left in which to take action. If action is not taken, companies will face enormous difficulties. This is one of the greatest challenges facing business management today. I look forward to my hon. Friend's response to a crisis that will face our national daily life in less than four years' time.

10.15 pm

The Minister for Science and Technology (Mr. Ian Taylor): I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) for raising this important issue on the Floor of the House, for pursuing it through questions, and for discussing it with me. I openly admit that he has informed my views on the subject. As Minister for Science and Technology, I have had the opportunity to discuss this with many people in the industry. This is a timely and necessary debate. It is surprising that a relatively simple issue can have such serious implications. I welcome what my hon. Friend has said this evening.

I join my hon. Friend in raising the alarm this evening, and I shall put it into context. Information technology is crucial to industry and to our competitiveness as a nation. The cost to the United Kingdom of not fully exploiting information and communications technology would be infinitely higher than the cost of putting this problem right.

I do not wish to understate the problem. On 8 May, in a written answer to my hon. Friend, I said:

"The longer it is left, the higher the likely cost of remedial work. I am urging all chief executives to discover now for themselves the extent of the problem in their companies."—[Official Report, 8 May 1996; Vol. 277, c. 152.]

My hon. Friend referred to awareness. Our survey with the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency showed that the awareness of the problem was higher than 90 per cent., but that action plans had not been put into place. That is the key point, and it is why I am so concerned about the issue.

My hon. Friend made some telling points about how the system could go wrong if the double digit at the end of the year throws up a double zero in the year 2000. For example, pensioners and others could lose their pensions and entitlements—or certainly not be paid them; centenarians could appear on primary school intake lists; all military and aeronautical equipment could be simultaneously scheduled for maintenance; thousands of legal actions could be struck out; student loan repayments could be scheduled as overdue; and 100 years of interest could be added to credit card balances. These things will not be particularly welcome.

Data could be sorted in the incorrect order. For example, the years 2000 and 2001 could be sorted ahead of 1997 and 1998, which could affect hospital waiting lists. In addition, housing allocation priorities could be wrongly assigned. There will be supply chain difficulties. For example, organisations with which a company exchanges data must have tackled the problem or errors will propagate through interconnected systems. If data are not shared, a company could survive the loss of a key supplier while it sorts out its IT system with difficulty.

In other words, it is vital that companies in supply chains take a mutual interest in attempting to eradicate the problem, to avoid a contagious disease. How long would companies survive if their customers could not pay their bills because their information system is not working?

Non-conventional information technology systems could also fail: process control; access systems, such as swipe cards which would appear to be outside the period of validity; air-conditioning systems that are pre-programmed; weapons systems—programmes using two-digit dates embedded in out-of-production chips will have a particular problem; and safety-critical installations in nuclear power plants and in air traffic control.

I have raised these points not to create a panic—I remind everyone that we are currently in 1996, so we have a while to go before the year 2000—but to alert people to the fact that action taken now is absolutely vital, because there will not be the opportunity to take action properly as the year 2000 approaches. I believe that some problems may emerge before the year 2000, which is why I am urging that audits are carried out into systems in various companies.

The resources will be needed to fix the problem. For example, for some of the older systems the COBOL-trained staff could become scarce and perhaps prohibitively expensive. Organisations may find that they no longer have the people or skills used at the time that their systems were built. The criticality of the problem is its scale: the billions of lines of code to search, the fact that the deadline is immovable—we know that it will occur after midnight in the year 1999—and the complexity and interdependency of the systems involved.

The suppliers of non-compliant software will need to be checked to discover whether they are prepared to fix the systems that they have installed or will walk away from the problem. We need to know much more about that issue or understand it much better.

Obviously, we need to be very careful in some aspects, such as the use of databases and spreadsheets that may have corrupt information in them, and which may not necessarily be understood by the people in companies who now work on them, because they will have been devised at an earlier period.

The predictions of industry experts as to what the problem is likely to entail vary hugely. Some say that 50 per cent. of information technology budgets will be spent on this problem, and therefore that money probably would not be spent on more constructive developments in information technology. There are estimates that, if the current rate of progress is maintained, at least half of companies will not achieve compliance by the year 2000, which will be an appalling tragedy for those companies, and, because they are interconnected, many others which have tried to be compliant. Obviously, some companies will go out of business if they have not tackled the problem, or not ensured that their suppliers have tackled it.

The cost is almost impossible to quantify, and I am very wary of putting a figure on it. My hon. Friend did put a figure on it which is a good deal higher than the figure given by Kleinwort Benson as quoted in the Independent this morning, which said that British computer users might have to spend £5 billion in the next few years on finding remedies to the problem. I shall not validate that figure; I merely pass it on as having appeared in the morning paper.

As a point of comparison, the Computing Services and Software Association members' revenues in 1994 were more than £7 billion. Those figures are increasing very sharply, and of course they are only a small part of the problem. We must consider not only software but mainframe hardware, which may need minor modification.

We need to examine operating systems, especially IBM, MVS and UNIX, ICL, VME, Digital VMS, DOS, Windows and so on, and we need to examine the application software. We need especially to consider companies who have installed bespoke or in-house applications, which could present the biggest problem if the people who installed it do not now work for the company or are unable to remember the keys and codes that were put into the system.

Let me say a few words about action. Within Government, the CCTA has written to all Government Departments, alerting them and requesting details of the remedial action being undertaken; and all new information technology procurements in Government and let through the CCTA must be millennium-compliant. Our systems in the Department of Trade and Industry are being reviewed. We have appointed consultants to plan a programme of work to make necessary changes to all systems to make them compliant by the year 2000; they will also work with our suppliers.

We have set up a departmental management group. In at least one of our systems in the DTI, we have a four-digit year, which is therefore not sensitive, but of course there are many other systems, and I repeat that our suppliers may have systems that are not compliant, so we have a considerable issue to resolve.

As to the private sector, I urge chief executives not to leave the matter to their information technology managers. I do not question the excellence or the expertise of those managers, but it is a management problem that must be dealt with at the top.

Chief executives of all companies of every size should conduct a demonstration of their computer system. They should set the computer clock at just before midnight and see what happens when it changes for 2000. They will then find out whether they have a problem. If they have no problems—which I would find surprising—they must ensure that their suppliers and others who access their computing software do not have any. The situation must be managed, and the sooner the better.

The Government cannot do it for them. It is no use companies coming to us in 1999 and saying, "The Government have not fixed it." The Government did not install the computer software. Failure to deal with the problem could lead to commercial collapse—I put it bluntly because I want to get the message across. We cannot move the deadline, so time management in the interim is crucial.

In order to signal to business the seriousness with which the Government view the problem, I have written to the Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors, the National Computing Centre, the Federation of the Electronics Industry, the Computing Services and Software Association, the Federation of British Electrotechnical and Allied Manufacturers Associations, the British Computer Society and the Worshipful Company of Information Technologists, in order to meet and discuss the impact of the problem and try to find a way forward.

The Computing Services and Software Association—the lead trade association for the information sector—is working with the DTI to form a task force of users, suppliers and consultants, and the first meeting will be held before the end of the month. I stress that users must be part of the process. There is no point in only the software suppliers looking at the problem; users must be involved in the task force as well.

The DTI will publicise the growing body of help and information through its own World Wide Web site, and through business links and Government offices. The CSSA operates a World Wide Web site and business inquiry service which can put inquirers in touch with firms specialising in solutions to the problem. Guidelines on tackling the problem are due to be published next week. The CCTA and PA Consulting will be involved in that exercise.

Databases of millennium-compliant software are being compiled and updated, and conferences, seminars and workshops will be held. We shall contact interest and user groups. I am urging the trade associations, including those I have mentioned, to alert their members to the problem. The President of the Board of Trade and I launched the information society initiative in February. It is designed to encourage companies in this country to use computers, the Internet and electronic data interchange. We are not now discouraging them from doing so. It is not a question of not using information technology: it is a question of using it safely and of taking steps to ensure that new programmes are millennium-compliant so that the problem will not continually affect the system.

We shall provide advice through the information society initiative, while encouraging companies to use information technology. That item will be on the agenda for discussion at the multimedia industry advisory group, which will meet in the next week or so.

Trading and financial networks extend beyond our shores. We shall raise the matter with the European Commission, and we are considering what international organisation is best able to tackle the problem—whether it is the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development or the World Trade Organisation. There will be bilateral talks, including talks with the American Government, in view of their important role and that of the industry in that country.

Advances in technology are occurring so quickly that the problem may be resolved between now and 2000. New creative software packages may be designed that attack the problem at source. I am not overly optimistic, as many old systems must be dealt with. Nevertheless, I do not deny that there is a commercial incentive for someone to come forward with software that deals with the virus. We should be optimistic in that regard, bearing in mind the fact that computer power doubles every 14 months for the same price, the use of the Internet doubles every nine months and that we are seeing an explosion in information technology around the world.

It is inconceivable that anyone who is involved in the industry—be it as a supplier, hardware manufacturer, software creator or as a user—would wish to see the problem occur in 2000 and destroy so much creative effort and excellent information technology work. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the issue. I take it very seriously, and I urge everyone else so to do.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Ten o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Sport

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Knapman.]

9.34 am

The Minister of State, Department of National Heritage (Mr. Iain Sproat): I greatly welcome the chance to debate sport again, although there is something ironic about discussing the subject on a day such as this—when we should all be outside in the sunshine either watching sport or playing it.

I hope that the debate will range widely. After all, we have an extraordinary summer of sport before us. The test match season started yesterday, with England doing well; the European football championship starts this weekend; and the Olympics, Wimbledon and rugby league—which is turning itself into a summer game—lie ahead. There is plenty to discuss.

I will deal in my winding-up speech with points raised by hon. Members in all parts of the House, but I shall start by taking up the subject from the point at which we left it in our last debate on 27 October, when we debated the Government policy paper "Sport: Raising the Game". I will also tell the House the great deal that we have done in continuing the momentum that we started and describe our initiatives in respect of schools, the British academy of sport and the regional network of sporting institutes.

"Raising The Game", which was published last July, contained the most important set of Government proposals ever produced to encourage and promote sport in this country. It affirmed a commitment to putting sport at the heart of weekly life in every school and to re-establishing sport as one of the great pillars of education alongside the academic, vocational and moral pillars. The policy also emphasised the importance of sporting opportunities continuing after school, and it included specific and funded proposals aimed at building links between schools and sports clubs. The document urged further and higher education institutions to promote sport among their students, and it presented specific and funded ideas on how to improve the way in which we support and nurture talented sportsmen and sportswomen. Finally, "Raising the Game" proposed the creation of the British academy of sport as a pinnacle of a network of centres of sporting excellence throughout the country, to bring out the best in our top athletes.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Can my hon. Friend give an idea of the timetable for establishing the academy of sport, to which we all look forward and which is needed at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. Sproat: I am happy to answer my hon. Friend, although I will deal with the academy in more detail as I work through the Government's proposals in the same chronology used for the policy statement. Within the next couple of weeks or so, we will produce the prospectus for the academy, and then allow three months for any consortium or group that wants to bid for it to do so. Subsequently, we will take two months to consider all the bids and will announce our decision in November.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Blackpool, South): Has my hon. Friend seen the astonishing document produced by the Labour party on its proposals for an academy of sport? That document appears to quote representatives from a number of sporting organisations, but it seems that all that Labour has done is hijack comments in praise of the Government's proposals. If Labour has completely misunderstood Government policy in suggesting that we believe in a single academy, whereas my hon. Friend may confirm that the Government are considering a number of academies, perhaps Labour is trying to make bricks without straw and Cunningham.

Mr. Sproat: I did see some of those comments and I was extremely surprised. It is a great pity that individual sportsmen and women are hijacked into being political pawns. As far as I am concerned, this is a non-party political issue. It is not right to take the comments of some people out of context. I know that many of the athletes were extremely surprised—even angered—to find that they had been quoted.

I hope that by the end of this debate, the Labour party will understand that there will be a flagship academy of sport, which will be linked to regional institutes of sport and other centres of excellence around the country. It was clearly spelt out in paragraphs 77, 79, 82, 83 and 85 of our document that there would be a flagship academy of sport with a supporting network in the regions. Indeed, individual sports will have their own academies.

I want to tell the House what we intend to do next. Fist, we will publish a follow-up document to "Sport: Raising the Game", which was published on 14 July last year. We will publish the new document on 15 July—the first day of that working week—setting out exactly what stage we have reached in the intervening year. I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House will be extremely pleased to know how much progress has been made and how much momentum has been maintained in raising the profile of and increasing the opportunities for sport, not just for the champions, the medal winners or the players in international teams, but for every young boy and girl who is capable of deriving benefit from sport—for them, not just for our country's teams in the Olympics or the Commonwealth games.

I want to trace the pathway from young girl or boy through school to the local sports clubs and on to the centres of excellence and all the way up to the pinnacle of championship achievement at the academy of sport. I shall start with highlighting a little of the contents of our new report. The House will have to wait—albeit not with bated breath—until 15 July for the full details. However, I felt that as we were having this sports debate today, it was only right that the House should be given some inkling of what the Government have done and of what we intend to do.

Some people might ask why we start with schools. Sport in schools is probably the single most important element of our sporting strategy. I believe—as strongly as

I believe anything in politics—that sport is a fundamental part of education. We do not have sport in schools simply because it is healthy, although it is extremely healthy. We do not have it simply because it is enjoyable for most pupils, which it is. We have sport in schools because it is important that healthy habits are inculcated in young people at an early stage.

Health and enjoyment are important, but what is fundamental is that sport teaches young people lessons that are not so easily or so well taught in any other way. The behavioural lessons of discipline, especially self-discipline, courage, team spirit, learning to play with others and learning to live within the rules are all vital. If sport had been better taught in schools over recent years, I am sure that we would not have witnessed some of the recent outbreaks of ill-behaviour. That is why the Government start from the premise that sport in schools is important.

We are trying to combine a number of elements in schools to increase the quality of sport and the provision of sporting facilities and to improve the ability of teachers to train. I want to run through some of the mix of ideas that the Government proposed and are now carrying through. I shall try to give specific dates so that the House will realise that this is not just waffle about what we hope to do.

Starting with the coming school year, every school will have to state its sporting aims in its prospectus, which is published at the beginning of the school year; at the end of every year, when that school writes its annual report, it will have to set out clearly what it has actually done, what team games it plays—something that has declined recently—what other games are played, what other schools it plays at what games and with what results, what coaches it has, which teachers have coaching qualifications, what sporting facilities are available, what time the school devotes to sport, what links it has with local sports clubs and what links it has with local businesses to get sponsorship.

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): My hon. Friend's point about the time that schools devote to sport is very important. Has he studied the section of the national curriculum that deals with sport? Although it gives details of what children should be doing at each key stage, it does not clearly and specifically set down how many hours per week children should spend on playing sport. We could end up with wonderful statements but no definite results.

Mr. Sproat: That is an important point, which I had intended to raise a little later in my speech. My hon. Friend is aware that the new physical exercise curriculum, which was set in place at the beginning of this academic year, gives greater choice to schools to put more sport into the curriculum. Schools also now have greater choice to put other subjects into their curriculums. We have freed schools from some of the rather more restrictive elements of the national curriculum.

As I was saying, the school's prospectus and annual report will have to set out clearly what the school aims to do about sport and what it actually does about sport. Parents, governors, teachers and the wider community will be able to see exactly what a school is offering in sporting facilities and opportunities. Parents will then be able to make a choice. They will say, "Yes, we like this school's attitude to sport and we want to send our children there." That fulfils another virtue of giving people a choice and the necessary information to make that choice.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intends shortly to publish a policy paper on the arts. I hope that we will be able to achieve the same with that. We are not concentrating only on sport, vital as it is; we are going across the national curriculum to let people know what schools do so that parents can make informed choices about where to send their children.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) referred to the time schools devote to sport. One of the seminal moments in our whole crusade to get sport back into schools was when I met a group of education experts a couple of years ago. I asked them to tell me how many hours a week an average 14-year-old in the state system would spend on sport. It took me some time to get an answer from that gathering of experts, but eventually one said, "Well, Minister, about one hour a week PE." I said, "An hour a week PE! When I was at school we used to play a couple of hours' sport every day." The expert said, "Oh, Minister, I didn't say sport, I said PE." I asked him what distinction he was drawing. He said, "Of course, Minister, PE includes aerobics, dancing, stepping on and off low benches and lessons in the history of diet." Those are all very worthy, but with only one hour a week they do not leave very much time for the sort of sports most real people want. That was the moment when I became determined that we would change sport in this country.

In direct answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam: we want to see schools aspire to two hours of sport a week within the national curriculum and within formal teaching time and four hours of sport a week outside the national curriculum and in extra-curricular time, whether that is during lunch times, after 3.30 pm—

Mr. Harry Greenway: Or on Saturday mornings.

Mr. Sproat: Yes. I remember visiting a comprehensive school in Berkshire in which the rowing coach and his crews came in at 7 am and were delighted to do so. I believe that that spirit is being revived among teachers in our schools. That is the answer to the very important point on time, which is one of the specific matters that we are changing from this academic year onwards. The school year starts in September, and that is what we want schools to aspire to.

One of the other provisions that we are introducing is an annual series of awards for schools to be called the sportsmark. Schools will apply to win a sportsmark, which they can display in the school. It will say that that school has achieved a high standard in sporting provision and sporting quality. It might be helpful if I read out one or two of the criteria on which the sportsmark will be awarded. My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam will be glad to hear that the first criterion is to "Provide a minimum of two hours a week of timetabled PE lesson".

I know that that will be quite difficult for some schools because they have a timetable in which there is not the latitude and elasticity that they would like—but that is what they should aspire to.

The next criteria are to "Provide a minimum of four hours each week of organised sport outside timetabled lessons to all interested pupils.

3. Devote at least half the time spent on PE to both inside and outside timetabled lessons to games which should be played in a form judged appropriate for the year group by the relevant sports governing body"—

I must say, that is the type of jargon one must fight one's way through to get to the reality. It means that more pupils will be playing more sensible games, which they actually want to play.

The fifth criterion is that "Teachers and others involved in extra-curricular sport should continuously gain coaching qualifications or leadership awards".

The sixth criterion covers the point that I mentioned earlier in another context, which is that schools should "Have established links with local sports clubs" and

"7. Encourage pupils to take part in sports governing bodies' awards schemes."

Sportsmark invitations will go out this October, and the first awards will be made next April. It is something to show to schools and say, "Here are the standards to which you should aspire." The award is not only for schools that are best at sport but for those that improve themselves from a very low base. It will be a very real encouragement to all schools, because we know that many schools, particularly those in inner cities, do not have the facilities that we should like them to have. We are not saying, "Just because you do not have all those sports facilities you cannot apply for a sportsmark." To a large degree, the sportsmark will be awarded for effort, to those schools that improve themselves, given their facilities.

To summarise: the prospectus will set out to parents, pupils, teachers and governors what the school aims to do in sport; the amount of time that is devoted to sport must be increased; and there will be awards—or prizes—for schools that do well, by means of the annual sportsmark awards.

I now come to the issue of teaching sport. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) was a headmaster, and I am sure that he would like to say something about this issue, Madam Deputy Speaker, should he catch your eye. We are concerned that too many teachers do not have the qualifications for coaching that would most benefit pupils. Therefore, from now on—under the pilot project that will start this autumn—all teachers in teacher training colleges will be encouraged strongly to take coaching qualifications so that they are able to coach to a standard that is not tremendously high but which enables them at least to take a game of netball, tennis or football.

To assist with that goal and to put in some money, I have said that those are specific proposals and that they should be specifically funded. The Sports Council will put aside an extra £1 million for the National Coaching Foundation—to add to the £4.5 million that it already provides—to encourage the development of new modules to enable teachers who are in training to gain new coaching qualifications. That will apply to teachers in teacher training and to INSET—in-service training—teachers, providing them with the opportunity to go out and refurbish their coaching qualifications. Such refurbishment is currently a real problem.

Again, I am very keen that this debate does not appear to be party political. I fully understand that there is a very serious problem if working teachers have to take time out of school, particularly out of primary school, to refurbish their coaching qualifications or to gain such qualifications for the first time. If a teacher leaves a primary school to do a course, who will take his or her place? There are problems, which we are determined to solve.

Lady Olga Maitland: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for giving way on such an important topic. I wonder whether he can clarify one point. In the past couple of years there has been a debate over the fact that teachers who might be willing to give extra help with sporting activities say that they will do so only if they are paid extra money. Will he tell the House exactly what point we have reached in that debate?

Mr. Sproat: Yes. It is quite true that teachers feel that, if they are to do work outside the curriculum, they should receive extra pay. Some teachers very willingly do the work outside the curriculum without the desire for extra pay. However, there are opportunities for head teachers to give extra pay to teachers in those circumstances. It is up to head teachers to decide the matter. That is an important point, and I shall find out from the Department for Education and Employment to what extent advantage has been taken of the current opportunities to pay teachers more for doing extra work.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my hon. Friend agree that relations are enormously improved between teachers and those taught when teachers take teams and coach sport? It is a very good addition to school discipline, and teachers who teach sport successfully become leaders in schools and are often valuable people for promotion. Does he agree that people who take the trouble to become qualified to coach a sport—they should be qualified to coach such sports as soccer, basketball, hockey or netball if they are to be respected by pupils at secondary level—deserve an addition to their pay? Perhaps those are also the type of people who should at least be considered for promotion.

Mr. Sproat: My hon. Friend makes an extremely good point. I certainly agree that often teachers who have taken the trouble to earn extra qualifications demonstrate—by the fact that they wanted to do so—their wish to get on, their ability and their general stance, which very often is reflected across all their school activities. Of course they deserve to be properly rewarded. As I told my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam, head teachers already have the power to do so. It is of course up to each school to deal with the matter in the manner that it thinks best.

I mentioned the need to encourage strongly generalist teachers to obtain some subsidiary sport qualification. The need for secondary qualifications applies generally, but this is a debate on sport.

On the matter of specialist PE teachers, I remember one head teacher telling me some months ago about a very good PE teacher whose specialist qualifications—in an inner-city school—were in weightlifting and in canoeing. The number of girls—or boys—who wanted to do weightlifting was not substantial, and the only place where they could have a canoe was on the local duck pond. So although that man was a good PE teacher, in many ways his specialisms were not of the greatest use to the pupils.

Therefore, a change from the next academic year, starting in September, will be that all PE teachers will have to be able to teach one mainstream winter game and one mainstream summer game, so that the majority of pupils will benefit. Of course, teachers will want to maintain their interest in weightlifting and canoeing and should be allowed to do so, but pupils must come first and PE teacher training must be directed specifically to providing what is of greatest help to the pupils.

Thus, the amount of time spent on sport is to increase, teachers' qualifications will improve and we are setting up the sportsmark system so that schools can see how well they have done. In addition, we have to make certain that once we have set schools all these new standards, they are in fact met. The Office for Standards in Education has agreed to change its system of reporting. As of now, for the first time, Ofsted is going to report on sport within the national curriculum and on sport outside the national curriculum. Just as the academic side of a school has been monitored by Ofsted, so the sporting, or extra-curricular, side is to be monitored.

In January this year, Ofsted published an extremely valuable document on best sporting practice in schools. It set out details of what some schools are already doing, which other schools might like to copy to improve their sporting provision. In the forthcoming school year, Ofsted will also report on teacher training colleges to make sure that teachers are being trained correctly in a way that enables them to teach sport in school. There has been more than a suspicion that teacher training colleges have not all applied themselves as they should to ensuring that teachers whom they trained understood the importance of sport and were able to teach it.

Also from now on, the chief inspector of schools will every year issue a report on sport. That report will be laid before Parliament so that when we have debates such as this, as I hope we will continue to do once a year at least, we have before us the specific information that we need. In the past, some people have said that the teaching of sport is no worse now than it has ever been. It was extremely difficult to prove anything, but, clearly, standards have fallen, shockingly in my view. However, from now on we will be able to see how far they have fallen. I must pay particular tribute to Ofsted for agreeing to take on these new, extremely important and necessary tasks.

We must also ensure that the funds that we give to sport are targeted to the best benefit of schools. The report on how "Raising the Game" has been implemented, which is to be published next month, will also show how the sportsmatch scheme has taken them up. I have already mentioned how the Sports Council is devoting more money to sport, and new money is also being provided. Sportsmatch is a scheme half-funded by the Government whereby local sports groups—they might be schools—and local businesses get together to provide matching funding for valuable grass-roots schemes. It is one of our best managed schemes.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I can give my hon. Friend a perfect example of how the sportsmatch scheme is helping the grass-roots of sport. We have a brilliant new clubhouse for Malton and Norton rugby union football club on a new pitch on a new site. Sportsmatch provided £9,000 for floodlights, which was matched by £9,000 from local businesses. It means that in the winter months youngsters can train at rugby as well as the first and second XV.

Mr. Sproat: That is an extremely good example, which could be paralleled around the country. Only last week I was at a sportsmatch reception where scores of groups of young people and the businesses supporting them came together. At the time of "Raising the Game", sportsmatch agreed to set aside about a third of its money for school sports projects. In fact, it has done even better and gave some £1.8 million to about 200 projects last year. Half of that is old money redirected and half is new money from sponsorship.

I do not want to go into great depth about the national lottery although I am happy to go into as much detail as the House wants. However, we know that one of the problems with lottery money for schools is that it is extremely difficult for schools to raise the matching money. The general assumption might be that half of any money must come from outside or local sources and half from the lottery, but it was difficult for schools to find their half for any particular project. That was especially so for some inner-city schools. The Sports Council has said that from this autumn onwards projects for sports in schools can be funded up to 80 per cent. from the lottery. We learn by experience and make adjustments to achieve what we want without tying ourselves down with idiotic, bureaucratic regulations that bear little relation to life as it is lived.

When the report is published, the House will see what we have done about the difficult and contentious issue of the sale of school sports fields. It is my belief that although the Government gave schools the freedom to sell land with the best of intentions—in many cases, those good intentions were fulfilled—one of the unforeseen consequences was that too many acres of school sports grounds were sold. I am not making a party political point, and I do not see the Opposition spokesman jumping to his feet—I hope that he would not. The Government acted with the best intentions and the scheme was taken up by Labour councils which sold as many playing fields as any other councils. We all sometimes do things without foreseeing the consequences, and this was the case with school playing fields.

We put the matter out to consultation, asking whether local authorities, schools and sports organisations would agree that it was sensible that if ever it was proposed to sell school playing fields—there may be occasions when it is the wise thing to do—the Sports Council should be made a statutory consultee so that no school playing field could be sold without the Sports Council being able to say no and, in fact, having a de facto veto on the sale.

Mr. Harry Greenway: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way; I shall not intervene again. I am grateful to the Department of National Heritage and to the Department for Education and Employment for saving Elthorne school sports fields in Ealing from being sold by Ealing Labour council. I have to make a political point because I am also trying to save the Great Western Railway playing fields in west Ealing from development by British Rail or its successors. May I have my hon. Friend's help in this, too?

Mr. Sproat: My hon. Friend and every other hon. Member can have my help in protecting school playing fields when they deserve to be protected. I congratulate my hon. Friend on the campaigns that he has waged to make sure that school playing fields are retained.

I shall make a few final points about schools. I said earlier that one of the most important things is to ensure that boys and girls who have played sport, been good at it or benefited from it do not suddenly drop out of the sporting scene when they leave school. We are extremely keen to strengthen the links between schools and local sports clubs. The Sports Council has said that, from October onwards, it is setting up a challenge fund of some £2 million for which any school and local sports club can bid to fund any particular project to improve those links. Again, money is being retargeted to worthy aims.

"Raising the Game" said—I am paraphrasing, but I am paraphrasing accurately—that by the year 2000 every young person in this country should have good access to good sports facilities. That is a big and important promise, and it is meant to be; it is being carried out mainly through the lottery.

The Sports Council already has its sports fields register up and running. In September, it will begin a detailed audit of all sports facilities in this country, including inside facilities, outside facilities, synthetic pitches, swimming pools and leisure centres. Projects designed to fill gaps in provision will be funded by the lottery so that by 2000, we shall fulfil the promise that every pupil in every school will have access to good sports facilities.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Will the Minister explain his proposals a little more, especially in terms of how they will help schools in underprivileged and deprived communities? Such schools will find it impossible to raise even 20 per cent. of matching funding for a project because they are raising what funds they can towards basic school provision. Again, schools in such areas simply cannot find the resources to run the schemes once they have been provided.

Mr. Sproat: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. Again, I say quite openly that we learn as we go along. We set the target for the percentage of lottery funding for many projects too low in certain areas. The Sports Council has responded to that problem. I have mentioned that the percentage of lottery money for all schools projects is now 80 per cent. Even as we speak, however, the Sports Council has lowered the percentage to 10 per cent. for schools, especially for inner-city schools which do not have the money. The council can go further; there is no barrier on it and it can set whatever level of matching funding it wants. It will look at each individual case and see whether it should give more in a particular case.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) also made an important point about running costs. We have loosened the rules so that if it is clear that a capital project will involve running costs, they can be built into the money for that project, whether it is the building of a sports centre or a leisure centre. The costs of lighting, paying a janitor or whatever can be built into the project. The Sports Council will take all those detailed and important matters fully into consideration. An indication of the truth of what I say is how far it is already moving towards fulfilling the need to change the balance between lottery money and outside money. I do not, however, claim that that is the answer in every case and many schools will continue to have difficulty in raising matching funding.

On Tuesday, we shall publish a report by a working group that we set up under the chairmanship of Sir Roger Bannister, the legendary runner. Sir Roger's committee looked at the whole question of sports scholarships at universities. I have described some of the things that we have done to schools because I consider schools the single most important aspect. Sir Roger has looked at best practice in universities, at how they deal with sports scholarships and at what has to be given to sportsmen and women when they come to university, such as special diets and special training facilities. The report goes into detailed points such as the need for accommodation for sports scholars to be relatively near to the sports facilities that they require. It says that they should have guides, advisers and mentors who will take them through their university life.

But—this is a very important point—we are not going down the American road whereby anybody who happens to be good at sport but who may be absolutely thick with an IQ of under 50 gets a sports scholarship. We believe that sports scholars must fulfil the academic side of university life as well as the sporting side. It is an interesting fact, which I cannot say that I realised before I got into all this, that our present sports scholars at university get higher academic degrees than those who are not sports scholars. The discipline that sport imposes works its way through into the academic side. I recommend that hon. Members look at Sir Roger's very detailed, excellent report, for which I thank him most sincerely, when it comes out on Tuesday.

As I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North, this month we shall publish the prospectus for the British academy of sport and we shall then invite bids for it. Many groups, ranging from the British Olympic Association to universities and local authorities, have already indicated their interest. Everybody wants to get into the act and I am very pleased about that. Even those who are not part of whatever grouping is eventually chosen for the British academy of sport will have the chance to set up one of the important regional institutes of sport.

We hope that we shall have a decision in November about the British academy of sport. I emphasise that it will be a flagship institution—the best of its kind in the world. It will have the best training facilities, the best coaching facilities, the best sports science, the best sports medicine and the best biomechanics. Residential facilities will be available for athletes who want to stay at the academy and there will be scholarships to keep them there. There will be funding for the coaches. We have looked at all the different institutions in the world that are involved in such work and we have taken the best from each of them. That is what we shall put in our prospectus.

We shall have a pathway all the way from schools, through local sports clubs and local centres of excellence, right up to the British academy of sport. People who believe that their child has a real athletic future will know exactly what the pathway is. It will be properly funded and will have proper provision. There will be better teacher training for the schools and a British academy of sport to give the highest possible standards of facilities, training and coaching. I hope and believe that all that will mean that this country, which invented so many of the sports that are now played around the world and which developed those that we did not invent, will bring sport back to its proper place in national life. I hope that this time next year, we shall have another debate. We shall then publish another report to show what we have done in the preceding 12 months.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): We rejoice whenever there is a debate on sport, and of course we do so today. However, the debate is once more on a Friday and we know of hon. Members with a keen interest in sport who are unable to be here because of other commitments. I refer particularly to the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell), who kindly dropped me a note to say that he would not be attending. We all know that he loves sport and that he was a great participant. He has a long-standing engagement, but I am sure that his colleague, the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones), will be an able substitute and we look forward to hearing his speech.

My long-term adversary, the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle), is also unable to attend. He can always be relied on to make a lively contribution. I generally leave the Chamber with a few daggers in my back; at least I shall be saved from that. My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey) cannot be here because she is away on parliamentary business, so we shall not be able to hear her usual contribution. There are others who cannot attend on a Friday, so it is a shame that the Minister has not been able to break the mould of holding sports debates on a Friday, despite our urging him to do so. Perhaps he will have another go at persuading the Leader of the House so that we can have a larger attendance and, perhaps, more informed speeches as a result.

When the debate was announced, I welcomed it, believing that surely this time the Minister would give us a nugget or two, a gem or two or an idea or two that was different. Alas, we have heard the same old ideas, most of which have emanated from bodies other than the Government. Listening to the Minister, one would have thought that some other party had been in power for the past 17 years. We cannot avoid party politics. It may be regrettable, but we cannot get away from it in a debate of this kind. The Minister used words such as "encourage" and "strongly urge" and we heard, "We shall find out what the Department for Education and Employment is saying." That is all pretty woolly and we expected something different from the Minister. Nothing changes and I will point out later why the Department of National Heritage misses its own targets.

The Minister must not take my remarks personally. We recognise that he at least recognises—he has said so in his speech this morning—that his Government have been pretty awful in this matter. There will have been much rejoicing in heaven as a result of the Minister's conversion on the road to Damascus. The Opposition certainly welcome it.

Today's debate gives us the perfect opportunity to assess the state of sport almost a year after the publication of the Government's document "Raising the Game". I make no apology for blaming the Government for the deficiencies that the Minister highlighted.

The Minister will recall that, when we debated the issue last October, I gave a guarded welcome to some of the measures contained in that document. As I pointed out then, it was a patchwork quilt of good ideas, but it lacked overall strategic direction. Nothing has changed since then, despite the Minister's speech. In any case, the good ideas contained in the document were stolen from various bodies apart from the Labour party—the Central Council of Physical Recreation, the British Olympic Association, the National Playing Fields Association and the Sports Council. At least it was a start. After 17 years in power, having blamed everybody but themselves for the state of British sport, the Government finally issued a paper and, to be fair to the Minister, he has outlined out some of the deficiencies.

Some might say that it is better late than never, but we were promised a White Paper. In last year's debate, the Minister gave a spurious reason why the document was not a White Paper—that a White Paper would be too expensive for many people to buy—but that did not fool anyone in the sports world. The Government clearly intended to send a glossy document free of charge to as many people as possible, in the hope that they would not rumble the fact that the ideas were not the Government's own. As I said in last year's debate, we do not mind the Government pinching other people's ideas—indeed, we welcome it—but they should at least acknowledge them.

Mr. Hawkins: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. He might be interested in the reaction of one leading sports administrator to the Labour press release earlier this week. That very distinguished gentleman said:

"There is nothing new in Labour's proposals. They can't have read the Government document. They are trying to make political mileage out of nothing."

The hon. Gentleman hijacks responses to Government documents because he has nothing new to say.

Mr. Pendry: We do not know who that distinguished gentleman is. I was coming to the point that the hon. Gentleman raised earlier and has now raised again. We were told that the Government would be following up the document next month with "Raising the Game 2". It will give details of the progress that has been made in the past year. If that is the case, it will be shortest document ever published by any Government—not that there has been any unwillingness to assist the Minister on the part of teachers, parents, the voluntary sector, sports governing bodies, local authorities or any of the myriad of other groups providing sporting opportunities for young people. What is missing is the Government's commitment to back up even the meagre promises that they made in "Raising the Game".

What has been done in the past year? In March, the Minister decided that it was a good idea to release a press statement giving details about the progress that has been made so far. Let us examine what he said. The Minister promised a survey of sporting provision in schools to be published in April. Now we are told that it will appear on 15 July. Of course, we are still waiting for that survey. Given the slippages that have occurred in the past, we would be surprised if it came out on 15 July.

The Minister promised, following consultation, to make the Sports Council a statutory consultee on playing field sales, but the town and country planning legislation has yet to be amended accordingly. In any case, is the Sports Council the right body to act on playing field sales? It is, after all, a Government quango; surely a more independent body, and one dedicated solely to promoting the use of recreational space, would be the National Playing Fields Association.

The Minister promised more emphasis on team games when he knows full well that three quarters of the responses to the Government's consultation paper on making competitive games compulsory at key stage 4 were opposed to the idea. Even The Daily Telegraph considered that proposal to be clearly wrong.

The Minister promised extra support for élite athletes. That is a good idea, not least because it was proposed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who, as long ago as October last year, urged the Secretary of State to set up talent funds. It can be found in the Official Report of 25 October at column 1032.

The Minister will also remember that I wrote to him last year asking for more support for our top athletes. Although it is warming to know that the Government are paying close attention to our speeches and letters, it is a pity that the Minister did not respond to our initiative more quickly. Had he done so, the talent fund could have been up and running in time to help our athletes who are flying the flag in Atlanta this summer. Because of the Government's delay, however, gifted athletes will not have access to the funds until next January. That is an absolute disgrace. It will be far to late to help competitors who are in need now. I have written to the Minister urging him to assist further, but I have yet to receive a response and it certainly was not forthcoming today.

The Minister also promised a national junior sports programme. I welcome the Sports Council initiative to encourage participation by youngsters; however, that will put extra demand on Sports Council finances at the same time as the Government have knocked £2.3 million off the Sports Council's budget. The Government have demonstrated their support for grass-roots support by cutting the funding to a much praised initiative to which the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) referred—the sportsmatch scheme—by 15 per cent. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will make representations to the Minister about that. The Government's real agenda is to give with one hand and take away with the other.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Will the hon. Gentleman say where when he stands on team games? He seems to avoid commenting on team games while criticising what others have said. Where do he and his party stand?

Mr. Pendry: The hon. Gentleman generally takes a close interest in such matters; I am surprised, therefore, that he missed those gems from the Labour party. The Opposition have always been in favour of team games. However, we are not in favour of compulsory team games. We have always said that there should be a mix of games within schools. When certain Labour local authorities rejected the idea of team games, we made strong representations to them.

It is all right for the Minister to recognise the fundamental truth of the importance of sport in schools, but the Government's record fills me with dismay. As the Minister said, it is the most important part of the sport pyramid where children first learn about sport and develop their interest in physical activity, yet it is the weakest link in the Government's sport chain. That may well have something to do with the Department for Education and Employment.

Let us look at the facts. The latest annual report of Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools noted that in more 40 per cent. of primary schools, PE standards were not sound. That is backed up by the latest Office for Standards in Education report on physical education. Inspectors found:

> "Many primary schools teachers lack subject knowledge in physical education and are not confident that they can meet the requirements of the National Curriculum . . . Very few schools have adequate changing facilities."

The position does not improve by the time children reach secondary school where, according to the same report

> "Many schools have dirty changing rooms in a poor state of repair with inadequate facilities for showering."

What progress have the Government made over the past year to improve the conditions and standards in those schools? I suggest that it is very little. The Minister spoke about PE teachers. There are no free-standing physical education colleges left in Britain. According to the Health Education Authority and the Sports Council, the number of PE teachers has almost halved from 41,800 in 1977 to just 24,000 in 1992. What measures are the Government implementing to increase the number—the hon. Gentleman never mentioned numbers—of PE teachers back to the pre-1979 level? Surely that would be of major benefit to British sport.

The Secondary Heads Association reported that between 1987 and 1994 there was a decline of more than three quarters in extra-curricular sports fixtures mainly due to the increased work loads of teachers implementing the national curriculum. The Ofsted survey of good practice of PE in schools reports:

> "Any failure to regain fully the position of the early 1980s resulted from the decision of many non-specialist teachers in secondary schools not to return to involvement in extra sporting activities."

Since then, there has been yet another threat to extra-curricular school sports. I hope that the Minister is listening, because he must be aware of the statement made by the National Union of Teachers on 20 May threatening to boycott extra sporting activity. If he remembers, I brought it to his attention in Question Time on that very day and urged him to be proactive and bring together teachers and local education authorities to resolve the potentially damaging dispute.

Mr. Hawkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pendry: No.

The Minister did not reveal at that Question Time what his Department was doing about the problem, but he promised:

[Mr. Pendry]

"We shall have a chance to return to that and other matters when we have a sports debate on Friday 7 June."—[Official Report, 20 May 1996; Vol. 278, c. 11.]

Mr. Hawkins: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pendry: No, I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman.

Lady Olga Maitland rose—

Mr. Pendry: Here we are in the sports debate to which the Minister referred. I would welcome news on what action—the Minister promised it—he has taken in the meantime. As far as I am aware, he has done nothing. He has left teachers to resolve or attempt to resolve what could be a very damaging dispute.

Lady Olga Maitland rose—

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North–West): Order.

Mr. Pendry: The hon. Gentleman is not the Speaker. Perhaps that is what he is aspiring to—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Dame Janet Fookes): Order. The hon. Member for Newham, North–West (Mr. Banks) has a very long way to go before he reaches the office of Speaker.

Mr. Pendry: I did not realise that it was one of my hon. Friends who was trying to intervene. I am sorry; my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North–West (Mr Banks) could intervene any time.

Lady Olga Maitland rose—

Mr. Pendry: I shall give way to the hon. Lady because so far she has been very promising in this debate. She has been very penetrating and asked the Minister intelligent questions. I hope that she is as unhappy about the answers as I am.

Lady Olga Maitland: Does the hon. Gentleman think that teachers should be paid extra for extra-curricular work, or should they regard such work as part of their professional duty, just as a doctor or a lawyer would do work outside the normal requirements? Does he believe that teachers should be regarded as professionals and not demand extra money, or would he like to give them more money and, if so, how much? I would appreciate it if the hon. Gentleman would give costings on how such payments would affect the overall teaching budget.

Mr. Banks: Another penetrating question.

Mr. Pendry: Yes, but not so helpful. If the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) were to read some of the documents—as the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Hawkins), who is soon to be a candidate somewhere else and has stopped making so many references to Blackpool in his speeches, obviously has—she would know that we have already said that we believe that teachers, who have gone through some damaging hoops as a result of the changes in Government education policy, should be recognised for that extra work. We would be rather more proactive than the Minister's Department in having talks with the Department for Education and Employment about resolving the problem. [Interruption.] Conservative Members are being particularly naive.

The Secondary Heads Association has also produced evidence of a sharp decline in the amount of PE played in schools. In 1987, 72 per cent. of 14 to 16-year-olds did at least two hours of PE a week. By 1994, the figure had fallen to 25 per cent. The Government have made a wishy-washy commitment that all schools should—not must—offer at least two hours of PE a week. How many schools are able to deliver that promise today? Perhaps the Minister could tell us. I should like to contrast that with our commitment. We have said clearly that there should be a minimum of two hours' sport a week in the national curriculum, which is far more than the wishy-washy talk of the Minister.

What about playing fields? The Minister was very brave and raised the subject in his speech. He said that I was not jumping up and down, and I was not because he knows my position full well. I have raised the subject, but the Minister has still not answered my point. We all know that the Government like to pretend that the Department of Education and Science circular 909 has protected playing fields. The reality, of course, is the exact opposite.

Since the circular was introduced way back in 1981, the statutory minimum size of playing fields has been reduced, and, consequently, 5,000 have been sold off. Admittedly, Labour-controlled authorities as well as Conservative-controlled authorities have been given the option as a priority. Some authorities consider social services and other things a higher priority than the opportunity to sell playing fields. We will not give that opportunity to any council, whatever its complexion. We are going to scrap circular 909 so that nobody will be tempted to sell playing fields.

The Government have induced more playing field sales this year. Under regulations that they introduced in April after "Raising the Game", grant-maintained schools have been allowed to keep the full proceeds of asset sales—a policy that the National Playing Fields Association described as having "an inadvertent negative impact on school playing fields."

It went on:

"The simple position is that the only assets that schools have available for disposal are buildings and land and for the major part most buildings will continue to be required."

My research shows that a further 2,600 playing fields are under threat of development. That is some progress. A large number of playing fields that remain are being neglected because of a lack of resources in schools. According to Ofsted, a third are in poor condition, and poorly drained, badly maintained or distant pitches have a particularly adverse effect on certain sports in school. Many are a positive danger to our youngsters. One set of pitches where I took some former international footballers were in such a state of disrepair that they stated categorically that they would not allow their kids to play on them because it would ruin their careers before they had even begun.

I fully understand if such facts have escaped the attention of hon. Members because the information has not been made available. More than two years ago, on 12 January 1994, I was promised in a parliamentary answer that the national register of playing fields would be provided in the Library on disk. That would have made the information accessible to all Members. Unfortunately, it has yet to appear, and we have to go to the Sports Council to get the required information. When I have raised the matter with successive Ministers, I have been promised that the information would be made available in the Library in due course. I hope that, in his winding-up speech, the Minister will give a guarantee that the register will be made available to all in the Library without any further delay. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have a right to know what is happening in their constituencies. That is the real record of sport in Britain under the Government. We should judge the Government by their deeds and not by their words.

I should like to make another helpful suggestion to the Minister. If he wants to make the revised document more substantial and put meat on its bones, he should consult in the first place those from whom he hijacked ideas when he was formulating "Raising the Game" and, more important, talk to those whom he did not consult when drawing up the document.

Perhaps the Minister could make a start by having a word with local authorities. Despite being the largest providers of sport and leisure opportunities, spending more than £1.25 billion annually—25 times as much as the Sports Council—they received only a single fleeting reference in "Raising the Game". Local authorities could express their continuing concerns over the loss of the regional councils for sport and recreation and the two-way linkages that they provide between national, regional and local policy makers and providers. They could alert the Minister to the crucial role of local authority sports development officers, who act as a link between schools and clubs.

My council, Tameside, has been at the forefront of developing such initiatives by taking on a leisure education officer, employed by the education department but seconded to leisure services specifically to develop links between schools, communities and clubs. The Minister would do well to talk to officers and councillors on that council, and I would give him some contact numbers if he wanted them.

If the Minister does not want to head as far north as Tameside, he could follow my example and visit Haringey or Kent county councils' sports development units. Those excellent councils have set up schemes to increase sporting opportunities for their local communities.

Kent's unique project involves the county council working in partnership with local district councils, the Sports Council and the National Coaching Foundation, as well as voluntary, educational and commercial interests. Its aim is to promote sport throughout the county, focusing on facility development, enhanced coaching and higher levels of performance.

Those people would also urge the Minister to promote the dual use of facilities and open them up to wider community use, but that further development is being put in jeopardy, because of local management of schools and grant-maintained schools.

On a brighter note, I was pleased to see that in the Conservatives' local election publication, "Look", praise was heaped on some of the magnificent stadium facilities being developed around the country, such as the McAlpine stadium in Huddersfield, the New Den at Millwall and Middlesbrough's magnificent new Riverside stadium. I should add that all those benefited from local football clubs' being able to work in partnership with the private sector and, of course, with their Labour local authorities.

Could the Minister have a word with the disabled groups, which have produced some of our finest international sportsmen and sportswomen—

Mr. David Mellor (Putney): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Pendry: On that point?

Mr. Mellor: Yes, as it happens, on that point.

I am stimulated to say that I am glad that at long last, one hour and 10 minutes after it began, the debate is arriving at football. So far, we might have been forgiven for not realising that we are on the eve of the biggest sporting event to be held in this country for 30 years.

However, it is in no spirit of animus that I intervene on the hon. Gentleman. By all means let him say, with reference to those three new stadiums, that the football clubs concerned benefited from consultations with their Labour councils; but if we are to make such points, can we please deal with the subject properly? What about the councils at Portsmouth and Southampton, where clubs with derelict grounds wish to rebuild them? And what about what happened at Southend? I am not making a party point, because I cannot remember which party controls Southend, where—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am afraid that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is now beginning to make a speech. He will have to contain himself until his turn comes.

Mr. Mellor: I shall, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) knows the point that I am making—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry, but the right hon. Gentleman must resume his seat now.

Mr. Pendry: I accept what you say, of course, Madam Deputy Speaker, but the right hon. and learned Gentleman was attempting to make a serious point, which I have covered before, and it concerns us. I must tell him that the councils that he mentioned are, of course, Conservative councils which have blocked the developments—but there is a bigger and much more important point than a party political point to be made on the subject.

Hon. Members: Southampton is Labour.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): The development would be outside the city of Southampton.

Mr. Pendry: I do not wish to be diverted, although I would willingly engage in that conversation with the right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), a former Minister, who, I must say, was so important to football when he was in office. I gave way to the right hon. and learned Gentleman because I thought that he intended to refer to the disabled groups. That is why I asked whether he wanted to intervene on that point.

May I return to that most important subject—[Interruption.] I ask my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) to listen too. I know that he will attempt to catch your eye later, Madam Deputy Speaker. He knows his stuff, but I want to talk about the disabled groups now, because they are very important, and clearly they have not been included in the Minister's thinking.

As I was saying, those groups have produced some of our finest international sportsmen and sportswomen, whose achievements were not mentioned at all in "Raising the Game". Local government may have had one reference, but there was no mention at all of our disabled sports people. They are athletes of whom the nation should be proud, and I hope that they repeat their successes in this year's paralympic games. I shall certainly be cheering them on in Atlanta.

If the Minister were to ask those people, they would tell him of the need to appoint a representative on the United Kingdom Sports Council. He could assist in doing that, but he has chosen not to do so. There is also the British Sports Forum. I understand that the British Paralympic Association has written to the forum asking to be represented, but has been rejected. Perhaps the Minister could intervene to find out why it has been excluded. I understand that as yet he has failed to do so.

The two omissions that I have mentioned are the two clearest omissions from the original document. I would welcome assurances from the Minister this morning that he has fully involved both the disabled groups and the local authority associations in the revised edition of "Raising the Game" that we expect. In all likelihood, he will not be able to give those assurances, because so far as I am aware there have been no consultations whatever between him and either local authority associations or disabled groups. If that is so, it is disgraceful.

If someone had consulted the disabled groups, it would have saved the Government the embarrassment of producing the "Practical Guide for Disabled People", just published by the Department of Social Security, which contains totally incorrect information about the governing bodies of disabled sport.

The Minister will be aware that the Labour party has produced a blueprint showing how we envisage the new British academy of sport, which has already been mentioned by the hon. Member for Blackpool, South. Our blueprint was the result of a detailed consultation process with all the major organisations in British sport, and was launched last month to much acclaim from the world of sport.

We see a central academy providing generic services such as sports medicine and science, skill co-ordination, research and development, and so on. It would co-ordinate the activities of an enhanced network of services, focusing on the existing national centres of excellence.

Of course, as the Minister knows, the idea of a British academy was contained in the Labour Government's White Paper, so at least the principle is not a party issue. The Opposition recognise that there is no point in ignoring the achievements of what is already in place. We need to develop an integrated approach, and we can build on the strengths of the existing structure, and involve other areas of excellence.

The Minister could well join Steve Cram, the former world distance record holder, who does not apologise for putting his name to the idea, and Michael Whittingham, the British athletics coach, as well as the National Coaching Foundation, the Institute of Professional Sport, the Physical Education Association, the Central Council of Physical Recreation, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, the British Paralympic Association, and many others. On the day of our launch, we heard that the Minister was in line with our proposals, and he would have us believe that he has supported a similar proposal all along. He said so again this morning.

I shall quote from the Minister's article in The Daily Telegraph of 5 December last year, in which he outlined his vision of a single-site academy:

> "The Academy will be situated on, say, a 200-300 acre, greenfield site. It could be anywhere in the country but it would probably be best if it was reasonably central geographically and easily accessible. There would be accommodation for some 500 top athletes and their coaches. These athletes and their coaches could live full time at the Academy".

I say to the Minister, out of thine own mouth will I judge thee.

There was no mention at all of an enhanced network of activities, but that is hardly surprising. A spanking brand new academy with high-tech facilities and all mod cons, built on a green-field site of up to 300 acres, with full-time accommodation for up to 1,000 athletes and coaches, would take all of the £100 million allocated.

The Minister was clearly setting out his own vision of the academy before the consultation. From our own wide consultation process we discovered that the main problem of the existing structure is the fact that the centres are disparate and their activities lack clear co-ordination.

Mr. Tony Banks: Surely the academy does not have to be on a green-field site. There are many institutions that could be adapted to accommodate the sports academy. I believe that there is an excellent site in Redbridge, for example, for which proposals are being put forward. Perhaps my hon. Friend thinks that that would be a good idea.

Mr. Pendry: My hon. Friend is right. The academy does not have to be on a green-field site, and we do not say that it should be. We are saying that other areas could be considered for the academy, which would be slimmed down compared with what the Minister set his heart on at the beginning.

We all want our teams and individual athletes to achieve Olympic gold and to win international tournaments, so the headquarters should co-ordinate the United Kingdom strategy for excellence. To my mind, the best way of achieving excellence is by producing a national strategy delivered locally.

The ball is firmly in the Minister's court. We know that he has received the responses to the consultation paper back from the Sports Council, but that up to now he has been reluctant to publish them. When they are published, we shall welcome that very much. As he knows, I have re-tabled some specific questions to him about the academy. Late last night he faxed me a letter, with which

I shall not bore the House—but it is clearly a bit of a whitewash. We shall return to the subject in the near future.

Of course we must produce athletes to win—but not to win at all costs. I am pleased that Diane Modahl has now been cleared completely, but her case highlighted public concern about the use of drugs in sport. Unfortunately, that subject is likely to feature on the agenda at the Olympics this summer. I was concerned to read recently that the number of sportsmen and women failing drugs tests carried out by the Sports Council this year had risen by 15 per cent. over previous years.

Back in 1988, the then Home Office Minister—the right hon. and learned Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg)—committed the Government to bringing anabolic steroids within the remit of the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, and the Minister gave the House an undertaking during the last sports debate that the Home Secretary would shortly bring that about. Shortly afterwards, I tabled a question to ask what had been done. The Minister again said that the Government would follow the advice of their advisory committee and would control steroids very soon. But nothing was done until April, when the Government announced that they were outlawing the supply—but not the use—of steroids. The House will want to know why the Government have done a U-turn, as that is extremely important.

The right hon. and learned Member for Putney said that he was surprised that the European championships had not been raised so far in the debate, but I now wish to refer to the tournament. We are on the brink of the greatest sporting event to be held in this country for 30 years. The excitement generated by Euro 96 is palpable, and it is a great tribute to the perseverance of the football authorities, fans, the Football Trust, the police and local authorities that we are able to stage it at all, and their continuing hard work throughout the tournament will make Euro 96 the success it deserves to be.

The contrast between the efforts of those organisations and the neglect of the Government could not be greater. It is worth taking a few minutes to recall the lack of interest shown by the Government in the event right from the beginning. The Minister may recall that the launch of the bid for Euro 96 was held here in the House of Commons, shortly before the last general election. Because of the Government's lack of interest, it was left to me as the then chairman of the all-party football group to assist the FA in arranging for the then leader of the Labour party, the right hon. Neil Kinnock, to launch the bid with Sir Bert Millichip, Tom Finney and other football luminaries.

That was followed by the Open Goal conference in Birmingham in September 1994, organised by the shadow National Heritage team. Opposition Members were concerned that, two years after the bid was made, the Government were still not providing a strategic direction for the promotion of the tournament. The conference brought together for the first time the eight local authorities where matches were to be held, supporters groups, politicians from all parties, the FA, the Football Trust and all the other main players in the game—apart from the Government.

The lack of Government involvement in the championships cannot bode well for any future attempt by this country to host major sporting events, such as the Olympic games or the World cup. The international community does not expect to see the host Government sitting on the sidelines doing nothing. As far as I am aware, the Secretary of State has met only once with representatives of the host cities to discuss their concerns about the championships. That was on 29 April this year—barely six weeks before the start of the tournament.

That reveals a lack of leadership and direction from the Government. The best word that I can think of to describe their approach is "muddled". I would like to have seen serious Government backing from the off. The Secretary of State or the Minister should have been proactive and formed a committee to co-ordinate the tournament. The Government should have used the championships as a showpiece to show the world that Britain can host major sporting events in style. The championships could also have highlighted Britain as a prominent tourist destination. The tournament will attract between 250,000 and 300,000 foreign visitors, and the Treasury is expected to benefit by £8 million in increased VAT receipts from ticket sales alone. That is before the extra revenue that will be generated from the additional £100 million that the visitors will spend here in England.

The impression with which some of these visitors will leave our shores disturbs me. I was shocked to discover, for example, that North East Regional Railways was advising people going to matches not to travel by train, and there was not a peep from the Government to dissuade the company. That is a direct result of privatisation and the break-up of the national railway system. Regional operating companies now have only a fixed number of carriages and these cannot be moved around the country to meet extra demand.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) indicated dissent.

Mr. Pendry: If the hon. Gentleman cannot see that, he should not be sitting where he is.

That is a terrible advertisement for Britain. I was equally concerned to learn that the operating companies have no plans to put on late trains to transport people between major cities after late-night matches. One of the most enticing fixtures in the first stage is the evening game between Italy and Germany at Old Trafford, which is already a 55,000 sell-out. But fans travelling to Manchester from London to watch the match would have to leave the ground as soon as they arrived to catch the last train home. I telephoned British Rail yesterday, and was told that the last train back to London would leave Manchester at 8 pm.

The Government have been begrudging in their financial support to promote the championships. They have guaranteed just £100,000 in direct grants to share among the eight cities, all of which are Labour controlled. Mathematics was not my strong point at school, but I can work out that that amounts to a paltry £12,500 for each city—barely enough to promote a local five-a-side competition, let alone the largest sporting event to be held on these shores for 30 years.

The Minister states that he has met the demands of the cities, but he has not. When representatives of the cities met the Secretary of State's predecessor, they requested £1.5 million, which would have produced a real festival to celebrate the championships. They were turned down, but came back with a more modest proposal for £400,000 with no strings attached, but they were given £100,000 in direct aid. It is true that other money has been made available, but it comes with strings attached, requiring host cities to jump through hoops backwards. Local authorities have had to be careful in their selection of sponsors so that they do not conflict with the FA's main sponsorship partners. The Government's stinginess contrasts with the last time we hosted a comparable major event—the 1966 World cup. At that time, Harold Wilson's Labour Government provided £500,000 for hospitality and other measures—the equivalent of £5 million at today's prices.

Despite the lack of central support, the cities have been getting on with it and involving the private sector to organise an exciting cultural and social programme for visiting supporters. The highlights include Newcastle's EuroFest, a specially constructed welcome village close to St. James's park, with bars, bistros and eateries with a European flavour. Liverpool's comedy festival will include some well-known comics from all over the country. Manchester's united clubs of Manchester scheme is based on the city's internationally renowned nightclub scene, and Leeds has the music, fire and masks festival. Some of my hon. Friends will talk about Sheffield and other cities if they catch your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I am sure that the Minister would wish to join with me in congratulating the cities on their inventiveness, despite the inappropriate lead from the Department. The host cities have dug deep into their own pockets to fund this social extravaganza. It is estimated that the entire cultural and social programme put on by the cities will cost some £2.5 million. The Government have funded less than 2.5 per cent. of that directly.

As there are more hon. Members here than I had envisaged—bearing in mind attendance at some Friday debates in the past—I shall conclude by telling the Minister that we all realise that he has been active in trying to persuade some of his colleagues to have a more enlightened policy for sport. He knows that, when I criticise him, it is because he leads for the Government as a whole on sport. There is scope for improvement in the Government's approach, but the Opposition will assist constructively wherever we can.

I shall conclude on a happy note on which we can all agree. We hope that England and Scotland do well in the championships and that there is good behaviour both on and off the pitch from players and fans. We hope that one or other of the teams reaches the final and wins the cup. Having been critical of the Minister—but more critical of the Government—I wish to thank him for giving us the opportunity to have this debate on sport and I look forward to hearing the speeches in the debate.

Mr. David Mellor (Putney): I, too, am glad to have the opportunity to contribute to the debate. It is timely that we have a debate on sport on the eve of the European championships, with the Olympic games coming up, and the day after we learn of television companies being willing to pay three quarters of a billion pounds for the rights to cover the premier league. It is also timely, because a number of key sports are in a state of flux—who can say what the future of rugby will be—and because of the crisis in one of our other national games, cricket, although some of those who run it do not seem to realise that.

There is a tremendous interest in sport nationwide—even the broadsheets are devoting many more pages to sport than they do to the coverage of other topics. Whether that is a good or bad thing, I leave others to decide, but it is clearly a testimony to the tremendous national interest in sport. Although this will be a good-quality debate because several of those present are committed to sport, it is regrettable that we cannot attract more than 20 Members to debate a subject that lots of people in the country regard as extremely important.

In relation to Euro 96, we should be proud of the fact that the championships are here, whether we love football or not. We should be ambitious for sport in Britain. We should want to host great championships. What is the point of thinking about having a great new national stadium, upgrading our facilities and having the vision if we do not want other people to come and share it with us?

We should be aware of the interest in the championships—400 million people were supposed to have tuned in merely to watch the draw for the event. It is a great shop window for Britain and a way of showing ourselves off. In some senses, we come to the championships quite strongly because as a result of legislation, money being available from the Football Trust, and a great sense of leadership from several key people in football, including a number of club chairmen who embraced the Taylor report and did not allow their fans to drive them from it, we now have some of the finest stadiums. In fact, the chairman of the UEFA grounds committee said that British stadiums are now the best in Europe. We can be proud of that.

I hope that we can be proud of a lot of the other arrangements for the championships. I do not want to get involved in partisanship, but I would like to have seen a bit more vision about some of the things that could have been done around the championships. I would like to have seen some effort made to bring local authorities, national Government and others together to try to give people a good time.

I am not seeking to make a party point, but if there is any element of embarrassment that the championships are going on, that is foolish. We should be proud of the fact that we are hosting them. That is not to say that there will not be some problems, but we must remember that although we think that we have exclusive ownership of football hooliganism, we do not. At one of the European club finals this year, 200 people were arrested and someone was severely injured. Many of the fans who are coming from other countries have never in their adult lives observed a game where there have not been cages between them and the pitch. There could be problems, but I hope not.

It is right that the police have taken pre-emptive action. One of the most impressive things about policing recently has been the way in which the police have worked together with the clubs. The use of closed circuit television, which takes shots of hooligans, means that no one can feel that he can get away with it any more. It is a fundamental proof of the basic rule of law and order that the greatest deterrent is the certainty of being caught. What the police did up in Northumbria was worth while.

I cannot pretend to be all that optimistic about what will happen on the pitch. We shall travel hopefully, whether we arrive or not. The key thing is that by the end of the championships, I want people to see Britain not as a country beset by mad cow disease and all manner of problems—a country that people can have a laugh at—but as one where people can see that we are capable of organising something. I want us to be seen as a warm, friendly and successful country, which can be trusted with handling other great sporting events. I hope in my lifetime to see an Olympic games back in this country. Everyone should have that ambition, because there is no point in being successful in world sport unless one has the ambition to play such a role.

My hon. Friend the Minister focused on two issues in his speech, and although it could be open to the criticism that there was a great deal more that he could have said, I understand why he focused on those two things. He has a deep, personal commitment to them, for which I commend him, and which I share.

How can we expect to be a major cricketing nation when all the evidence suggests that just a third of United Kingdom schoolboys can actually play cricket at school? It is devastating that that should be the case. I do not want to apportion blame for that, but it is self-evident that, if people are not introduced to the game, how can they be expected to play it well?

Sometimes an anecdote tells the story a great deal more effectively than a lot of statistics. I was speaking at one of the big football grounds in the north of England, and one of the managerial staff came to collect me from the airport. He was one of those people, and we produce them, who was equally as good at football as at cricket. It was a marginal call for him whether he went into professional football or professional cricket. He chose professional football because the pay and conditions were better. We talked about sport and he said, "You know, my kids are equally as good at football as at cricket, but they can play only football at school. I discovered that they were good at cricket only because I play it with them in our back garden."

We must do something about that, because we shall not win test matches on the playing fields of Eton; we shall win them on the playing fields of Brixton. There are not many playing fields in Brixton, but we must organise that and do something about it. My hon. Friend's determination to ride over objections from wherever they come, whether they are problems with the teaching unions or whatever, is welcome. We have a national interest in making sure that youngsters play sport at school.

That aim goes beyond producing those who will be world beaters, although we must aim to produce such people, because it is humiliating when we fail after we all get worked up for an event such as the cricket World cup. We sent down a team and they were the only group of men who ever went to India and did not get the runs. It is deeply depressing and disappointing when we do that. The whole country, even those who do not care about cricket, wants to share in successes. Perhaps the team is getting something back on that at the moment.

The question not only of producing world beaters but of giving youngsters the stimulus and inspiration to get involved in sport is so important because it has other social consequences. I am chairman of the Sports Aid Foundation, which grant-aids athletes from sports that do not pay them a living, even if they are highly successful. One of my governors, Jeff Thompson, from Manchester, is a formidable black athlete who became world karate champion. He said to me, "If I hadn't had sport, I could have ended up in prison like a lot of my classmates did." Jeff is a real role model and he got the MBE for the work that he is doing among youth in the cities of the north.

The key point is that if we do not offer people a positive outlet for their energies and enthusiasm, we get the youngsters we deserve. We have the resources and the commitment to be able to do that, so more power to my hon. Friend's elbow in relation to sport in schools and the creative use of money from the lottery.

We must remember that the Sports Council gets by with a grant of about £40 million, or whatever it has been locked at for many years. Each and every year, £300 million is now coming into sport. I have been critical of the way in which some of the distribution bodies have operated in relation to the lottery, but I doff my hat to the Sports Council, because I have not heard a word of criticism about the way in which it has distributed money. It should be congratulated on showing a safe pair of hands. That money could transform sport at every level, from the grass-roots up.

Mr. Tony Banks: That is an interesting point. At the beginning of his speech, the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the three quarters of a billion pounds that is coming into football through the BSkyB and BBC deal. To what extent can we ensure that a chunk of that money benefits all football, as opposed to just going into the hands of a smaller number of richer clubs?

Mr. Mellor: Football must show an interest in developing the game. I gather that the money that goes to the Football Association for the coverage of the cup final filters down to the county football associations. I do not know whether those associations should have influence over the modern professional game. I agree with the hon. Gentleman, who is also an honourable friend. The danger about money coming into football is that all it does is pay for hugely escalating transfer fees and ridiculous wages. We criticise the chap from Camelot who has run a successful lottery that brings in £1.5 billion for good causes. Even with his bonus, he earns £360,000, a third of what my club is paying either Mr. Gullit or Mr. Vialli. I do not object to that, because I am glad that they are playing for Chelsea, but we must get our values right.

The other danger is that football is pricing its grass-roots fans out of the game. I sit behind a microphone every Saturday afternoon during the football season doing a radio show, so I have learnt a thing or two that has been worth learning. For example, a lot of people for whom football is absolutely vital to their lives are feeling that they have been priced out of the game. They cannot afford to go or to take their kids.

Take Euro 96. How many ordinary fans will be able to buy tickets for that? I received tickets for the match between England and Scotland from Synchro Systems. It is even more complicated than applying for shares.

Mr. Banks: Multiple applications.

Mr. Mellor: Exactly. I made only one such application.

[Mr. Mellor]

Some tickets came back. They were priced at £65 and bore the stamp "Severely Restricted View". Who the hell wants to pay £65 for a good view, let alone a severely restricted one? It seems that the football authorities are willing to price the ordinary fan out of the game. Some of the television money should be used to make sections of great stadiums available, relatively inexpensively. If football betrays its grass-root supporters in order to make money, it will not flourish. It should recognise that ordinary folk wish to be at the game. It is not good enough that they watch it on television, although it is helpful that we can all do so.

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn Hatfield): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that not one penny of the BSkyB money will filter through to the game? It will go to the premier league clubs full stop. When my right hon. and learned Friend refers to the FA giving the receipts for a cup final to the clubs at a lower level and through to the counties, we are talking about less than £1 million. Does my right hon. and learned Friend find it difficult to accept that the great television deal will not benefit clubs that are outside the premier league?

Mr. Mellor: Those clubs, of course, have done their own deal.

If premier league clubs receive television money, a good use of it would be not to charge the fans some of the ridiculous prices that have been charged of late. Sections of grounds could be made available to ordinary people through partnership schemes. I am talking of ordinary family people with limited wages, who want to experience live football.

I was involved in an advertisement for Reebok, which was prepared to make a substantial payment to charity. As a football product was being advertised, I thought that it would be sensible to make the money available to football.

When I was a kid growing up in Dorset, I could not go to league football because none was taking place in the area where I was living—at any rate, none worth watching. My constituency is only a couple of miles from great grounds such as Stamford Bridge. Many kids who live a mile or so from great grounds have never been to watch a football game there because they cannot afford a ticket.

With the proceeds from the Reebok advertisement, I was able to take 1,000 kids to their first football match. It happened to be the only occasion during the season when Chelsea scored five goals in a match. We won 5-0. I could not legislate for that. The kids had a fantastic day off. As I said, they live only a couple of miles from the ground, but they are priced out of the market. That must be taken on board when we look for an element of fairness.

I commended my hon. Friend the Minister on what he said about sport and sport education. I commend him also on what he said about a British academy of sport. Let the foot be kept on the accelerator. The concept must not be filtered through so many committees that we end up with a bastardised version of the proposal that does not reflect the clear lines that we have in mind.

The Australians have proved that the academy concept can work. On average, Britain has won five gold medals at all the modern Olympiads. Spain, for example, has put money into developing sportsmen. It did so in the run-up to the Barcelona games. It won more medals at those games than in all the modern Olympiads put together. That demonstrates that if we invest in sports people, we can have an effect on their performance.

The population of Australia is only 40 per cent. of that of the UK. The Australians are aiming for 60 medals—20 of them gold—at the Sydney games. They will win those medals because they have laid the necessary foundations. Let us do the same. It is not enough, however, merely to lay foundations, or to talk about doing so. We must get things up and running.

When I went to the last Olympic games, I met Chris Boardman, who won Britain's first gold medal at cycling for 70 years. Chris Boardman won his gold medal before he went out on the track. He had a bike that was the envy of all the other participants in the race. He also had a trainer and a sports psychologist. That boy was primed up. He believed in himself and he was ready to go. He managed to win a gold medal despite there being no velodrome in Britain of an Olympic standard. His victory was a tribute to the special things that had been done for him. If those things can be done for him, they can be done for others.

Sometimes we disgracefully neglect our sports people. For example, Steve Redgrave has won three rowing gold medals. He has won a gold at each of the last three Olympics. I think that he and Matthew Pinsent have been unbeaten for three seasons. There is every likelihood that they will win a fourth gold medal. Steve nearly packed in rowing after the Barcelona Olympics. He became fed up with having to sponge off his wife. He wanted to be sponsored and to receive proper money.

Steve Redgrave is as great an athlete as Linford Christie. We know, of course, that Linford is a great athlete who runs in blue riband events that attract a great deal of sponsorship. Those who make those sums available are not prepared similarly to make them available to rowing and many other events.

There are two worlds for Olympic athletes. In one world, there are those who can use their skills—jolly good luck to them—to make an extremely good living, apart from enjoying prestige. There are others whose gold medals have been equally hard won but who live in a sporting world that does not attract any form of commercial backing.

Wearing my hat as chairman of the Sports Aid Foundation, I say that we are the only country in the world where the costs of sustaining the training efforts of athletes fall on private individuals and organisations and are not met by the public purse. I pay tribute to the Foundation for Sport and the Arts. Before taking that further, I should say that before I became chairman of the Sports Aid Foundation, the largest grant that it had ever been able to give to any UK athlete of whatever talent was £5,000 a year. It is now possible to pay élite athletes £15,000 to £20,000 a year in training expenses. That is being done on the back of the Foundation for Sport and the Arts.

The Sports Aid Foundation spends just over £2 million a year. Even if the job that needs to be done is subject to a budget, we need to spend about £9 million or £10 million a year. I believe that the foundation will get its way, but what is the point of having a national lottery that brings in £300 million a year if everything is spent on buildings, while nothing is spent on preparing the athletes who we want to perform with distinction? Like all other major sporting countries, we should take on the burden of making payments and grants available to promising sportsmen.

I take up the theme of my hon. Friend the Minister of teenagers in sport. The best evidence available to us shows that 80 per cent. of the most highly talented teenage athletes drop out of sport during their teenage years. They do so for various reasons. Some will drop out in any event because we cannot force people to continue, to sweat and to endure various privations. Some teenage athletes, however, drop out because they think that there is not much point in going on. They feel detached from the main-stream of teenage life. They do not think that it is worth while continuing with sport.

It is not only the losers who move away from sport. A short while ago, I had a riveting evening sitting next to one of our most prominent Olympic gold medallists. He told me that the year before he went to university, he nearly gave up sport. He thought, "Why the hell should I be doing this while everyone else is having fun? No one seems to care." He told me that he had no money and that it was a hell of a flog to get to where he wanted to train. We must take those feelings on board.

There are some things over which we as Members have no control. In other words, we do not have a role. A basic willingness, however, on the part of the House to take an interest in sport is fundamental and best serves the interests of our constituents. We should willingly do the things that we can do. We should use lottery money properly. We should create a British academy of sport. We should ensure that the Sports Council and other bodies are staffed with good people. Let us ensure that where we have political influence, it is exercised in favour of the principles in sport in which we believe.

I have the highest regard for the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), as he knows. No one is more tireless in keeping in touch with major sporting people and sporting events. He knows, however, that there is another side to every success. The Alfred McAlpine stadium at Huddersfield is, of course, fantastic. It won a Royal Institute of British Architects award. It is clearly an exceptional building. I quite often visit the New Den at Millwall. Before it was built, the last major football ground to be built in London was Selhurst Park. It was built a year after Wembley stadium had been constructed. Anyone who has been to Selhurst Park will know that the ground is not exactly the last word in luxury.

We should be aware of the role of local authorities. In this context, I care not about their politics but about their attitudes. Some local authorities call on football to run itself properly. They then frustrate football in trying to do so by raising NIMBY-type objections to the creation of new stadiums. That is having a devastating effect on the fortunes of several clubs. Brighton can be quoted in that context.

Mr. Pendry: Briefly, does the right hon. and learned Gentleman recognise that there must be better liaison between the Department of National Heritage and the Department of the Environment because, often, the Department of National Heritage wishes to do what he did when he was there—to get on with it and to have stadiums built? It is frustrated by the Department of the Environment calling in plans when perhaps it should try to resolve matters in other ways.

Mr. Mellor: I agree entirely. Exactly that is happening at Fulham, and I think that a Department of the Environment inspector finally cold-boxed the Southampton scheme, so I accept that point.

Many sports are having huge difficulties coming to terms with the modern world. In many, their own way of running things is not exactly the way that one would devise if one were setting them up today. It is ludicrous that the Football Association should be dominated by people from the amateur game. That is no criticism of the amateur game, but it is not especially relevant to some of the big things that we are talking about. I am a great admirer of Bert Millichip, who is the exception and has given good leadership, but in any other game or walk of life, many other people on the FA council would have been pensioned off. All the people on the FA vice-presidents bench are over 80—it is known as death row.

Rugby will have terrible problems as professionalism comes in. The other day, I had the opportunity to interview Mark MacCormack, who in 1960 met a golfer called Arnold Palmer and then a golfer called Gary Player. Mr. MacCormack built up a business that totally transformed the world of golf and then of tennis. Suddenly, little provincial sports changed. Mark MacCormack had to twist the arms of the Wimbledon authorities to persuade them that they should have hospitality tents and such things. The first reaction of the senior president at Wimbledon was, "Would people be interested in coming?"

In 30 years, sport has been transformed. It is now a huge business. Hundreds of millions of people will watch it around the world. We all tune in. The question is, however: are the people who are running sport able to keep up with that? Do we not have a role in the House to assist in that process? Above all, are the interests of the ordinary sports fan being missed out on in this great global battle, where all that seems to matter is the television rights for distant countries, not what is happening on the spot? That is why—and I am sorry if I have spoken too long, Madam Deputy Speaker—it is important that we should debate sport and that we should take it seriously. Other people do. We in the House should.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): I shall confine my remarks to one specific matter because quite a few hon. Members want to speak: policing and hooliganism at the European championships.

I am to be chairman of the all-party Association Football Committee thanks to my hon. Friends. At one of our regularly attended meetings, many of them will have noted that, last week, we met two chief inspectors from Scotland Yard's football intelligence unit. We were impressed by the report given to us by—and I hope that they will not mind me naming them—Chief Inspectors Peter Chapman and Brian Drew of the football section of the special crimes squad. They did a marvellous job in explaining the background to the security and organisation. They came under severe questioning.

[Mr. Joseph Ashton]

The football intelligence unit is not especially new. It has been there for some time. It keeps quiet because, obviously, it does not want to reveal too much of what it knows, but the committee will visit the unit a week on Tuesday. Any Members are welcome to come along if they wish. They will find that it is possible to press a button and hooligans from every club—photographs, details and names—will be revealed on a screen. The unit has acquired a marvellous amount of information and knowledge. It can tell when hooligans will be going to a specific point, what time they will arrive and what pub they will meet at.

It is sad that such information cannot be revealed because of the Data Protection Act 1988. Although it is available to the police, it is not available to clubs. I remember meeting the Home Secretary about this on behalf of the committee following the Lansdowne road incident in Dublin, when thugs from Britain threw chairs off the stand on to the crowd below. To be fair, he conducted a full investigation into it, but still said that the Act means that the identities of potential hooligans cannot be revealed to clubs. The clubs cannot, therefore, check and decide not to give a certain person a ticket or a season ticket or to put stewards on at certain points.

If it is to prevent a crime, the Home Office should examine how this mass of information can be disseminated to clubs and even to area police forces in great detail so that much of the hooliganism—the 1 per cent. of people who create problems, which attract so much publicity—can be curtailed.

Today's Yorkshire Post headline reads:

"Police face £1m soccer bill", and that is just in Leeds and Sheffield, where they are not expecting much trouble. But 7,500 officers have had their leave cancelled. An enormous cost is falling on cities and the Government are offering no extra cash. Millions of pounds will be flooding into the country and there is a chance to put Britain's image in Europe into a far better perspective than the continual squabbles about beef and such stuff, yet we are missing out on it. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) said, the Government seem to have a non-interventionist policy. They might intervene in football, but in relation to tourism and to putting on a show, they could have done far more.

The football intelligence unit is liaising with several other countries, so not only the British police, but Europe's top cops will be handling things. They know their own hooligans. They will be able to mingle with the crowd and pick them out. Television will be zooming in on and looking for them.

We will not have the position, which has occurred so often, where hooligans are simply put on the next ferry and sent back to their country, knowing that they have got away with it and that they can return even the following week and do it again. Now there will be instant prosecutions. I hope that newspapers will give publicity to such prosecutions.

There is a Europewide network of potential thugs. The vast majority of people who commit such offences are not football fans, but National Front supporters and fascists who have used football to set up a network in Paris, Madrid, Barcelona, Hamburg, Berlin and throughout Europe. They want to jump on the football bandwagon and to fight world war 3 and world war 4 and they will use any chance that they get. Let us not over-exaggerate it. There are probably no more than a dozen from each country, but they love the publicity and the cameras that zoom in on them, as they did at Lansdowne road in Dublin. They love waving their national flag and abusing it. That is one of the things that could spoil the games.

I tabled a question to the Home Secretary asking him to consider moving the Trooping the Colour ceremony, which, unfortunately—I think that we should have noticed this six months ago—falls on the date of England-Scotland game. Obviously, 20,000 people may come down from Scotland, travelling overnight. I am not saying that they will be exuberant because one or two might have a hangover, but seeing some horses in a parade down the street and the opportunity for mischief and a bit of fun can be tempting.

Mr. Tony Banks: The horsemen will all have swords though.

Mr. Ashton: My hon. Friend keeps interrupting, but I cannot hear what he is saying. It needs only two or three such supporters to think that they can stampede the horses. The television cameras will be there. To those people, it will be great fun, but to the rest of us and for the European championship tournament, it will be a great disaster.

The police are confident that they can handle both events on the same day and I am sure that they can, but it is one thing policing in grounds, which is now a fine art. There has been hardly any trouble in any ground in Britain for many years because of all-seater stadiums, television cameras and segregation. I said this to a director of Sheffield Wednesday football club. We and everyone else have put time and money and gone to great lengths in relation to crowd safety, but on the streets, it can be different. Football is a game of great grief or great joy and if matches finish at half-past nine or half-past 10, supporters go to a pub and someone says a wrong word, trouble can happen.

In these championships, we have a new position. The penalty shoot-out will not necessarily take place. Teams will play extra time until a goal is scored. With the old penalty shoot-out system, the police could get ready at the end of the half hour, with everyone standing up and looking in case of trouble, but now the end of the game can come at any time during the half hour.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am sorry for interrupting my hon. Friend. I was suggesting that if the Scottish supporters decided to make some trouble for Trooping the Colour, they should remember that the troops all have swords. It could be Culloden all over again.

My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to incidents outside football grounds. It is a matter not just of accidental trouble but of pre-arranged violence. How do we deal with that?

Mr. Ashton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I am old enough to remember the 1966 World cup, when I was serving on Sheffield city council and many things took us by surprise. Supporters adopt a pub, so one will be known as the German pub and another as the Danish pub—and one cannot stop them going to those pubs with their mates. When it comes to closing time, two or three hooligans say, "Let's go and sort out the German pub." We hope that that will not happen, but it can.

Another problem acknowledged by the police is tented cities. In 1966, Sheffield was caught unawares when armies of youngsters arrived—some of them on push bikes—with tents. They did not have tickets for the game or money to buy them, but they could watch the game in a pub. We let those youngsters pitch their tents in the park. Six hundred people allowed tents in their back gardens. Sheffield and other cities even asked householders to offer supporters bed and breakfast for £12 a night. It is difficult to guard tented cities from hooligans who go looking for a bit of fun, to steal and to cause vandalism. The police are already stretched, and football gets the blame.

Last night, I went to the new football embassy near Piccadilly. Fans get a lot of stick but only a tiny minority cause trouble. The Football Supporters Association received a grant of £50,000 from the Football Trust to establish a football embassy in every town. The embassy at 17 Shaftesbury avenue occupies two floors and is manned by student football supporters who can speak different languages. They can give help with accommodation, and can give advice if one has lost one's money or ticket. The embassy is even publishing handbooks identifying safe pubs and good places to eat.

That scheme will work marvellously well, but it will not grab the headlines. There were hardly any members of the media present last night. If there had been a punch-up, there would have been. Next week, our committee will be meeting the Football Supporters Association to learn more about its plans. The Government should have done something, but they have not. They opted out. One expects the Minister responsible for sport and the Department to take the initiative in welcoming visitors to our country.

The press in this country have their problems. Thousands of people who trained as journalists cannot get a job, or perhaps they had a job and were made redundant. Technology has put them on to the streets. An army of freelance journalists, photographers and cameramen are out of work and get paid only if they can sell a story. That is how they scratch a living. That is why 500 journalists and photographers will turn up to watch the England squad training—hoping that a player will spit or swear.

My fear is that Euro 96 will go wrong because freelance journalists are desperately trying to earn a living in any way they can. Younger freelancers tack on to a bunch of fans and look for a fight—they may even incite a fight. They have a camera handy in their back pockets, to get an exclusive photograph of a window being smashed or a car being turned over which will make the front page—especially if the match is boring. Plain clothes police officers in discos, nightclubs and pubs at the lower end of the scale will be looking for agents provocateur.

The House must remind the newspaper industry that it has a responsibility to project that which is good about Britain, not that which is bad. The media constantly place emphasis on what is bad about politics, football or anything else. If one talks to people in the business about the incident on the flight back from Hong Kong which was said to involve England players, they say that the damage was negligible.

Lady Olga Maitland: Is £5,000 of damage negligible?

Mr. Ashton: It was not £5,000 of damage. I am sure that the hon. Lady has flown club class on long-haul flights, so she will be familiar with the small video televisions that are fitted into the back of the seat. I doubt that they cost 200 quid each. I even doubt that two televisions suffered severe damage.

Lady Olga Maitland: I am astonished. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that appalling behaviour is totally excusable? Is he suggesting that £200 of damage is more acceptable than £5,000 of damage? The fact remains that the men in question behaved appallingly. They were a disgrace to Britain and should have been disciplined. It is outrageous that the hon. Gentleman should try to defend them.

Mr. Ashton: The hon. Lady knows only what she has read in the newspapers, but she condemns and convicts everybody on that basis. Neither the stewards nor stewardesses reported anything to the pilot during the flight in question, and nothing was said for nine hours after the aircraft landed. Then, two cleaners who had entered the aircraft ran to the press to say that there had been some damage. I will not give too many details because libel actions are pending. Some players intend to sue some newspapers for libel, which is why Mr. Venables could not offer a proper explanation. The hon. Lady read the newspaper stories and, like many other people, has jumped on the bandwagon. I hope that there will be an inquiry and libel actions.

Lady Olga Maitland: They did not even apologise.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady knows my views about sedentary interventions.

Mr. Ashton: The hon. Lady asks the players to apologise when they may not have even—

Lady Olga Maitland: They should have made one.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We will start with discipline here, in the House.

Mr. Ashton: The hon. Lady is more gullible than I would expect from a Member of Parliament, and she does not know a lot about football and reporters. Media hype will destroy the games. If that happens, the newspapers will be destroying this country. If the press persist in publishing front-page stories about two idiots having a punch-up or breaking a window, that image will go around the world. Football is not to blame but the people who publicise such incidents out of all proportion.

Mr. Pendry: I have just returned from Hong Kong, where I met the chief of Cathay Pacific. He confirms my hon. Friend's comment that the damage was highly exaggerated, and said that Cathay Pacific's main problem was the British press harassing the airline's girls and putting words into their mouths.

Mr. Ashton: We must not forget the amount of money that has been invested, the organisation, or the wonderful feeling of having the biggest street party in Europe where everybody can have a marvellous time. Young people coming to this country should have that as their first impression of Britain. I remember 1966—it was marvellous, even though it rained for three weeks. It was not just a matter of England winning the cup; it was the marvellous party atmosphere, just like there was at the coronation and on VE day. It could be like that again.

We must get rid of the over-emphasis—and I am sorry that the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) fell for it—in the press on tiny incidents that are blown up out of all proportion and destroy everything that sportsmen, politicians and the football movement are trying to do. I appeal to the press not to damage Britain with nonsense stories. Instead, let us all support our country and our team.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I could not agree more with the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton). Like him, I am a vice-chairman of the all-party football committee, which is in no doubt that the police have done sterling work and I pay tribute to them for their efforts.

I begin my speech in my capacity as chairman of the all-party racing committee. When my hon. Friend the Minister opened the debate, he listed the great sporting events that we are going to enjoy in the weeks and months ahead—but I was disappointed to note that he did not mention that it is the Derby tomorrow. There will be a great deal of interest in what is happening at both Wembley and Epsom. We have brought forward the time of the race to 2.25 pm so that people can watch the Derby on television, having, we hope, placed their bets in the betting shops in the morning, and then watch the football afterwards. Large screens at Epsom will show the opening game at Wembley.

Despite the number of welcome initiatives in racing, many of them due to Government help, there is continuing cause for concern about the long-term health of the sport. Racing is both a sport and an industry and the Government have a clear interest in it. For example, they take £350 million a year in general betting duty and there are at least 100,000 jobs in the racing industry, which is inextricably linked with the betting industry. At the other extreme, the breeding and training of horses is a vital part of the rural economy, as those of us with a constituency interest know. In my constituency, the first recorded race was in 1692, when a plate race was run on the wolds just outside Norton. Racing is an important industry that embraces both sport and the economy. The breeding of horses is a £100 million a year industry. Owners pay some £200 million a year in training and veterinary fees and other costs.

The House should be alerted to the fact that racing finances remain in a parlous state. That is despite the help given by the Government with VAT on the cost of bloodstock, the two cuts in general betting duty and the deregulation of some of the betting legislation so that there can be Sunday racing and evening opening of betting shops. In addition, following the recommendation of the Home Affairs Select Committee, the British Horseracing Board was created. It has done everything possible to improve racing's commercial interests.

You, Madam Deputy Speaker—as a member of the committee—will no doubt remember the work that we did for racing. I pay tribute to the Marquess of Hartington—Stoker, as he is affectionately known in the industry—for the work that he has done with the board. He will retire shortly and will be replaced by my noble Friend Lord Wakeham. The Tote and the Levy Board has been as generous to racing as it can, but betting turnover remains weak. We had looked forward to an increase in the levy, but that has not materialised in the way we envisaged.

I mentioned earlier that training costs amount to some £200 million a year, yet net prize money to owners totals only £38.25 million—barely 20 per cent. of the training costs are recovered in prize money. I am the first to say—as would be many of the owners—that owners are in the business for fun and for sport. In the same way as someone who owns a yacht, they expect to pay for things out of their pockets. However, compared with the prize money in other countries, including just across the channel in France, prize money in Britain is very low and needs to be increased. The Government have recognised that on many occasions.

The Racehorse Owners Association gave a presentation to our committee on Tuesday. It calculates that the deficit between prize money and training costs means that every time an owner has a horse in a race, it costs him £3,000—net of any prize money he may win. That puts the matter into perspective.

In the Budget last year—now enacted in the Finance Act—the Government agreed to make a 1 per cent. reduction in general betting duty. However, that must be seen as a very welcome first step; we need further substantial reductions in this year's Budget. Those in the House who follow the interests of racing will recognise how important that is.

One issue of particular concern is that many small betting shops are closing, often because they are bankrupt. If we allow such shops to close in small market towns there may be a resurgence of illegal betting, which would not be in anyone's interest, especially the Government's. There will be arguments about how any future reduction should be split, but that is a matter for another day.

I come now to football and declare my interest as president of York City football club. It is my personal view that the premier league has been a great success. As has already been said, the premier league and, increasingly, the first division have the finest stadiums in Europe. The tribute for that must go to the Football Trust, one of whose ties I am wearing for the debate. It has given tremendous support. The Government helped to fund the trust's activities, of course, with cuts in pool betting duty.

There is also no doubt that the money that has come into the premier league from the sale of sports rights to BSkyB has enabled clubs to make massive investments in their grounds and to bring in overseas players such as the Bergkamps, Gullits and Cantonas of this world—who also have created great interest in the league. It has provided a tremendous eye-opener for what we will see in Euro 96.

Mr. David Evans: Does my hon. Friend believe that the great success of the premier league has brought about a situation in which probably only six clubs out of all those in this country are now capable of winning the league or any other domestic trophy? Does he agree with that?

Mr. Greenway: My hon. Friend is right, and he has anticipated the "but" in my speech that I was coming to. I suspect that it is more likely that the big six is the big 10 or the big 12.

Madam Deputy Speaker, I had hoped to catch your eye after the speech of the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), because I wanted to congratulate him on the restraint that he showed in his speech by not mentioning the fact that Derby County—his beloved Derby—is now part of that élite. One hopes to goodness that Derby, Sunderland up in the north-east, and—which is the other team that has just been promoted? [HON. MEMBERS: "Leicester City."]—fare rather better than Leicester did last time it was promoted, and Bolton Wanderers did last year.

Mr. Evans: It is going to be tough.

Mr. Greenway: I hear what my hon. Friend says; it will be tough. There is no doubt that the "them and us" between the premier league and the rest of the football league is growing.

Yesterday we heard the announcement about the tremendous expenditure by BSkyB and the BBC on the deal, which is worth approximately £750 million, to screen live matches and highlights. That is another huge input of money into the premier league. My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) might have been right in his earlier intervention on the speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), when he said that not a penny of that will go to the rest of the football league.

Mr. Evans: He is right.

Mr. Greenway: He may be right. My point is that, if that is the case, it is an absolute scandal. We must impress on the Football Association and on the premier league the importance of ensuring that more of that money goes down to the lower leagues. I think that we can be reasonably assured that, because of the work of the Football Trust and the continuation of the pool betting duty reductions, we will see ground improvements in the lower league.

We now have a big job in ensuring that grounds in the second and third divisions, the Vauxhall Conference and the rugby league clubs are brought up to the same standard as in the premier league and the first division. I think that we can more or less take that as read, although some clubs struggle to find contributions, which the trust recognises.

The real point is that the structure that we have had in this country—there used to be a four-division league—has ensured that we have a bottom-up approach to finding talent rather than a top-down approach. If anyone thinks that we will win Euro 96—I hope to goodness that we do, or that we do well—or that we will win the World cup in two, six or 10 years' time while starving the grass-roots of cash, they are very stupid. I am speaking now only about soccer, but the same applies in many other sports.

One has only to consider that, tomorrow afternoon, David Platt will lead out the England team as captain. He came from Crewe Alexandra. Derby County has a young player—perhaps he is not so young now—Marco Gabbiadini, who started at York City as a junior. There is an argument about transfer fees. The problem in the Bosman case will increasingly affect the value of some of the players.

The thrust of what my hon. Friend the Minister said today about the need to encourage more youngsters is good. However, I stress that I should like more youngsters to be encouraged, and that they should have the determination to play professional soccer for local teams, whether it is York City, Swansea, Fulham or Torquay—four teams that have not done so well—or Luton Town, which we will play next year. We stayed up and, sadly, Luton went down. I shall look forward to it. We will play Watford and Milwall. Those clubs have struggled.

If they are good enough, I should like to see youngsters encouraged and enthused to have a professional career. If we are to improve the facilities and training available to them at the grass-roots, we must give them the opportunity of having a professional career, and then to move up into the premier league. It would be an act of great folly if those clubs were allowed to drift into part-time soccer because of a lack of resources, at a time when there is so much money coming into football because of the premier league deal.

Mr. Ashton: The simple solution would be for smaller clubs to agree to become nursery clubs. There is a strong feeling in the premier league that that system could work—for example, York City could be a nursery club for Newcastle United and Luton for Arsenal. The clubs could help each other and the money would travel downwards. The smaller clubs would provide somewhere for young players to train on their way up and the whole scheme would be of benefit to all concerned, but no one is pushing it.

Mr. Greenway: I know that the hon. Gentleman has advanced that theory before and there is some merit in it. In north Yorkshire, we have York City, Scarborough, Hartlepool, Darlington, Lincoln City, Scunthorpe United and Doncaster Rovers and then Middlesbrough and Leeds United. Not all the smaller clubs can be dormitory or nursery clubs for other teams.

It is marvellous that the three north-east teams will all be in the premier league next year. That has not happened for a long time. The success of Newcastle United means that there is great interest in football in the north-east, and Middlesbrough has a new stadium.

I have made the point as forcefully as I can that two things are needed at the grass-roots of the game: the development of facilities for youngsters—I shall comment on that matter in a moment—and ensuring that the game also thrives in the lower leagues. People will watch Euro 96 on television and I hope that they will be sufficiently enthused to go and watch their local teams come August. That happened in 1966 when we won the World cup—it provided a tremendous boost for attendances at matches all over the country.

I am sorry that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Putney is no longer in his place. He made the telling point that kids who live two miles from Chelsea football club cannot get or cannot afford tickets to watch Chelsea but that they would be welcomed with open arms at Fulham, which is not far away. In the same way, if people cannot get tickets to see Leeds United or Middlesbrough, if they cannot travel the distance involved or if parents are unhappy about letting their children go there, we would welcome them with open arms at York City. We are expanding our facilities to build a new family stand so that people can enjoy their football. However, we cannot do it all unless we are a proper professional club and have financial support from the top.

Mr. David Evans: Is my hon. Friend aware that the previous two champions of the Vauxhall league have been refused admission to the football league because of bureaucracy? It was alleged that their grounds were not up to standard at Christmas but the ground at Stevenage, which won the league this year, is up to scratch. Does he not think that it is completely wrong that a club should play for a whole season and win the Vauxhall league but, because of a closed shop, a club such as Torquay, which has struggled for 20 years, is not relegated?

Mr. Greenway: I cannot justify it, but I remember that when Maidstone United won promotion it did not have its own ground and had to play at Dartford. That caused a great deal of bitterness in what was then the fourth division. That was why the rule to which my hon. Friend refers was introduced. Clubs could spend all their money on players and nothing on their ground but, when they were promoted, people had to go to watch them at a pit of a place. Poor Bristol Rovers is still playing at Bath and its plans for a new ground are still not completely developed. My hon. Friend makes a valid point. It is important that there is a flow of teams being relegated and promoted, including via the Vauxhall Conference. The matter that he highlights leaves a nasty taste in the mouth and must seem very unfair to Stevenage supporters.

I mentioned the development of facilities. I greatly welcome my hon. Friend the Minister's comments about facilities in schools and access to national lottery money. Only the other day, he received a presentation from a company called All Four Sports. It intends to create indoor facilities at grass-roots level for the four sports of cricket, soccer, hockey and rugby. The project has the support of a number of sports associations and a number of leading sportsmen.

I have referred to the project because I believe that there can be no real criticism of the way in which the Sports Council has dealt with its responsibility as a funding body for lottery money. However, it is becoming increasingly clear that we need people to have commitment, to show initiative and to show enterprise, whether in the public sector, the voluntary sector or private businesses. They must act as the catalyst to get access to the money so that we can create a range of facilities.

My hon. Friend the Minister has set the target of good access to sports facilities for all youngsters, not just in inner cities but in rural areas, by the end of the century. That is an ambitious target, but we must achieve it. We can achieve it because we have access to funds as a result of the lottery. That is different from having a special, one-off Government grant and having to get an application in by Christmas or else the money is gone. The money is there month after month after month. It is a tremendous opportunity for us to produce and harness the talent that we need, whether to win competitions like Euro 96 or to have more champions and gold medallists in the Olympics and better rugby teams. We can do it and I greatly welcome what my hon. Friend the Minister has said today about excellence.

Mr. Nigel Jones (Cheltenham): I am delighted to take part in this debate on sport; this is the first time I have contributed to a sport debate. In normal circumstances, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell) speaks for the Liberal Democrats on sport. He is, of course, well qualified to do so, having been captain of the British team at the Olympic games in Tokyo. He held the Scottish 100 m record of 10.2 seconds on a cinder track for seven years and he still shows a remarkable turn of speed running up the stairs to the office we share in one of the turrets in this building. Unfortunately, he has duties elsewhere today and I have an uphill task attempting to match the quality of the speech he would have made.

I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway)—first, because of his position as chairman of the all-party racing group. I hope to see him at Cheltenham race course for the Gold cup next year. Secondly, although he claims to be president of York City, in a magnificent book called "Football and the Commons People", for which he and I both wrote chapters, he admits to being an Arsenal fanatic. We may both have attended the league cup final at Wembley in 1969, because I have to admit to being a Swindon Town supporter. The hon. Gentleman may remember that full time finished at 1-1 and that Swindon scored two goals in extra time with the flying winger Don Rogers. Fortunately for Arsenal supporters, two years later the club won the double, which may have been some compensation. That proved that the team had learnt something from Swindon on that occasion.

I shall concentrate on three points: first, the purpose of sport; secondly, the value and the economic good sense of investing in sport; and, thirdly, if time allows, what Britain could be like when sport is available to all. The Liberal Democrats' top priority is to raise the overall quality of life of all Britain's citizens, and we see sport as having a significant role in achieving that objective. It improves the health and fitness of participants.

I compliment the Health Education Authority on its current "Active for Life" campaign. I have a leaflet promoting the campaign here with me, which sums up the proposals in 10 simple points. It says:

"Just in case you still need convincing, here are 10 ways in which regular and moderate physical activity can improve your life.

1. You'll look better and feel great.

2. It will help control your weight and keep you in good shape.

3. It's a great stress-beater and an important weapon for surviving the stresses and strains of modern life.

4. It's a good way to meet new friends and develop new interests.

5. It helps control blood pressure.

6. It reduces the risk of Coronary Heart Disease . . . a major killer for men and women in this country. Active and fit people have up to half the risk of CHD.

7. It may help prevent osteoporosis in later life which can affect one in five women aged 50 and over.

8. It decreases the risk of certain cancers, eg. cancer of the colon.

9. It can help to keep you mobile and independent particularly in later years.

10. Regular, moderate physical activity keeps you strong, flexible and full of energy!"

We all need some of that.

Above all, sport is good fun, whether it is a family walk or a charity fun run. It allows individuals to set their own goals—whether they are swimming their first width or competing for Olympic gold medals. Some hon. Members have competed for Olympic gold medals, but I can remember swimming my first width. The joy on the faces of children when they achieve that is something to behold.

Britain has produced and continues to produce many outstanding world-class performers in many different sports. This year we shall see competitors competing—and, we hope, winning medals—in the Olympic games in Atlanta. As I come from Gloucestershire, I should mention our latest home-grown world record holder, the England wicket keeper Jack Russell, who took 11 catches in the second test match against South Africa earlier this year. It was the first series that England played in that country since the ending of apartheid. South Africa has made a remarkable breakthrough in the sporting world since those days.

If I may share one of my favourite sporting memories with the House, I was fortunate enough to be in Jamaica when England achieved its first test match victory for 30 years. I saw Jack Russell, the Gloucestershire wicket keeper, cut his Gloucestershire team mate, Courtney Walsh, just backward of square in front of the large scoreboard at Sabina Park. That memory will live with me for a long time. I am not alone in wondering what on earth the selectors thought they were doing when they dropped Jack Russell for a season or two, and perhaps they will hear this message while they are watching him perform heroics at today's match in Edgbaston.

As we have already heard, sport is big business. It creates wealth and jobs and is a net contributor to the public purse. It accounts for almost 500,000 jobs, generating nearly £9 billion in consumer expenditure. For every £1 that central Government spend on sport, £7 is received by the Treasury from sport-related tax and other revenue. It is a good investment for the Government. The Liberal Democrats believe that the income generated by sport alone makes it worthy of Government financial support and the provision of high-quality sports facilities for both casual use and competition should be central to any Government's health promotion programme.

It is impossible to quantify the value of sport in keeping Britain's citizens fit and healthy and reducing the amount that we spend on the health service. Sport also acts as a focal point for communities, creating a sense of identity and commitment for participants, spectators, voluntary officials and others. The regeneration of Newcastle with its football team under Kevin Keegan's management is one such example.

Sport has a vital role to play in tackling the alienation from society that is keenly felt by many young people. There is significant evidence that juvenile crime rates are lower where there are good community sports facilities.

When facilities are available, they should be open for use. There is absolutely no point in leaving them unused and unoccupied. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, North–East recalled that, when he was first appointed to the British Sports Council by Lord Howe back in 1965, his first meeting concerned dual community use of facilities, and the great stumbling block was who would pay the janitor's wages if he had to stay after 4 pm. Some 10 or 12 years later, my hon. and learned Friend was appointed to the Scottish Sports Council and his first meeting involved a discussion of the community use of sports facilities. Once again, the stumbling block was who would pay the janitor's wages after 4 pm. That discussion is still continuing in regional sports councils, school governors' meetings and elsewhere.

How often have hon. Members seen playing fields locked up while youngsters roam the streets, sometimes kicking a ball and dodging traffic at the same time, and sometimes becoming involved in acts of vandalism and worse? I cannot understand why school sports facilities are not used more widely, especially at weekends and in school holidays. If it takes a small amount of money to pay sports coaches to teach youngsters out of school hours, we should find it.

Some initiatives are going on. I am delighted that the Cheltenham and Gloucester college of higher education and Cheltenham Town football club—the Robins—are co-ordinating a training session in the summer holidays to try to keep some of the Cheltenham youngsters concentrating on their football rather than anything else. Finding that small amount of money may not lead to many Olympic champions, but it would help young people to develop their skills and self-confidence, and channel their energy into something positive, rather than leaving them with nothing to do.

With unemployment still relatively high and free time likely to increase, sport and leisure provision will become increasingly important. Already, almost half of Britain's citizens take part in sport or physical recreation at least once a month, and many millions more are regular spectators and follow the fortunes of their local team. Sport can promote and enhance Britain's standing in the world; it can break barriers and build bridges between communities and nations. We hope to see some of that over the next three weeks in Euro 96. The very significant contribution made to sport by Britain's Afro-Caribbean community has brought many other benefits to race relations.

As has been already been said, competition has its part to play, but it is not the sole justification for playing sport. Most people play sport for fun and fitness—be it golf, swimming, sailing or walking—but, for some, competition heightens enjoyment. Sport is not only valuable to those taking part such as athletes, coaches and officials, but hugely entertaining to people of all ages. It is impossible to estimate the entertainment value of sport to many people who cannot participate for whatever reason. Sport on television, radio, in newspapers and in magazines brings immense pleasure.

In The House Magazine on 27 May, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, North–East placed responsibility on the press and the public to be more positive. He said:

"The press and the public must be more positive. It does nothing for a team's or an individual player's confidence if they are denounced as failures."

How many times have we read in some newspapers immediate calls for a change of manager and a British team being labelled turnips or useless on returning from some narrow defeat?

[Mr. Nigel Jones]

I commend local newspapers that cover sport in their areas, such as the Gloucestershire Echo, which faithfully reports local sport day after day and week after week. Its sports pages, especially the sometimes wacky Derek Goddard column, are well read in our household. The media have an enormous part to play. I well remember my dear father, who was not a well man at the time and subsequently died, enjoying from his armchair the exploits of I. T. Botham in the test series against Australia in 1981.

The idea of an academy of sport has already been mentioned in this debate. It seems entirely sensible. The experience in Australia suggests that such an academy could produce world stars. I want any such organisation to take account of existing centres of excellence such as Lilleshall, Plas-y-Brenin in Wales, Glenmore lodge and the outdoor sports centre in Inverclyde. A regional organisation is a good option—perhaps with a central administration function. While I am on the subject, would it be possible to rename the Department of National Heritage the Department of National Heritage, Arts and Sport to give sport that additional boost?

Mr. John Greenway: And tourism.

Mr. Jones: And tourism.

Sports clubs are also enormously important. In my area, they include the Young Men's Christian Association, the Old Patesians and a club that organises horse riding for disabled people. There is nothing more wonderful than seeing the look of delight in the eyes of a young person at the end of a horse ride. Such activities must be supported.

The Minister might like to consider that the Central Council of Physical Recreation is mounting a campaign to enable voluntary sports clubs to become eligible for automatic rate relief in return for youth sport development. That is a very worthwhile aim. It has done a survey and estimates that the current costs of relief to central Government would be £14 million.

I listened carefully to the Minister's speech, and he mentioned a figure of £1 million for additional spending on coaching. I wonder whether he would go to see his colleagues in the Treasury, who are always telling us that the economy is in good shape, and find out whether he can do something about rate relief to help non-profit-distributing sports clubs.

We must remove the barriers to sport. I worked for some years in Sweden, and the Swedes have a positive approach to sport. Most small communities have invested in their own facilities, and the costs to families of using them are much lower than in Britain. Sport is an investment. There is a cost, an outlay, in providing facilities and coaches to run the sports centres, but there is a payback in reduced health care costs and less crime.

I have something to say about the funding of élite sports people—the people who will be the champions, the gold medal winners, of the future. I have permission to mention a young man from my constituency—18-year-old Leon Taylor. Leon attends Cheltenham sixth form centre, of which I am a governor, and in February he won the title of British men's high board diving champion. He trains almost every day after school, and is a bright, likeable, sensible young man.

Leon takes part in competitions all over Britain and Europe. His great ambition is to take part in the Olympic games, but although he is British champion, because of his age and his limited competition experience he was told earlier this year that in order even to be considered for Olympic selection he needed to take part in competitions in America, Canada and Mexico. There was little or no funding available.

I had a long discussion with Leon's family, who have had no holiday for seven years because of the support that they give Leon with his diving. The cost of sending Leon and his coach, Ian Barr, to north America for those competitions was to be more than £2,000. If Leon had not had the good fortune of having parents who care—they are not a rich family, but they put all their spare cash into his training—friends who cough up a bit, and one or two local bodies, such as the local trusts that have generously contributed towards his costs, and the local Round Table, which is also considering giving him a grant, he would not have been able to compete in those events. Without having done so, he would not have been eligible for selection for the Olympic games in Atlanta.

I wonder how many talented young people miss the opportunity of representing their county or their country in important competitions because of lack of money; yet in terms of overall Government expenditure, the expenses of those potential stars while they are climbing the ladder are a flea-bite.

The world-famous ice skaters, Torvill and Dean, were financially assisted by their local council when they were up-and-coming competitors, and without that support they would not have achieved what they did. In these days of capped local authorities, they probably would not have been so fortunate. The Torvills and Deans of tomorrow may never achieve their dreams, and may not give the enormous pleasure to their audiences which could span the globe.

As a nation, we must encourage people to take up sport, but we should also be prepared to back them financially if they show the promise which could lead to national and international prominence.

Hon. Members will know that contacts built up through sport can last a lifetime. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, North–East told me during a recent famous trial that he once beat O. J. Simpson in a sprint—not in a court of law but on the track. He still regards O. J. as a friend, although they rarely meet these days.

Facilities for spectators are improving all the time. The information super-highway will increase opportunities for people to follow their team apart from just going to the match. No matter where one is in the world, one can follow the progress of one's team by subscribing to the appropriate channel. I suspect that most, if not all, football league and county cricket matches will be televised in the near future. Sports grounds ought to become family entertainment centres, and some clubs are beginning to work towards that. While the football fan watches the match, other members of his family can be taking part in their own sporting interest. Parents must take part in sport, and even hon. Members play from time to time. I have been selected to play cricket in my constituency on 21 June in a match between two teams of local residents. No doubt one or two of them will give me the benefit of their point of view on the issues of the day.

Euro 96 will dominate Britain's sports pages for the next three weeks, although Wimbledon starts soon and I hope that that also receives coverage. I hope that the idiots who sometimes disrupt our football stay away, as we do not want them. They are of no use to anyone and they should find something else to do—preferably digging their gardens. I hope that Euro 96 is full of fun and enjoyment. It is an opportunity to forget for a moment the problems with beef, the arguments about a single currency and our problems with our European partners. We should just sit back and enjoy—particularly the final between England and Scotland.

Terry Venables and his squad have my best wishes, but I would like to refer to his successor, Glenn Hoddle. As a Swindon Town supporter, I have experience of Glenn Hoddle's management skills in partnership with his assistant John Gorman. They performed miracles at Swindon, taking a demoralised team from the lower reaches of division 1 into the premiership. Sadly, Glenn Hoddle then left, and we found ourselves quickly back in division 2. This season, however, we have gained promotion back to division 1 under the new, and rather tougher, leadership of Steve McMahon. Glenn Hoddle and John Gorman will need time to bring the wonders that they showed at Swindon to the national team, but they have the right approach. They are both young enough and, given sufficient time, I can see them possibly producing a team capable of winning the World cup in the future.

Sport is fun and produces enormous camaraderie, but it is also important. When asked whether he thought football was a matter of life and death, the late great Bill Shankly is reported to have said, "No, it is far more important than that."

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Geoffrey Lofthouse): Before I call the next speaker, I should point out that there are two hours remaining in the debate for Back Benchers. Eight Back-Bench Members are hoping to catch my eye and, with some co-operation, they all should be successful.

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon): Hon. Members will be aware that long-standing engagements in the House may make it impossible for me to be here for the winding-up speeches, for which I apologise to the House.

One of the great advantages of representing Wimbledon is that wherever one goes in the world, people have heard of it and there is an instant basis for conversation. One of the disadvantages—particularly at this time of year—is that colleagues from all parties in the House approach me in the belief that my pockets are bulging with tickets for the centre court. I regret to disillusion them, but that is not the case.

I have no doubt that some future Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards will embarrass me—and not, incidentally, my host—by asking the value of two tickets to the royal box, plus lunch for me and my wife. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) is not here at the moment. He and I have both been in the royal box and I hope that, for many years, he will continue to accompany me there as the Opposition spokesman. If we have problems with the commissioner, I hope that he and I will put our heads together and decide whether we must declare that interest.

Other than the All England club, Wimbledon featured in national sport when Wimbledon football club climbed up the divisions, and against all expectations, won the FA cup. I hesitate to remind my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) of that, because Luton did its utmost to prevent Wimbledon's progress—knowing the man he is, he took it gallantly. I am sure that he took some pleasure in seeing Wimbledon ultimately beat Liverpool.

Wimbledon football club is, sadly, currently playing outside the borough, which is absolutely ridiculous, and quite as ridiculous as Crystal Palace playing at Wimbledon. I hope that the current exploratory talks will yet produce a satisfactory outcome for the club's return to the borough, given the enlightened attitude of the management of the club, Merton council and, possibly, the owners of Wimbledon stadium. The proposal is in the melting pot at the moment, but I shall need to be reassured that my residents will not be put to great inconvenience if such a move comes about.

Wimbledon is extremely fortunate in having a relatively large area of open spaces for a London borough. It is one of my major public aims to keep it that way in the face of the predatory desires of property developers. Time after time, threats have been fought off. The extension of the designation of metropolitan open land has been helpful.

At the moment, the future disposal of land surrounding Atkinson Morley hospital, which is used for recreational and sporting purposes, is causing much concern. I shall be working with the Wimbledon Society and local residents to oppose any development beyond the current building limits. I am well aware that health authorities have an obligation to get the maximum price for the site, but I believe that it is a sensitive matter. In this day and age, we must achieve a proper balance between obtaining that maximum price and retaining sporting and recreational facilities for our constituents.

In that connection, I commend the London Playing Fields Society, which is an admirable body, although short of funds, and runs important sites used by my constituents. It owns the Prince George's playing fields, which cover 46 acres. The society has a long lease on Morden park sports centre, which covers 53 acres. The objective of the society, which was founded more than 100 years ago, and has Field Marshal Lord Bramall as its president, is to enable all members of the community to have the opportunity to play games and to fulfil their sporting potential with enjoyment. I am glad to tell the House that many tens of thousands of my constituents and others have been able to do just that because of the society's amenities.

One would think that Merton council, which I remind the House is Labour controlled, would have been broad-minded enough to give discretionary relief on rates on the Prince George's fields. It should have followed the example set by Waltham Forest and Hounslow, which also own or manage land run by the society. I am sorry to report that Merton council has been singularly unenlightened in that respect, as it has been in processing the planning application for Morden park, which would provide a new clubhouse pavilion, floodlit all-weather pitches and new playing surfaces throughout the centre. One would have thought that the local council, which is the landlord and the planning authority, could have given such an application a fair wind, but, once again, I fear that Merton council is playing to the gallery. It says that it supports sport, but when it comes to the crunch, it does nothing about it. After all, there cannot be many leaseholders in Merton willing to inject £2 million capital into improvements to council property.

The better news is that the Peter May memorial appeal, of which I am proud to be a vice-patron, is to be launched this summer. It would be premature to say much about it now, but it involves the expenditure of £7.5 million, which will help the Morden park application to which I referred. It will also provide funds to upgrade the changing facilities and pitches at the Prince George's playing fields.

The appeal has the backing of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, whose endorsement of and commitment to sport for all is well known. I hope that there will be a successful outcome of the appeal in memory of such a famous, distinguished cricketer.

Merton's open spaces are of great assistance in allowing the local education authority to achieve reasonable compliance with physical education requirements in schools. I have a national concern, however, which I want to bring before the House. I gather from the director of Army recruiting that the standard of fitness of young men attending recruit selection committees is appalling, and deteriorating.

The House might think it rather odd that I am invoking an Army issue in the debate. I do so in the context that nowadays very few people entering a workplace go through a pre-employment medical. That being so, there is not a substantial cohort of people to set against the Army's experience. Those who apply to join the armed services are probably the best scientific evidence that we have of the fitness of young people.

Earlier this week, I had a meeting at the Adjutant-General's headquarters. I learnt that during the current year 1995–96, of 20,750 applicants to join the Army, only 12,000 were accepted. That is a pass rate of 58 per cent.

The figures can be approached in more than one way. From the Army's point of view, they represent a success because they are a tribute to its efficiency in weeding out those who would not be able to fulfil a future role. Therefore, the Army is doing a good job. On the other side of the coin, the figures tell us that 42 per cent. of applicants are failing. Of that 42 per cent., 25 per cent. are medically unfit. I shall put that percentage to one side, because there are many factors to be taken into account in areas other than those that we are discussing today.

Of the 42 per cent. of applicants who do not meet the Army's requirements, 17 per cent. are physically unfit. We are talking about well-motivated, self-selecting young men who want to join the Army. We are not talking about the days of national service, when young men would do anything to come up with a trivial complaint that would rule them out as being physically unfit. The fact that 17 per cent. of applicants fail through physical unfitness, having been subjected to a basic fitness test, is a most dreadful indictment.

The percentage is misleading because a young man can attend a recruitment centre and be found to be unable to fulfil basic requirements, and then be sent off with the advice, "Go and get yourself fit. Put yourself on a diet and do some weight training or whatever. Come back in a month's time." In other words, 17 per cent. is an artificially low figure.

As a physician who has spent many years advising people on their life style in relation to their occupation, which includes, obviously, maintaining a sensible level of physical fitness, I was horrified by the figures to which I have referred. They provide the best possible index of the standard that we are turning out of our schools.

I am delighted to learn that the Army is engaging the services of an occupational physician, to test the anecdotal impression that the fitness of young people has deteriorated over the past 10 and even five years. The main causes of Army failures are muscular skeletal in origin. Surely that must have a relationship, and probably a causal one, with inadequate sport in schools.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to liaise with his counterpart in the Ministry of Defence to monitor the results of the investigation that the Army has now started, I believe, to analyse an alarming state of affairs. There seems to be no doubt, however, according to the Adjutant-General's staff, that no less than 75 per cent. of schools fail to meet the desired two hours of physical education per week standard. If they are correct, that is most alarming in itself and in relation to the existing health and well-being of young people, which is extended into their later life because, basically, if they have a healthy life style when young, they are more likely to be free of life-threatening illnesses later.

I welcome the initiatives announced today by my hon. Friend the Minister to promote sport in schools. The House and the nation neglect that subject at their peril. I congratulate him on all that he is doing to raise awareness in that sector.

Mr. Alan Keen (Feltham and Heston): I was extremely happy earlier, sitting between two supporters of Sheffield Wednesday, which my team Middlesbrough beat twice last season, both games being shown live on television. The right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) was too much of a gentleman to say who his team beat, but he did mention that Chelsea scored five goals only once last season. I can hear my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) laughing, as I tried to avoid him at half-time, but was unable to do so. I feel happy that those two Sheffield Wednesday supporters have left, as I do not feel so guilty now.

In relation to sport for all, one of my themes, it is worth mentioning the Oval on Wednesday—not Surrey, but the Lords versus Commons match, where a full range of talent was on display, from none to at least halfway up. Ages certainly ranged from the highest to almost youth. My hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) contributed not just near youth, but a woman playing the great game of cricket.

That was a great day. I do not know whether it was a bad omen for old Labour, but Lord Desai and Lord Donoughue came in with 10 overs to go and 50 runs to get and took the usual delaying tactics of the place. They scored no runs in the last 10 overs, but lasted until the end, so it was ancient Labour striking back against the Commons.

I support my party's charter for football in principle because it does not take the attitude that so many articles that I have read and so many television pundits take. They start off by saying, "How are we going to make England, Scotland or the United Kingdom world champions?" Our charter starts at the other end. The aim is not to make British world champions, but to involve all youngsters in sport.

I am not opposed to the British academy of sport—in fact, I support it—but we are not going to get world champions by sending half a dozen people at a young age to Bisham Abbey or somewhere else and by cutting them off from society, especially if they make up only 5 per cent. of people who participate in sport. We shall win gold medals and make our nations world champions only if we ensure that all children and young people have a chance to participate in sport.

This has nothing to do with the wonderful athletes whom the Gateshead club turns out, but I remember Brendan Foster saying, when he was at his peak, that he was not the best middle-distance runner in Gateshead. His point was that few youngsters had the opportunity to become involved in athletics, so although Brendan was the world record holder at that time, had everyone in Gateshead had his opportunity, he might have been in second place. We must remember that.

Sport is like music and drama. We need to give young people encouragement and education. Sometimes, inspiration can come from a good teacher and coach or, many times, from the example of a sporting hero. To reach the levels that we want children and young people to reach, we need the facilities, equipment, sport halls and playing fields. Youngsters need the choice and, to have a firm foundation, they need a community around them. We must consider that we have lost the community that was built around single industries in towns. We must consider where such communities can come from, around which we can build the environment that youngsters need.

I spent my childhood in a small town named Grangetown, between Middlesbrough and Redcar, where all the children did was play sport. In the summer, we played tennis from early morning until we could no longer run about, then we played bowls. In the winter, we played football all the time. We built our lives around sport and had no energy left for anything else. Grangetown was shown on BBC breakfast news one morning in early 1993. The film almost brought me to tears. I even recognised the street where I lived, but where the youngsters were now setting fire to cars and houses. I wonder whether the lack of opportunity for children to play sport is a crucial cause of the breakdown of community spirit.

Perhaps we should look to the premier league clubs for opportunities for young people. Other hon. Members have complained that the fantastic amount of money that those clubs will receive in future will not be passed down. The Bosman ruling is stopping transfer fees going from large clubs down through the leagues. Perhaps we can build around the premier league and other clubs. We must avoid the drawbridge being pulled up by the premiership, especially when club directors see the money that is available.

There is a growing trend for premier league clubs to become public limited companies, when the duties of the directors change from the community to the shareholders. We are in danger of a tremendous amount of money being lost to the game. At present that money is going not to the directors but to players, in wages and signing fees. We must worry about that money going straight out of the clubs to investors, which has not happened before.

We all agree on the damage done through lack of investment in research and development and in manufacturing industry, and we cannot afford to let the same happen to sport. I was astonished to hear on television this morning the amount of money that the premier league is to receive. I am delighted, but we must try to keep that money within the game. I hope that the massive income from television deals will enable clubs to attract more world-class players from all over the globe. I hope that that wealth will not stay in Europe. The public pay excessively high entrance fees and buy expensive team shirts from premier league clubs.

I trust that some of that wealth will go not only to top players but to the countries from which they come in growing numbers, such as Brazil and Africa. I hope that some of the money will go to children in countries around the world, so that they will have the facilities to participate in sport, which will give them something to live for. I hope that the children will not merely be television spectators through the railings of the stately homes of the Bundesliega and premier league in Britain.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West will be pleased to hear me say that we must look at the alternatives to building on green-field sites. When a wonderful new stadium is built on such a site, it gets headlines, but that is not necessarily good news. The last act of Cleveland county council was to criticise the inadequate car parking facilities at the new Riverside stadium in Middlesbrough. What it forgot was that it was closer to the town centre than Ayresome park. People could park their cars in the multi-storey car park and walk to the game. We want to be sure that people can come into the town from outlying places, using public transport.

We should not build any more grounds on green-field sites. Thank goodness there are not that many areas with derelict industrial land, but where there is, we should consider those areas carefully. If we do build new grounds on out-of-town sites, it should be where there are already multi-screen cinemas and superstores. If facilities are concentrated in one area, we might be able to persuade public transport to service them.

We must listen to the supporters of the game of football. Indeed, there are signs of that happening on both sides of the House. Perhaps we should pay attention to the fanzines. We read them for their humour. They often attack football directors, but they do so with great humour. They have an insight into the psychology of football fans. It would be a good idea to get hold of a selection of fanzines and read them not just for their humour, but for the other information that we can get from them.

While driving here this morning, I was disturbed by the number of people ringing in to the radio programme to complain bitterly about the state of the stations around Wembley. They felt very guilty and ashamed that visitors from abroad would have to travel through those stations. More preparation should have been done and the place spruced up a little. Some hon. Members have referred to the entertainments planned for some of the cities, but perhaps we should have been better prepared in other areas.

I support what the Minister said about a school's prospectus having to state its sporting aims. It is one way to get into people's minds a subject that has mostly been forgotten.

[Mr. Alan Keen]

Although I have had a little dig at the academy of sport, I actually support it. Close to the most deprived area in Feltham is a stadium that, at first glance, looks excellent. However, in reality the running track is unusable and Hounslow athletic club—one of the top clubs in the country—can no longer train there. The all-weather football pitch needs repair. I am not saying that we must put those facilities before the academy of sport, but we need to find some balance to ensure that there are facilities for all, rather than just taking the most promising people and giving them specialist training and coaching.

I was pleased to hear the Minister pay tribute to local authorities. Some people criticise them, others praise them. My local authority in Hounslow has been under tremendous pressure in recent years and has had to make cuts of £6 million each year as the revenue support grant has, in effect, been cut back. It has resisted the temptation to chop leisure services, which might have been the easiest course to take. It has had to pare away at social services and other areas. It understands that investing in sport is investing for the medium and the long term. It is vital to keep the services intact. The council deserves praise and support for that, rather than criticism. It would have been so easy to say, "Right, we shall sell off the leisure centres." If it had done that, all the children in that area who cannot afford private clubs would not even have been able to go to the swimming baths.

I conclude by saying—with humour—that I was excited at one point in the Minister's speech, when he spoke at length about jumping on and off benches in PE. At first, I thought that he was talking about a new sport that he will propose for the next Olympics. I have been told many times that fishing is the most popular participatory sport, but I think that bench jumping might just beat it. Some of those who are not too far from where I stand seem to be quite expert at it—they have certainly been jumping on and off the Treasury Bench.

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn Hatfield): I welcome the opportunity to speak in this very important debate on sport. I believe that the mood of the country is reflected in our achievements on the sports field. Examples include the nation's pride when we won the world cup in 1966, which was a long time ago; in 1936, when Fred Perry—the last Brit to do so—won the Wimbledon tennis championship; and in 1976, when Virginia Wade won the ladies' title.

It seems a million years ago since our cricket team won a series against the West Indies or the Australians. Yes, we have won world titles—with Nigel Mansell and Linford Christie—and I think that we all wanted to believe that Frank Bruno was world boxing champion, although one wonders what sort of authority is running the professional boxing business. The public were asked to watch a series of fights pitting Bruno against joke boxers, only to allow him to embarrass himself in a real fight with Mike Tyson. Who was to blame? Bruno is not to blame; I suggest that it was greed.

The best golfer in the world is English, and I am proud to say that he is from my constituency. Who could ever forget our retaining the Ryder cup last year, or his winning his third green jacket as he overhauled Greg Norman in the Masters a few weeks ago? Why is he the best? Not because he is the most gifted player, but because of his dedication, discipline and determination to win. Practice makes perfect, and he will not accept second best in any preparations before a tournament, or during it. He is an example of excellence, and we in Welwyn Hatfield are proud of him.

The Government have shown a great interest in sport in terms of providing money and new ideas. Sport in schools is paramount to our future, but sport and its progress is not entirely down to the Government or to schools. Other authorities have the real responsibility. I suppose that that brings me to ask what has gone wrong with three of our most popular sports: cricket, tennis and football. It is impossible to cover all the shortcomings in other sports in a short debate but, sooner or later, the problems will have to be faced.

There was a time when we produced great cricketers as if they were coming off an assembly line: Grace, Barnes, Larwood, Hobbs, Sutcliffe, Verity, Hammond, Hutton, Compton, Edrich, May, Trueman, Laker, Bedser, Tyson, Cowdrey, Botham and Gower. So what happened? Where are the great players today? There is none. Why? There are many reasons, but the first concerns the competition, which has not moved with the times. There should be three divisions, promotion and relegation.

It seems unreal that, in the past 70 years, only two counties—Glamorgan and Durham—have joined the current league championship. The authority—the Test and County Cricket Board, although it was the Marylebone Cricket Club until fairly recently—has a vested interest in keeping the competition in-house, because the bulk of county revenue comes from test matches and sponsorship. The so-called first-class counties keep 90 per cent. of their revenue for themselves, and only 10 per cent. goes to the minor counties and minor leagues. It is little wonder that there is little or no desire to encourage more counties into the first-class game. Indeed, the reverse is the case.

About 30 years ago, it was decided that too many county games were drawn, so the authority decided to prepare wickets to produce a result in three days, which was the maximum duration of a match. The result was a wicket on which a fast bowler did not have to bowl fast. The idea was that he should wait for the third day, bowl medium pace on a length and let the wicket do the rest. It was not necessary to learn how to swing a ball or get movement off the wicket. A badly produced wicket did it all for the bowler. The batsmen could not hit through the ball, the ball would not come on to the bat or through at a regular height, and shot-making became impossible. At the same time, other countries were learning on perfect, hard surfaces. Their batsmen and bowlers had to learn their trade—and they did.

The crowds disappeared from county grounds. People go to cricket to watch batsmen hitting the ball all over the ground—which they cannot do on bad wickets. A few years ago, the penny dropped, and there is now a desperate bid to produce good surfaces, but it is too late for an immediate improvement. It will take 20 years for us to rediscover our form on decent wickets.

Another unfortunate development involving our test team in the past few years is the lack of discipline. Players playing for their country are not prepared to play with clean pads or clean boots. They wear watches and sunglasses on the field of play, not to tell the time or keep out of the sun, but to line their pockets with money from sponsors. Captains have press meetings in flip-flops; they appear unshaven and without a jacket.

The fiasco surrounding successive management regimes of the test team continues unabated. There should be a chairman of selection and six selectors to pick the team, and the captain should have full authority. A cricket team does not need a manager in a home series; touring sides should have a tour manager and an assistant to look after the administration and well-being of the team. Members of the administration are all ex-players or the gin-and-tonic brigade. They are all out of touch and flapping around not knowing how to arrest the decline in our cricket. I hope that my comments will give them something to think about.

What about tennis, where we are probably in the most ludicrous situation of all? We do not have one lady player in the top 100 in the world and we have only one man—Tim Henman—in the top 100 men. I do not include the Canadian player we bought to play for us because we have been relegated to a Davis cup-status of a non-event. The last time a British male player won Wimbledon was 60 years ago and, in the women's game, our last winner was 20 years ago. Why?

It all starts at club level. Only recently, a well-known club in Hertfordshire interviewed the parents before allowing a young player to join the club. Another club will not play any under-18-year-olds in the ladies' team, and yet another will not let an under-16 play at weekends. That is not uncommon.

Clubs and county associations are affiliated to the Lawn Tennis Association. The LTA has the game in its grip, and the game cannot escape. The LTA gets its money from the All England Lawn Tennis and Croquet Club in a nice cosy arrangement that has lasted for 100 years. "You play your tournament at our club," says the All England club "and, after expenses, we'll give you what is left over." That arrangement means that, however much money the All England club makes in the Wimbledon fortnight—approximately £20 million after expenses—it all goes to the sole benefactor, the LTA.

The LTA has been totally disastrous at producing facilities and opportunities for our budding youngsters, which is proved by our appalling record in the Davis cup and our complete lack of champions in the men's and ladies' game. How do we change that?

First, the All England club has to let private or public companies bid through presentations for its money on, say, a three-year contract to develop alternatives. Young players would then accept that, although a club was not signed up to the LTA, it would be possible for them to compete not only in all local competitions, but for their county and their country. At the moment, without LTA affiliation, that is not possible.

The LTA runs all competitions. Why? When a private organisation wins a contract from the All England club, the LTA must not be able to undermine it by being given all the best tickets, the royal box and the marquees during the Wimbledon fortnight. Sponsors must not be wooed away by the LTA, which has the perks at its disposal to do so, in liaison with the All England club.

The LTA should have to compete. It could not, because it is run and dominated by losers—people who have never won anything on or off the field, not just recently, but in living memory. The LTA terrifies parents and intimidates players, both young and not so young, with its dreadful sub-standard coaches who, in many instances, have never competed at the top. The LTA is a curse on the game and will continue to be so unless the All England club is brave enough to say, "Enough is enough."

With Euro 96 approaching, football is in turmoil, even though attendances continue to increase, which is probably the only good thing we can say. Yes, we did win the World cup in 1966, but we have won nothing since. Yes, millions of pounds are being poured into the game from television, but that money is being spent irresponsibly on transfer fees and players' salaries while very little is spent on improving stadiums.

I hope that the premier league clubs will look at the rest of the league when they get the £8 million. I doubt that they will. Stevenage, which is not in my constituency, won the Vauxhall Conference league, but it is being barred from the football league because the Football Association, with its closed-shop attitude, is protecting Torquay United in a bid to keep the league a closed shop. That is scandalous.

Developments, especially those at the bigger clubs, are financed mainly by the Football Trust. In the rat race to win, the league is fragmented, as we all know. That is true even of the premier league, where only six clubs have a realistic chance of winning the title or of winning one of the other domestic trophies. Such is the skill factor of our game that there is no chance of our winning any competition in Europe.

Hooliganism is still rife. In the season just gone, a match at Brighton was abandoned. The season was littered with incidents. Cantona, the footballer of the year, leapt into the crowd and kung fu-kicked a spectator, yet he is on £30,000 a year—

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): A week.

Mr. Evans: He is on £30,000 a week, and he is a Frenchman at that. He should have been banned from our game, but he was not. He was forgiven, and we then wonder why fans break goalposts at Brighton.

The FA is a bunch of amateurs running a professional game. The chief executive, who has presided over the demise of discipline required on and off the field, has clearly been incompetent for a long time. I could spend the rest of the day giving examples of hooliganism over the past 10 years. The most vivid example, which says it all, involves the behaviour of the FA, particularly its chief executive and chairman, the manager of the English football team and, indeed, the players. I refer to the inexplicable decision to go to China and back as preparation for the most important tournament in this country for 30 years.

Football is a violent game. It is more accurately described as a collision than as a contact sport. Nobody expects the gladiators who play at the highest level to be statesmen or saints, or even the mythical Corinthians of the legendary old school for whom playing up and playing the game was more important than winning. That is not what they are paid millions for, but the latest bad behaviour by the supposedly grown men of the England squad confirms the depressing image of English football after its age of innocence. That impression is not so much one of lions led by donkeys as of hippopotami managed by hypocrites.

[Mr. Evans]

The extravagantly boozy, shirt-stripping 29th birthday party for Paul Gascoigne in a Hong Kong nightclub was worse than outrageous. It was idiotic, because it was in public, so it was photographed and sold to the newspapers, thus signalling a humiliating message to the millions for whom Gazza and his team mates are heroes. It does not inspire confidence in England's discipline or fitness on the field a fortnight later in the most important football championship to be held in Britain for 30 years.

The drunken damage caused to the aircraft bringing the team home was criminal and dangerous, as well as appalling publicity for the England game, but the timorous reaction by England's football authorities was far worse. This week's statements were made too reluctantly, too late and were too secretive in their bad-boy network.

The refusal by Terry Venables to name the four players chiefly responsible for damaging the aeroplane was an example not of collective team responsibility but of managerial cowardice. Who can doubt that the affair would have been trodden into the mud had Cathay Pacific not claimed £5,000 in compensation for the damage to its 747? If the offenders had been yobbish fans rather than yobbish megastars, they would have been taken to police cells at Heathrow without their studs touching the turf, but as the ball bounced, Terry Venables acted late—and with apparent reluctance—by ruling out in advance the expulsion of anyone from the squad.

A publicity agent's description of the team's behaviour as "mild high jinks" was an insult to youthful high spirits as well as a monstrous euphemism in a sport where euphemism is usually offside. Any player who misbehaved so wildly when Sir Alf Ramsey was manager would have been sent straight home. In those days, nobody would have dared or wanted to misbehave when wearing a England blazer.

Gazza and the rest should not have had a chance of starting on Saturday to redeem their professional reputations in the historic national arenas if the squad was collectively responsible for its behaviour in Hong Kong and on the Cathay Pacific aeroplane. The manager should have resigned and the squad should have been dismissed. Unless the authority was prepared to allow another squad to be named, we should have withdrawn from the tournament. There is no chance of winning such a tournament. At that level it is simply impossible without discipline.

If the squad had been dismissed as I have just suggested, those who wore the England shirt in future would be aware of their responsibilities and they would wear it with pride. Let us hope that, when Glenn Hoddle takes over as manager, new standards will be set and that, thereafter, English players will behave in a way that is conducive to pride and integrity, that he himself will dress and behave in a manner that befits the manager of our national team—with the top button of his shirt done up so as not to give the impression of a Sunday morning, jack-the-lad manager—and perhaps the young men who make up the England team will rediscover the important old English virtues of discipline, modesty and common sense.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, a nation's mood is set by its sporting heroes and achievements. Let us hope that this summer will be a triumph in sporting success in cricket, tennis and football—but I doubt it.

1.9 pm

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I listened with great interest to the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans). If I were a member of the England squad, I might argue that Members of Parliament were no people to lecture footballers on drunkenness, yobbishness and bad behaviour.

The eve of Euro 96 is an appropriate time for this debate. I am glad to have the opportunity to speak in what has until now been something of a "Boy's Own" debate to raise issues of wider significance. It is impossible to exaggerate sport's significance in inner-city areas such as Hackney. My hon. Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Keen) said how important sport was to him as a schoolboy in a very poor town in the north.

As we approach the millennium, sportsmen are the only authentic heroes for young people in inner cities such as those whom I represent in Hackney. The days when people saw politicians, soldiers, explorers and even business men as heroes are long gone. Sportsmen are the heroes for the young boys and girls in my constituency's schools and it is one of the reasons why sport is so important and of a wider significance to society.

For young people in inner-city areas such as Hackney, especially young males who seem to be systematically underachieving educationally, sport offers an arena where achievement and the ability to excel seem possible. Sadly, despite the bravado, bluster and even violence, such young men—black and white—often have deep feelings of inferiority in education and even their ability to hold a job. Sport for them is an arena in which they can imagine themselves achieving. That is such a positive factor to build on in education and society. Sport helps people in inner cities to build a sense of community and offers wider horizons, which, in terms of turning them into citizens and helping to build a society, is very significant.

A few days ago my hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) was talking about his ideas on curfews for young children. While I agree that it is sad and inappropriate for young children under the age of 10 to be on the streets until all hours, I do not believe that curfews are the answer. A proper policy on sport in schools to provide sporting facilities for young people is the positive and constructive way in which to ensure that children under the age of 10 are occupied and not hanging around on the streets where, as we know, the devil finds work for idle hands.

I particularly wish to mark the contribution of black and—to use the word much favoured by the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield—immigrant sports people. Whenever race and immigration issues are raised in the House, they tend to be in a negative context such as immigration controls, refugees and crime. I want to speak about the excellence, dedication and hard work that so many black people and people of immigrant descent display in the sporting arena which makes them heroes for black and white young people.

We will all have marvelled in the past few weeks at the truly stupendous performance of Linford Christie on the athletics field. At a point in his career when many people might be thinking of leaving athletics, Linford Christie is still a world beater. For most young people, certainly in my part of London, he is much more of a hero than any hon. Member.

Mr. David Evans: Is the hon. Lady aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe) is the president of the Haringey athletics club?

Ms Abbott: I am well aware not only of the hon. Gentleman's contribution to sport but of his very strong personal stand on racial discrimination. None the less, since we have had so many negative debates in recent months about immigration, refugees and race, I thought that it was important to take the opportunity to mark the achievements of British citizens such as Linford Christie who are excelling and doing this country proud.

I want to say a little about racism in sport, and I shall start with football.

I was interested to read a recent newspaper article by Cyrille Regis, one of the first black players to play for England in the early 1980s, in which he said how much hate mail he received when he first put on the England strip. He remembers getting a letter with a bullet in, saying that the minute he went on to the pitch at Wembley, the bullet would find him.

"But, sadly, racism is still there and I don't know if it can ever be eradicated . . . We've got plenty of black players now but hardly any black fans and that's terrible. In black people's minds they're still frightened to go to matches because they know that there will be people there who are racists and they might get beaten up".

It is remarkable that although about one quarter of our professional footballers are black, a tiny proportion of regular attenders at football matches are black. I am afraid that that shows the continuing prevalence of racism among sporting crowds.

Another sad fact, despite the number of black footballers who excel on the field, is the very small number of black people who get into football management. I can think of Viv Anderson, who was brought in by Bryan Robson as an assistant at Middlesbrough, and more recently, Luther Blissett has been made Watford's first team coach.

If black footballers are good enough to go out there and play and work their hearts out, if they have the talent and ability to play on the field, I wonder why they are not coming through into management.

Mr. Tony Banks: There is another exception to add to my hon. Friend's excellent and thoughtful speech. That is, of course, Ruud Gullit, who has just been appointed manager and coach of Chelsea. But he is Dutch.

Ms Abbott rose—

Mr. Ashton: May I also point out to my hon. Friend the fact that Brendon Batson is the deputy at the Professional Footballers Association?

Ms Abbott: I am grateful to my hon. Friends, whose knowledge of football far exceeds mine, but I hope that they will accept that the general point stands: we have many black footballers on the field, but they are not coming through into management.

I also want to say a word on behalf of Britain's Asian communities. There are at least 1.8 million Asians in this country, 60 per cent. of Bengalis play soccer, compared with 47 per cent. of whites, and there are 300 Asian teams in Britain, with a nationwide network of Asian leagues. Yet to the best of my knowledge there is not one Asian professional footballer.

I know from my own constituency, where the North London Muslim Association has a very successful soccer team, how enthusiastic young Asians are about soccer, so I hope that it will not be too long before we start seeing Asian footballers taking their place on the pitch with those of other races and colours.

If we are talking about sport for all, and the importance of excelling, that can be genuine only if we pick our sportsmen from society as a whole, and if no group in society is excluded, for reasons beyond its control, from being able to show what it can do in representing its town and its country on the sports field.

Before I leave soccer I shall remark on a matter that has already been raised—the loophole in the Football (Offences) Act 1991, whereby if a whole group of people chant racist abuse, they can be prosecuted, but if a single person is calling out racist abuse, that person cannot be prosecuted. I hope that it will not be too long before the Act is tightened.

I do not know how black professional footballers tolerate week in and week out the hideous abuse, the bananas and the catcalls that many have to face when they go on to the pitch. I believe that there is less of that now than there was years ago, because there are so many more black professionals playing for different clubs. But it is still a sad thing, especially in a sport where so many young people go as spectators. It cannot be the right example for young children to go to football matches and hear their elders and "betters" chanting abuse at black footballers. I hope that the 1991 Act will be tightened to prevent that.

This is not an issue for Britain alone. Hon. Members will have read about the experiences of Paul Ince in Italy, playing for Milan, and the vicious and fascist abuse, banners and catcalls. It is one thing to make heroes of individual black sportsmen, but if we take their achievements seriously, those of us who are interested in sport, and those of us who serve in a voluntary or political capacity, must ensure that sport is a safe and constructive environment for people at every level, whether they are sportsmen or spectators, both in this country and internationally.

When people talk about black sportsmen, whether they are footballers or athletes, there is sometimes a temptation to say, or even to hint, "Well, of course, they are good because there is some innate physiological difference."

Sir Roger Bannister was quoted recently on the subject of black athletes. He said:

"It is obvious that there must be something special about their anatomy or physiology which produces these outstanding successes".

I am sure that Sir Roger Bannister did not mean any harm by that, but black sportsmen resent the notion that there is some anatomical difference. At the turn of the century, many of the top boxers in this country were of Jewish origin, and we had a world champion in Kid Berg. There was no physiological reason why young Jews in between the wars excelled in boxing—it was because they wanted to succeed and because they worked hard to be better. Black sportsmen want some respect for their capacity to work and to achieve success, and they do not want their achievements written off as some kind of physiological or anatomical quirk.

We have read in the newspapers recently about the dispute between Devon Malcolm and Ray Illingworth. That clearly is a clash of personalities and, as a member of the parliamentary Labour party, I know what it is to be on the rough end of the tongue of a blunt-speaking northerner. None the less, it is a shame that a cricketer as dignified, modest and hard-working as Devon Malcolm should feel for a minute that he is being picked out for abuse and treated in a derogatory way because of his ethnic origin. I hope that that matter will be cleared up.

It is an honour to play for England—whether at cricket, football or any other sport—and people take it seriously, whatever their colour. The idea that anyone should be treated in a certain way because of their ethnic origin is very sad. I hope that the dispute between Devon Malcolm and Ray Illingworth does not continue, and that any black man playing cricket for England will feel that he is being treated in exactly the same way—for good or ill—as his white colleagues.

My final point falls outside the remit of the Minister—sports broadcasting. It is all very well to talk about the money that is going into sport from this deal and that deal, but it would be a great shame if the young working-class boys and girls about whom I talked were denied the widest possible access to sport because of short-term profits made through deals with satellite or other broadcasters. In the end, sport is not the property of the premier league or of the management of satellite broadcasters—it is the property of the people. This House should stand up for a broadcasting regulatory regime that ensures that as many people as possible have access to our great national sports.

I am grateful to have had the opportunity to speak in the debate, and I hope that I have brought a different perspective to it. It is important to mark the achievements of our black sportsmen, who sometimes feel that they do not receive the credit they should. As a Member of Parliament, I can raise issues that individual black sportsmen and women cannot raise, but I can assure the House that these issues are deeply felt. I hope that in forming sports policy, the House will bear them in mind.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Colchester, South and Maldon): I am faintly astonished to find myself participating in a debate on sport. I do not claim to be an avid follower although, like many of my constituents, I had a brief frisson of excitement when Colchester United made it to the play-offs for promotion to the second division. Sadly, its hopes were dashed by Plymouth.

I am an even less enthusiastic participant in sport. I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Minister is temporarily absent, as he is one of the few in the House who will understand when I say that, at school, I was forced to play a weekly game of fives, as well as a peculiarly brutal game known as Winchester college football, which normally resulted in substantial injuries to the participants. I was also required to fill in a daily record of the amount of exercise that I had taken. A consequence was that I became an expert in forgery and other means of avoiding recording physical effort. But I accept, in retrospect, that it was a sensible way of trying to ensure that pupils undertake daily sport. I am sure that it was as a result of my hon. Friend's similar experience of that regime that he has now attached such importance to trying to get pupils to participate in sport. That is something which I strongly support.

One of the biggest changes that we have seen in sport in the past few years is the amount of money available to it. Almost every sport would be able to make the case as to why it should receive more money, but we should recognise that the funding of sport has been transformed for two principal reasons. The first is the advent of the national lottery. Almost everyone now accepts that the lottery has been a great success—£1.7 billion has been raised for good causes, £200 million of which has gone into sport. It is particularly welcome that the majority of that money has gone into small local sporting bodies, and allowed them to undertake projects which, often, they would otherwise have found to be impossible. In the past few weeks, I have had an excellent example of that in my constituency with the grant of almost £16,000 to Great Totham cricket club. That will allow it to build a new pavilion, which will be ready at the start of next season. That is extremely good news and exactly the type of project that the lottery should be used to finance.

The other principal cause of the extra money going into sport is, as the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) said, the sale of rights for the broadcasting of sporting events on television. That is an issue which, even now, we are debating in Committee on the Broadcasting Bill. It is important that we place on record in today's debate the benefits that sporting bodies have enjoyed as a result of the money they have received from the sale of transmission rights. That has largely happened as a result of the advent of subscription sports channels, and in particular BSkyB.

A recent letter to The Times was signed by the chief executive of the Rugby Football League, the secretary of the Royal and Ancient golf club, the secretary of the Rugby Football Union, the chief executive of the Football Association, the executive director of the Lawn Tennis Association and the chief executive of the Test and County Cricket Board. They represent almost all the major sporting bodies and they wrote:

"In the past five years the cosy terrestrial duopoly has been broken and a true market established for sporting rights. The financial benefits flowing from this have enabled us to provide better stadia and better training facilities, more help for the stars of tomorrow and, crucially, a better prospect of higher standards of achievement on the field."

I understand the concern of those who believe that the major sporting events should continue to be available free to air on the terrestrial channels. The right way to address that issue is by seeking a voluntary agreement and a code of conduct. I welcome the efforts that have already been made to achieve that. The Government have decided to go further and to reinforce the code through the existing list of national events that cannot be shown exclusively live on subscription channels. I have to say that I feel somewhat uncomfortable at any statutory measure, first on a matter of principle, because I believe that sporting bodies should be free to sell their rights when and how they wish. I also feel some misgivings on the matter of practice, because the existence of such restrictions is bound to diminish the amount of money that will be available to sport as a result of those sales. I am glad therefore that the Government have decided to resist those who have called for the list to be extended and kept it to the small number of events that were originally drawn up following the passage of the Broadcasting Act 1990.

Even that decision carries with it some dangers, because although in most cases the events on the list are specific, single sporting events, the inclusion of all cricket matches involving England will obviously have a significant impact on the amount of money available to cricket. I know that that is of some concern to the Test and County Cricket Board. It is noticeable, for instance, that the same does not apply in football, where the only category involving football matches played by England on that list of major sporting events is the World cup finals. It may be rather optimistic to assume that that will involve England, but one lives in hope.

Several hon. Members have already mentioned the deal between BSkyB and the premier league which was announced last night. That offers a further demonstration of the benefits that football, and obviously the premier league, will enjoy as a result of the sale of broadcast rights.

The other proposal in the Bill covering the transmission of sporting events that is causing some concern is that of separating unused rights so that the broadcaster with the right to live transmissions must make available highlights to other broadcasters. It is a complicated area. The highlights, for example, of a horse race, which may last for about four minutes, are likely to be very different from the highlights of a one-day cricket match or, even more so, from the highlights of a tennis tournament, which could last for two weeks. I consider the best approach to be by way of voluntary agreements, which could be individually tailored to each sport. The attempt by means of the Bill to set rigid rules covering all sport will, I suspect, lead to considerable difficulties. It could result in serious losses to sports. I have no doubt that we shall discuss the issues further in Committee.

For the remainder of my remarks I shall concentrate on a sport that I believe is being treated extremely unfairly. The matter was originally brought to my attention by one of my constituents, Mr. Patrick Chaplin of Maldon, who is an historian of the game of darts.

Thousands of people in this country play darts. Probably half, if not more, of our pubs have darts teams. More than 25,000 players are members of the British Darts Organisation, which is a founder member of the World Darts Federation, which in turn represents about 500,000 players in over 50 countries worldwide.

The game of darts was invented in the United Kingdom. It requires good sportsmanship, skill, team spirit, long hours of practice and strict adherence to the rules of the game. Yet according to the Sports Council, darts is not a sport. That is a cause of considerable resentment among those who are keen players.

When I raised the matter with my hon. Friend the Minister, he wrote as follows:

"The Sports Council has developed its own system of recognition, based on a number of principles, to decide which activities and organisations should be eligible for support. Predominant amongst the criteria against which the Sports Council assess suitability for recognition is a requirement for physical effort."

My hon. Friend understands that it was mainly on that count that the Sports Council decided that darts did not warrant priority for formal recognition of the activity.

Many darts players would dispute such claims. They would testify that it requires a high degree of physical fitness, mental agility and stamina to play darts. The argument breaks down entirely, however, when we consider other sporting activities that the Sports Council recognises as sports, including snooker, pool, ballroom dancing, ballooning, arm wrestling and baton twirling. Until recently, camping and caravaning were classified as sports. I see no reason why the council should continue to claim that darts is different from the activities to which I have referred and should not be classified as a sport.

England leads the world in darts. At the recent World Darts Federation World cup in Switzerland, English players won every gold medal. In doing so they beat players from 40 other countries. The teams over which they triumphed included those from Australia, the Netherlands, Germany and Denmark. In every instance the Governments of the other countries support darts and recognise darts as a sport.

On Sunday, one of my constituents, Mr. Kevin Painter of Tiptree, will be defending his title as winner of the England open championship. The women's world No. 2 player, Deta Hedman, lives just outside my constituency in Witham. Possibly the best-known darts referee in the world, Mr. Martin Fitzmaurice, lives in Colchester, as does Bobby George, who is one of our most successful players and probably the best-known darts personality in the world. My hon. Friend will understand, therefore, why this issue provokes extremely strong feelings in my constituency.

Each year, BBC Sport televises the Embassy world professional darts championship, which is watched by perhaps 5 million people. Clearly, the BBC recognises darts as a sport. The greatest darts player of all time, Mr. Eric Bristow, was awarded an MBE for services to sport, so even Her Majesty the Queen recognises that darts is a sport. The only organisation in the world that appears to take a contrary view is the Sports Council. It is high time that that was changed. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to intervene and to tell the Sports Council to think again.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North–West): Unlike the hon. Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale), I am very much involved in sport. In my mind, I have represented my country in every sport other than synchronised swimming. That was for some time, although not for a long period, recognised as an Olympic sport, but display sports are no longer part of the Olympic games.

Archery has been in the Olympic games and I agree with the hon. Gentleman that darts is a recognised sport and should be included in them. As he rightly said, given the amount of expertise that we have, we will achieve a clean sweep of gold medals. If we get around to staging the Olympic games in this country, I hope that we will put in darts as one of the preferred Olympic games sports, which we would welcome. The hon. Gentleman makes a serious point and I take it seriously.

Like others, I welcome this debate. I thought that it was finely chosen to coincide with the eve of Euro 96, but when I heard the Minister speak, I realised that that was not the case, although hon. Members on both sides of the House have taken the opportunity to remind the House that we are looking forward to the championships, which start tomorrow.

I am also slightly saddened by the small attendance in the House. Sporting issues and sport generally are such an important subject to the people whom we represent. I am not alone—far from it—in reading my newspaper starting from the back page and working through to less serious matters on the front page. Sport is a significant social-cementing element in this country. Like the weather, it is a subject that everyone has an opinion on and wants to talk about. Hon. Members should recognise its significance.

My very good hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) made by far and away the best speech of the day. She raised some crucial issues. I was especially taken—when I heard her say it, I thought, "Yes, of course"—by her comment that 25 per cent. of all premier league players are of Afro-Caribbean origin, yet only 1 or 2 per cent. of premier league crowds are of Afro-Caribbean origin. The number increases as we go down the leagues because the amount of racism declines as we go down the leagues, but she is right to draw attention to that fact and to the question of physiological differences.

Sir Roger Bannister was talking clumsily about black athletes. At one time, people thought that black athletes were good only in explosive events such as the 100 or 200 m. Then the Kenyans and Ethiopians suddenly had all these long-distance runners and people had to readjust their peculiar theories. It is all about opportunity, training facilities and coaching. It has nothing to do with skin colour. I love that advertisement with the different brain sizes, where the black and white brains are the same size and the only small brain is that of the racist. My hon. Friend raised some exceedingly good points.

Being Minister for sport is not so much a job as a sending to heaven without having to die first, although the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) proved that it was possible to become the Minister for sport and die a death subsequently.

I want to raise a few points about Euro 96. We are looking forward to, I hope, a great festival of football in this country, but the Government have failed to rise to the occasion. The £100,000 that the Government have provided to help the eight cities celebrate that great event is insignificant compared with the income that the Government will receive in taxation. Euro 96 remains a great opportunity to promote different parts of this country throughout the tournament. It is typical of the Government that they have failed to respond imaginatively. I will inject party politics into the debate: it is typical of the Government also that the millennium has crept up and caught them by surprise. There have been 996 years to think about the millennium. Here we are four years away and suddenly someone says, "My God! It's the millennium in four years. Someone should have told us." Pathetic, but typical of the Government's approach to visionary politics. They do not have any vision.

I have heard some disturbing stories about the opening ceremony for Euro 96. It is sounding a bit like a second-rate pantomime. I hope that I am wrong. If not, that will be another lost opportunity to celebrate the great game of soccer. Of course Euro 96 is a competitive tournament, but it is also a festival of European football. The opening ceremony should emphasise not division but the commonality and mutuality that come through the great sport of football in Europe.

I am dreading an extension of the farcical Euro-beef war to the football pitch. Hooliganism is a sad feature of the modern game, but as someone who goes to a football match nearly every Saturday, I know that it is a minority activity. Unfortunately, it tends to poison the entire game. The police in England—rather than in Scotland, Wales or Northern Ireland—have become the best in the world at dealing with soccer hooliganism. It is regrettable that they have found it necessary to accumulate such expertise. I believe that I was the first to suggest in the House a national intelligence system in football. The then Home Secretary rejected that idea out of hand, but some years later it was found opportune to introduce such a system. The only way of dealing with the hooligan minority is to eliminate their activities at the source. That can be done only by having all possible information about them and their plans.

I believe that the police will be able to handle any likely problems at Euro 96, and there will be some. The police have not been helped by the chaotic ticket sales. It will be extraordinary difficult for the police to segregate fans from different countries. Last week's Sunday Mirror had a story about a couple of convicted Italian terrorists who were selling tickets in London, having been approved by the Italian national ticket agency. That sort of incident is an enormous loophole in the ticket allocation system.

It has been estimated that the extra cost of policing Euro 96 will be £5 million. When I asked the Home Secretary yesterday whether he intended to make more resources available so that the cost did not fall on council tax payers in London and other parts of the country, he went thermo-nuclear on me. I do not understand why he went completely berserk. I thought that the Home Secretary had flipped, and I was waiting for the men in white coats to come in and drag him off. It seems that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was not prepared to answer a quiet and rational question in a quiet and rational way. Perhaps the Home Secretary was not expecting such a question from me. He certainly will not get one in future, if that is the way he behaves when I ask about additional resources so that council tax payers do not have an extra burden to bear, given that the Government are getting enough in receipts to make extra resources available.

It was a pity that, at the same time as the police were arresting suspected football hooligans throughout the country, some members of the England team were rearranging the fixtures and fittings on an aircraft returning from Hong Kong. I do not know to what extent the lurid stories in the newspapers are true, but I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton). The Football Association, by failing to deal immediately with the issue, managed to turn an incident into a drama.

The behaviour of some of our footballers, especially the English ones, is absolutely pathetic. It is almost as though nature perversely put the talent in the feet, but removed the brain. The way that some of the players behave is most regrettable. I cannot imagine players like Matthews, Finney, Moore or Charlton conducting themselves in the way that Gazza does.

We all know that there is an awful lot of money floating around in the game at the moment. Some of the players do not seem able to handle all that money. They think that normal human behaviour patterns should not apply to them and that they can behave like drunken pop stars. It is not good enough. I do not want to be as rigorous as the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), but I agree that the FA must demand and require a higher standard of conduct from players.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington referred to black role models. Footballers are role models for white and black communities. They should bear that in mind. We do not expect them to behave like saints—after all, no one could say that we do—but we expect a reasonable amount of intelligent behaviour.

I am glad that money is now coming into the game. For too long, it was short-changed by its own authorities, in their deals with the broadcasters, and by those making a large amount of money from merchandising. Now, the money is rightfully coming into the game, but unfortunately a great deal of it is being concentrated in the hands of too few players and clubs. An enormous deal has been done between the Football Association, BSkyB and the BBC—£730 million for the next four years. We should contrast that with the £2.5 million a year being paid just a few years ago. All that money should not go to just a few clubs. Essentially, it will go to the premier league clubs, and only a minority of those.

We do not want the money to be handled in that way. It should be used to nourish the grass-roots of football and to provide more facilities for spectators. The right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) was absolutely right to say that many, many ordinary people are being priced out of the game. Season tickets are very expensive. I am lucky I can afford one for Chelsea, but it cost me £630 to renew it. Admission charges exclude the unemployed, people on social security and young people who are not earning. Football cannot continue to ignore the generations of fans yet to come. Some of the money coming into the game should be used to provide concessionary tickets so that the next generation of football fans can gain admission to matches.

Of course, I accept that we need better facilities—in particular, a much better national soccer stadium. Quite frankly, Wembley is not where that stadium should be. Wembley is a disgrace. Having seen some of the stadiums around the world, I am ashamed that that is where the finals will be played. It and its facilities are an absolute and utter disgrace, as are the transport services to get people there. Wembley keeps being tarted up, but its age and crumbling nature cannot be disguised. I have been thinking about what it reminds me of—it is Barbara Cartland. It has had an interesting, romantic past, but all the paint in the world cannot camouflage its decrepitude.

Lady Olga Maitland: That is horrid.

Mr. Banks: Yes, but so is the person to whom I referred and so is the national stadium.

We need a new national soccer stadium, but it certainly should not be at Wembley. If it does end up at Wembley, the people who have run Wembley into the ground should not be allowed to operate the new stadium. I think that it should be built in London. After all, it is the capital city. People from abroad want to come to London. It is the capital city, and that is where the new soccer stadium should be located—I think that it should be in docklands.

It is great that we were able to attract Euro 96. It is a pity that we have not been able to secure the Olympic games. The International Olympic Committee would award the games only to London—so Manchester and Birmingham can forget it—but they will not be awarded to London until we have a local authority for London. That statement is not mine—me being prejudiced in my desire for a strategic local authority for London—but it is what the IOC said. The IOC will not do a deal with the Government, with the City of London or with an amalgamation of boroughs. It will do a deal only with a strategic authority for London. Until we have one, even London can forget about hosting the Olympic games.

We do not need to have Wembley—tired, clapped-out or even revamped Wembley—as a stadium. We need a new, purpose-built athletics and swimming complex, in London, to attract the Olympic games in 2008, for example. I have the site; it is Stratford. We could construct a complex over the new international station which is being built, and that will enable us to put in a successful bid for the year 2008.

I should like to mention an interesting report from the Council of Europe which I was involved in discussing recently. The report was on discrimination against women in the Olympics. We heard evidence from an organisation called Atlanta Plus, which is campaigning on the issue of discrimination against women. At the Barcelona Olympics, 35 countries had no female representation. In certain cases, that was because the countries were too small to have women athletes of Olympic standard. But that begs the question: why did they not have such women athletes? It was because training and coaching facilities were denied to women in those countries.

Some countries deliberately exclude women from participating in sports. I must name Iran, which has explicitly banned women from most sports. It banned women from attending soccer matches and has advised women that the only sports in which they can participate are those that they can play while wearing a veil. That is a pretty tricky thing to have to do in sports—except perhaps in darts. So far as I am aware, however, that is not a particularly popular sport in Iran.

Iran even refused to allow a female athlete to lead the national delegation at the Barcelona Olympics. Whatever we call it, that is sexism, and it conflicts entirely with the Olympic charter. I am not making an anti-Islamic point, although that is often how such points are misconstrued. The Olympic charter is quite specific about the matter and states:

"any form of discrimination with regard to a country or a person on grounds of race, religion, politics, sex or otherwise is incompatible with belonging to the Olympic Movement."

It is a fact that certain Islamic countries are defying the international Olympic charter. If they are doing that, they should be asked to leave. It is a free association, and if they do not like the rules, they can leave the Olympic movement.

I believe that the IOC should stop ducking this issue. I should be very interested to hear whether the Minister has had thoughts on this matter and whether he has discussed the issue of discrimination against women with the British Olympic Committee.

[Mr. Banks]

Those are the points that I wanted to raise. It has been an interesting and a varied debate. I am most grateful to have been allowed to take part in it.

1.53 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Worcester): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Newham, North–West (Mr. Banks). I find myself sharing rather more of his passions than I expected I would. I certainly agree with him about Chelsea—although, sadly, my expression of enthusiasm for that team is more passive than I would like. However, I must part company with him on his comments about Barbara Cartland. I must also remind him that there is a world outside London. The national stadium should be built in the midlands.

I had intended to cede my opportunity to speak in this debate to the real experts, but the promotion of my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Coe)—who is, no doubt, the greatest expert in the House on sport—which has given a new meaning to the phrase "running Whip", has denied us the opportunity of hearing his remarks.

I am concerned about the situation facing cricket in my county, and that is the matter that I should like to draw to the attention of the House today.

I suppose that sport is about fitness, loyalty and competition. Rather like my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale), I cannot pretend that fitness is my strong suit, but I hope that my ministerial colleagues will feel that loyalty and competition are. I was once selected for my local swimming club, but the postcard arrived two days late and I missed the event. I made it to first boat cox at university, which may surprise some hon. Members, and I achieved a classic wash-off as a second boat cox—I shall explain the technique afterwards to anyone who is interested. I found myself surf bathing with the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill) on a remote Cornish beach last week, but I was not wearing a wetsuit—so that is one up to the Tories—and I look forward to a game of skittles in Evesham this evening.

That is about the extent of my sporting credentials, but I am an enthusiastic member of Worcestershire county cricket club. I should also add that if any of the organisations that I list in the Register of Members' Interests advise any of the interests that I will mention, I was not aware of it and I certainly do not advise them myself.

I had hoped to speak at some length about the Government's very welcome policy developments for sport in schools, but I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Lady Olga Maitland) hopes to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, after I have spoken and to speak on that topic. In any event, I have nothing of substance to add to my hon. Friend the Minister's most welcome comments on the matter. I therefore deal mainly with sport after school.

It is important that we encourage people to be observers and participants, but I take the view that the best kind of observer is the live spectator, not the passive television viewer. Armchair supporters have their place—sadly, that is my role with Chelsea—but we need crowds. As the hon. Member for Newham, North–West said, we need crowds who can afford to get to games for the atmosphere, to provide money for clubs and to encourage new participants. My concern is that sport should be an enjoyable live experience for the spectator and the participant and that more money should be made available for investment in sport. It is common ground among the parties that money is needed to achieve excellence, which leads me to some specific observations about the lottery and broadcasting.

On broadcasting, I understand the view of those, including several constituents who have written to me, who prefer the status quo and like as many sports as possible on BBC 1, BBC 2 and the ITV channels. The question that we have to ask ourselves in all honesty is whether we can turn back the tide. King Canute sought to show his courtiers that he could not do that; I am rather worried that the House is still in danger of misinterpreting King Canute and is seeking to hold back a tide that is in fact irresistible.

What has television done for sport? Sport has entered a free and highly competitive broadcasting market. Until recently many, if not most, of the country's sports suffered from chronic underexposure and a lack of funds. They were constrained by the relatively small sums on offer from the terrestrial broadcasters and the lack of available channels on which to appear. It is important to remember that the satellite and cable channels are offering expanded opportunities for people to enjoy sport and are not just adding money to the games.

Many sporting authorities have made it absolutely clear—my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon cited a letter in yesterday's edition of The Times in this respect—that the new competition for broadcasting rights from BSkyB and others has resulted in millions of pounds of additional funding going to sport. We all know what happened to football yesterday.

The revolution is not limited to BSkyB, satellite or cable broadcasting, nor to Britain. It is a global revolution involving worldwide technological advances. Subscription-funded thematic channels and on-demand viewing are international developments on which we must not turn our back.

The consultation paper that the Government issued in, I think, February this year sought to set out the dilemmas. The Government recognised that the crown jewels of British sport could quickly become devalued if sport did not have the money to reinvest in the superstars of tomorrow and the necessary facilities.

I am worried, however, that the way in which the Broadcasting Bill is developing means that we are putting listed events into too tight a legislative straitjacket. We are penalising the most successful and popular events, causing serious distortions in the market and a serious loss of earnings. I know that the Test and County Cricket Board has particularly acute concerns in that connection.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, South and Maldon, I believe that the voluntary code is the right way to proceed. I believe that, because I know that the sports bodies themselves understand that they have a duty not only to maximise income to ensure that their sports succeed, but to seek the widest possible coverage for those sports. There is always a conflict between those two objectives, but it is better to leave it to the sports themselves to resolve rather than trying to do it by statute.

Turning to more local concerns, my constituency of Worcester is lucky in that we are developing three centres of excellence for specific sports: rowing, rugby and cricket. Rowing has been a huge beneficiary of the Foundation for Sport and the Arts, an organisation that we have not heard enough about in the debate. I am deeply grateful to the foundation for all that it is doing both for sport and for the arts in my constituency. As a result, we are building up in the west midlands a real centre of excellence for rowing and for related water-borne activities such as dragon boating. Sportsmatch has been an invaluable component in enabling that sport to develop locally. The Government's money to match private sponsorship is making an important contribution.

Another Government initiative has probably made the biggest and most dramatic impact on sport in my constituency; I refer to rugby. Worcester rugby football club is the recipient of £1.3 million of lottery money. I know how much the club welcomes that huge sum. In 1992, before the lottery, the club wanted to construct a training shed—it was little more than that—to provide facilities for young rugby players in the youth and mini category. I am glad to say that the immediate past chairman of Worcester rugby football club, David Hallmark, in consultation with the North Midlands Rugby Football Union, managed to get Worcester identified as a club suitable to establish a centre of excellence for youth rugby. There has been a tremendous commitment to that process under successive chairmen of the club, including individuals such as Brian Wilkes, Colin Major and David Arr.

As a result, the idea has been taken forward to a triumphant conclusion. The application for a much more sophisticated facility was made to the Sports Council in June 1995. The application was successful and Worcester received what I believe is the largest single award made to a sports club—£1.3 million. Worcester rugby football club was delighted with that result.

If time permitted, I would draw my hon. Friend the Minister's attention to a number of detailed concerns relating to the expense involved in making an application and the retentions during the construction period, which have posed certain difficulties for the club. However, I must not mar its overall delight at what has been achieved.

The lottery has produced huge sums for activities other than rugby, which is a huge tribute to the success of Camelot. To be partisan for a moment, we need to worry a great deal about the Opposition's threat that they would nationalise the management of the lottery, to put it on a non-profit basis. That might satisfy a few Opposition Members' consciences—old Labour consciences—but it would lead to a dramatic reduction in funds for the good causes that the lottery was set up to benefit. We should remember that clearly. The ideas emerging from the Opposition could lead to a halving of the money available for good causes.

Cricket has not received a huge sum from the national lottery. About £7 million has been received to date for the recreational game—for local teams rather than for the county sides. The national lottery has so far provided no money for a county project. The counties fear that the managers of the funds at the Sports Council are worried that they might be criticised if they gave money to so-called fat cats and that that is why they are concentrating on the smaller, more local teams. That is damaging and wrong.

I have already talked about the problems that the TCCB faces in relation to broadcasting. The total income of all 18 counties of the TCCB is less than that of Manchester United, which is just one football club. I understand that there is an application before the Sports Council from Hampshire, but that it has been deferred. That application is for additional playing and coaching facilities, so it is as much about participation as about spectating.

Many other counties want to submit schemes that contain participatory components, such as cricket centres, cricket schools and playing areas for junior cricket. The signs are that the Sports Council is reluctant to fund county arenas. It does not recognise that the additional income generated would help the counties to achieve their participatory objectives.

Worcester has a tremendous record of development. We have employed a cricket development officer, Mark Scott, for four years. He spends the autumn and spring going round the 200 schools in Hereford and Worcester and helping them to develop cricketing skills. In the winter months, two of the professionals, Gavin Haynes and Stuart Lampitt, are employed as cricket development coaches. We shall take on one more in the coming year and another one the year after that. That is a tremendous achievement and shows my club's commitment to developing participation. I hope that national lottery money can help it build on that process more rapidly.

Cricket broadcasting is in a terrible position. To list just the domestic test matches—180 hours—is the equivalent of listing just the 180 minutes of the FA cup final and the World cup final in football. Worcester is suffering a bit of a double whammy at present with the inadequate resources from broadcasting—in contrast to what football enjoys—and being unable to get its hands on lottery money.

Worcester has a big scheme for a new school—the Basil D'Oliveira cricket centre scheme. It is a multi-million pound development and it will revolutionise cricket in my county. I sincerely hope that national lottery money will be forthcoming to fund it.

2.5 pm

Lady Olga Maitland (Sutton and Cheam): I should like to offer you a word of advice, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and suggest that you begin your day by turning to the back of the newspaper and reading the sports pages, because the sports pages always have the good news. Let me draw attention to some of the headlines in The Daily Telegraph today, such as, "England already set fair for victory", or "Gooch sets the pace in plunder", or "Openers in punishing form". They are all stories of victory, success and achievement. However, there are concerns behind that achievement.

I am particularly concerned about the fact that we seem to have become a nation of couch potatoes—hugely unfit. An analysis by the Health Education Authority makes sobering reading. It shows that obesity has more than doubled in the past 10 years, and that the proportion of men who are seriously overweight has nearly doubled. In addition, one third of the population lead almost completely sedentary lives.

[Lady Olga Maitland]

As we are already very much aware, children are extremely unfit. Instead of going out on the sports field, they spend an average of 25 hours a week watching television, in short about two and a half hours per day sitting in front of the television or their computers—longer than they spend per week on sport.

I warmly welcome the crusade—and I put it that way—that my hon. Friend the Minister began two years ago to bring sport back into schools. I also welcome the document "Sport: Raising the Game", but it included the following comment:

"Sport no longer commands the place it once did in school life".

My hon. Friend therefore deserves three cheers for making an enormous effort to upgrade sport in schools.

I am concerned, however, that my hon. Friend's endeavours could be undermined by the national curriculum. Wittingly or unwittingly, there seem to be serious omissions. My hon. Friend's stated aspiration is two hours' formal, timetabled sport a week, with four hours' extra-curricular sport. However, I note that the national curriculum document on sport produced by the Department for Education and Employment does not make that a statutory obligation. Indeed, it does not say exactly how many hours should be spent on sport. Unless we pin schools down and make it statutory, schools that are lethargic and lack enthusiasm for sport will wriggle out of it. The only way round the problem is not only to encourage the establishment of sportsmark criteria to measure a school's progress in sport, but to go much further and pin the schools down and find out exactly what they are doing and how it is being timetabled.

A press release put out by the National Association of Head Teachers supports the idea of sport, but then starts wriggling off the hook, expressing concerns about timetabling and other activities. We then discover the real reason why sport has slipped off the agenda. It has become a victim of political correctness and socialism. Sadly, I am bringing a political aspect into the debate, but socialist dogma is to keep everyone on an even keel and not to push anyone to do anything. The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) said that he did not believe in compulsory team sport, and that is really where we go wrong.

If they could get away with it, every child would far rather stay in the classroom by the radiator than go out on the sports field in the middle of winter. We must get them out of that classroom and on to the sports field, because it is of enormous benefit. Children who are not achieving in school will find that they can do very well on the sports field. They will feel that they have got somewhere and get a sense of pride. When they return to the classroom, they will go to their work with a will and energy that they did not have before. Their self-esteem will go up. The relationship between the children and the teachers who coach the children out of hours will be enhanced when the discipline that they have managed to pull together on the field is transposed to the classroom. The children will get on much more in their school careers.

Time is against me, but I should like to stress how important it is that my hon. Friend the Minister has devoted his efforts to raising the profile of sports in schools. It is vital to improve our children's health and makes them fit citizens—fit for life. That is the essence of my hon. Friend's drive. It will enable us to be proud of our young people as they go out into the world—whether they join the Army, go into commerce or become successful athletes. Wherever they go, they can hold their heads high and say, "I won a cup at school. What an achievement!"

2.11 pm

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe): I should like to place on record how proud I am to come from Britain's first national city of sport, Sheffield, with our magnificent array of facilities. I know that members of the Select Committee on National Heritage looked very closely at those facilities while they were compiling their report on facilities and sport. They certainly congratulated not only the city council but the wider Sheffield community, including the private sector, on their effort in developing the facilities and the successful part that they played in the regeneration of our city.

Last year, the city's facilities were used by more than 2 million people and they have hosted successful teams such as the Sheffield Eagles, the Sheffield Sharks and the Sheffield Steelers. More important, the facilities are regularly used by the local community and, indeed, the wider community. Although the élite, such as the national diving team, use the facilities, they are also used regularly by disabled people. Only last Saturday, I saw the national disabled swimming championships. Indeed, the city hosted the special Olympics a couple of years ago. It is right that the whole community should be able to enjoy sport.

I am delighted by the lottery grant that Sheffield United cricket club has received to develop in my constituency an indoor cricket school. It will be used by the local community and by local schools, and it will be designed specifically for use by disabled people. That is positive, but I am cautious. Owing to problems of running costs, it will be difficult for many projects in inner-city and deprived communities to get off the ground. They will simply be unable to find either the matching funding or the running costs funding. I listened carefully to what the Minister said earlier, and I hope that there will be flexibility in those areas.

The bulk of what I want to say concerns the European football championships. I say to the Government, "Why don't you join in as well?" It is almost as if they are saying that the championships are for everybody else—the Football Association, UEFA, football clubs and local authorities—and that they will simply be spectators. The Government should be taking a lead, and ensuring that the event is a celebration of football in this country, during which we can welcome guests from abroad and put on a magnificent display for them of the best of British life.

According to figures that I obtained from the local authority yesterday, Sheffield expects the cost of staging an excellent cultural and sports festival, extra litter clearing, the provision of a camp site, road closures and all the other things associated with such events to come to about £250,000. The cost of policing, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) drew attention, has also to be found by the local community.

By way of response, the Government have offered only £12,000 of direct funding—£12,000 against a total cost of £250,000. Even when matching funding for sponsorship is included, the total Government provision is still only £50,000. A local supermarket firm in the area, Morrison's, has contributed £40,000, which is only £10,000 less than the Government are providing.

It is nonsense for the Government to stand on one side and say that the people of Sheffield, Newcastle, Nottingham, Manchester and the other cities that are hosting events should be responsible for providing the funds, when the Government are receiving £7 million in extra VAT receipts from ticket sales alone. That is wrong. It is time the Government put their hand in their pocket and said that local communities should not suffer.

In particular, the Government should consider the policing costs. Policing will not involve a simple matter of extra costs for communities. Given that police authorities, like every other local authority, are capped—certainly South Yorkshire is—the result will be not extra costs, but less policing for the community during the rest of the year. There will be fewer police services and less attention to law and order, simply because the Government will not cover the extra costs.

That is not right, and it is not how we should be approaching the championships. The Government have a responsibility to help, and to realise that Euro 96 is a national event. The nation is putting it on, and responsibility does not lie just with football authorities and local authorities. I hope that the Minister will respond positively, because at this stage the Government should not be standing on one side and saying, "It's not our responsibility."

2.15 pm

Mr. Pendry: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

This has been an interesting debate, and I think that everyone who wanted to speak has done so. The Minister has asked to be given a few minutes to reply to it, and I concur with that idea. I hope that he has taken note of some of the important points that have been made in the debate and that, although he will not be able to reply to them all verbally, he will be able to respond later to the hon. Members who made them.

The right hon. and learned Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor) was right to highlight the importance of Euro 96, and equally right to say that the state-of-the-art stadiums in our country will be less effective than they might be if we do not use them to attract the Olympics and other international sporting events.

Last month, the Government said that lottery money could be made available for major sporting events—but, again, not this year, and not for the major sporting event of Euro 96. The right hon. and learned Member for Putney also talked about tickets being marked "Restricted View". I must tell him that UEFA organised the advertising round the ground at Wembley, so the Football Association cannot be held responsible for that problem.

I thank the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) for pointing out that I am a moderate and restrained man in that I did not mention the fact that my team, Derby County, got into the premiership. The hon. Gentleman was right; I am both of those things, but I restricted the length of my speech so that more hon. Members could speak, and I had intended to mention Derby County at the end. None the less, I shall pass on the hon. Gentleman's congratulations to Derby County in time for next season.

The hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) praised the police for their efforts during the build-up to the tournament—a subject also touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts). The Association of Chief Police Officers estimates that it will cost about £10 million to police the tournament, but the Home Office has allocated only £100,000. As my hon. Friend the Member for Attercliffe said, that could lead to inadequate policing in some areas during the rest of the year.

The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) did not let down his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, North–East (Mr. Campbell)—at least, he did not in the little that I heard of his speech as, for unavoidable reasons, I had to leave the Chamber for a time. So far as I know, he did not mention the very sporting South African tie that he is wearing, although he did mention apartheid and the importance of what is happening in South Africa.

My hon. Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Keen) is a brave man to say that he is a Middlesbrough supporter these days. It is not generally known that he was a scout for that football club. My hon. Friend was generous in his praise for the charter for football. Within that framework, we shall introduce legislative measures to tackle hooliganism—increasing restriction orders and punishment levels, and tightening the laws on racial abuse—to broaden the appeal of the game.

I am pleased to report that 20 per cent. of the people who have bought tickets for Euro 96 are women, compared with only 13 per cent. of those who go to premiership matches.

The hon. Member for Welwyn and Hatfield (Mr. Evans), in a temperate and moderate speech—[Laughter.] Certainly the first part of it was. He should concentrate on sporting matters rather than make his usual utterances. It is perhaps not generally known that he played football for Aston Villa and cricket for Warwickshire, and I hope that he will stick to sporting matters in the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) was right to emphasise the importance of black sportsmen and women in this country and the fact that they do not receive the recognition that they richly deserve. She talked about the continuing racism in sport, and she will know that Labour's football charter makes a specific pledge to tighten the section of the Football (Offences) Act 1991 to which she referred.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North–West (Mr. Banks) welcomed the money that is coming into football, but said that it was not reaching the right quarters. He said that ticket prices ought to be reduced, and that some of the money should go to the smaller clubs. Labour's charter says that a percentage of money should go to the Football Trust to reinvest in the lower divisions of the football league.

Finally, I concur with those who described the debate as stimulating and interesting. Although I was critical of him earlier, we should all thank the Minister for giving us the opportunity to have the debate. Although there are differences between the parties, we are here because we all love sport and we recognise its importance in society. Long may we have such debates, but I ask him to use his influence to ensure that we have such debates at a proper time in future to enable more hon. Members to take part.

2.20 pm

Mr. Sproat: I agree with the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) that it is extremely important to have sports debates. I should like to have them on a day other than Friday so that we can command a wider audience. However, the quality of the debate has been high, and it has helped to continue the momentum of raising the profile of sport.

When opening the debate this morning, I said that I would try to pick up on the points made in it during my winding-up speech. I shall try to do so in the short time available, but I can assure the House that I will read Hansard and reply by letter to hon. Members who raised matters that I do not have time to deal with verbally.

We have had a varied debate. One of the varieties was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Luff)—the issue of television sports rights. Other hon. Members referred to the matter in the context of the premier league deal that has just been announced. The whole question of television sports rights, the listed events and people's ability to watch sport on television is extremely difficult.

On the one hand, many sports rely more and more on the money that comes from television sports rights. My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester mentioned cricket; I believe that more than 40 per cent. of the income of English cricket now comes from television rights. On the other hand, we must remember the grass-roots of sport and those who cannot get to sports grounds and depend on television if they want to watch sport. If events are not broadcast on free-to-air television, but on a subscription or pay-to-view channel, many people will be prevented from watching their favourite sport. This is a genuine dilemma with which we are dealing in the Broadcasting Bill, and I expect that we will come back to the matter on Report.

In the meantime, I should like to pay particular tribute to the work of the Central Council of Physical Recreation and its major sports division for working out what would appear to be a working compromise. We will discuss it, but the House may not accept it—it is a voluntary agreement in any case. The idea that an event should be shown live on free-to-air television and the highlights broadcast on a subscription or pay-to-view channel, or the other way around, shows that the sports bodies understand the importance of ensuring that the bulk of our sport ought to be available on television. At the same time, we must not withdraw from sport the huge amount of money that television rights have generated.

As for the premier league, I was extremely pleased that Mr. Rick Parry said that he hopes that a substantial amount of the money will be ploughed back into youth sport. That is extremely important. It is also extremely important, however, to remember that the rights are the assets of the sports governing bodies, and Parliament should be wary about taking away from them those things that belong to them. We must try to find a way through so that the sports bodies can keep the money to plough into their sport, but at the same time ensure that the bulk of the population can continue to watch that sport on television.

The European championships, which start tomorrow, were naturally mentioned frequently. They are a wonderful opportunity for this country to show its sporting prowess, hospitality and tourist attractions. That is why the Government decided in negotiations with the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and others to put many hundreds of thousands of pounds into the championships. Some £400,000 has been put into them, of which £100,000 came from Government grant, £150,000 from sportsmatch, which should be matched by others, and £150,000 from the Association of Business Sponsorship of the Arts. Money was also put in by the Football Trust and the Football Association. The Government have reached a reasonable compromise on something that is, after all, football's own occasion. The provision of additional money is a matter for those towns and cities that will benefit in many ways. They got the Government help for which they asked, although we know that they would like more.

The championships should be an occasion on which—let us hope—British football shows itself to better effect than it has done recently. The hon. Member for Bassetlaw (Mr. Ashton) made an extremely important point when he said that the press too often pick on just the bad news, whether about football or something else. I hope that some self-restraint, balance and a sense of perspective will be shown by the press about Euro 96 and many another matter. Our marvellous stadiums and the friendly welcome that I hope foreign tourists will receive should be shown to their best advantage.

One of the things that struck me during the debate was the number of hon. Members on both sides of the House who pointed out how well the Sports Council had done in distributing lottery funds. We all know that a number of the distributing bodies have come in for fairly ferocious criticism, but the Sports Council has managed to tread an extremely difficult and delicate line extremely well. I should like to pay particular tribute to Mr. Rodney Walker, its chairman, and Mr. Derek Casey, who have done a marvellous job.

Mr. Pendry: And David Carpenter.

Mr. Sproat: Yes, indeed. It is a difficult task, and the Sports Council is doing it extremely well with the experience gained in just one year.

It is also worth noting that the Sports Council has shown flexibility. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) asked about the matching funds for lottery money. I do not pretend that we have solved that problem, but the Sports Council has shown that it is prepared to learn from experience. It has accepted that schools are probably less able than many other bodies to raise matching funds. In inner-city areas, it has upped the lottery's funding contribution to 90 per cent., and for all projects involving schools the lottery will provide 80 per cent. of the funding.

When our policy document, "Raising the Game", said that we wanted to improve links between schools and local clubs, the Sports Council immediately responded and said that it would find an extra £2 million—a challenge fund—so that schools and local clubs that got together to develop a project could go to the council to bid for the money. I pay a great tribute to the work of the Sports Council in that respect.

I began the debate by saying that I wanted to concentrate, first, on what the Government could do particularly about sport. I believe that sport in schools has declined far too much. I believe that sport is an absolutely central part of education because of all the things that it can teach young people, girls and boys, which they cannot learn either at all or so well from other aspects of school life.

I seek to secure the agreement of the House that the one most important thing that the Government can do about sport is to ensure that every child in the country has access to good sports facilities. As I have said, we hope that the lottery will make that possible. Our children should have a proper chance in schools. There should be a pathway from schools to local sports clubs, to local centres of excellence and on to a British academy of sport, so that would-be champions or international players have their chance and no boy or girl is denied the great benefits that sport can bring, however good or otherwise they are, for their health, enjoyment—

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That the Speaker shall—

(1) at the sitting on Thursday 13th June, notwithstanding Standing Order No. 14B (Proceedings under an Act or on European Community documents), put the Question on the Motion in the name of Secretary Sir Patrick Mayhew relating to the draft Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order 1996 not later than three hours after the commencement of proceedings thereon or at Ten o'clock, whichever is the earlier; and

(2) at the sitting on Wednesday 19th June—

(i) put the Questions necessary to dispose of proceedings on the Motion in the name of the Prime Minister relating to sentencing policy not later than Seven o'clock or three hours after their commencement, whichever is the later; and

(ii) notwithstanding Standing Order No. 14B (Proceedings under an Act or on European Community documents), put the Question on the Motion in the name of Secretary Sir Patrick Mayhew relating to the draft Northern Ireland Act 1974 (Interim Period Extension) Order 1996 not later than Ten o'clock.—[Mr. Wells.]

Health Care Funding (Hampshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Wells.]

2.30 pm

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I am grateful to have had the opportunity to initiate the debate. For many months there has been growing evidence that in Hampshire, my home county, the concept of the national health service being free at the point of use is fast becoming a myth.

More and more people in Hampshire are finding that when they need health care they are faced with a stark choice: they can turn to the NHS and become hostages to fortune with extended waiting times, or they can resort to private health care. An added twist to the wheel of fortune, or misfortune, is introduced when account is taken of where someone happens to live in the county and whether he or she is registered with a fundholding general practitioner. As a result, the NHS has become a two-tier health system in Hampshire, with patients treated not on the basis of need but on whether funding happens to be available to meet their needs.

I intend to demonstrate that as a result of the failure of the Government's health policies and a failure to deliver those flawed policies, people in Hampshire are being denied access to basic health care, whether it is heart surgery or dentistry, care for those with mental disorder or care for those who need the services of a chiropodist. Care is being either postponed or withdrawn.

When the Minister replies, I hope that he will not merely resort to boasting about the increase in NHS funding, welcome though that increase may be. He knows well that health care needs are increasing and that in the United Kingdom we provide less for health care as a percentage of our gross domestic product than many other developed nations.

I hope that the Minister will take on board the particular issues that are having an effect on health care in Hampshire, which I had the opportunity to discuss briefly with him some days ago.

My constituency is served currently by the North and Mid-Hampshire and the Southampton and South West Hampshire health authorities. In 1997, boundaries will change and Eastleigh will be entirely within the Southampton area. At present, however, Eastleigh is suffering from funding crises within both authorities. I shall explain. In Southampton, there has been a shortfall of £11 million in funding for hospital services. That is the difference between the cost of maintaining services at 1995-96 levels and what the health authorities and GPs can afford to purchase for the coming year.

Through savage savings, including sacking about 400 members of staff, much of the shortfall has been met, but the impact on patients is severe. Instead of waiting nine months for treatment, cardiac patients will have to wait a year. Those involved in non-urgent cases will have to wait 14 months. That is the stark reality behind the Minister's statement in reply to an earlier debate on Southampton hospital services, when he said that "there may be some slippage in waiting times as the financial problems are resolved."—[Official Report, 7 May 1996; Vol. 277, c. 147.]

[Mr. David Chidgey]

There has certainly been some slippage. It is an appalling situation for a hospital trust that had more than matched the Government's patients charter by increasing efficiency and reducing waiting times. As Jane Ransome, the obstetrics and gynaecology clinical services manager, said:

"Everyone from the consultants to the cleaners have worked so hard to get waiting times down to six months. Now to have to let them go out again because of shortage of money is just soul destroying."

Recently, I took the opportunity to visit Southampton general hospital's cardiac unit and I was shown its ground-breaking work in heart surgery. The innovative techniques developed by the director and his team are breathtaking. They use microtechnology to replace open-heart surgery. Patients who would have stayed for more than a month are now released from hospital in only a few days. It is a remarkable achievement, but it seems that that team and all that it has done is to be a victim of its success.

The director of the unit told me that his major worry was whether it could attract enough purchasers to maintain the high level of expertise that it had created. Cuts in the hospital trust's funding can only add to that concern. As Mr. David Moss, the chief executive, has said:

"We are going to have to take out beds and theatre lists and it is a painful process for everyone".

Under the Government's policies, patients' suffering will be selective. As The Southern Daily Echo, the paper in my constituency, reported only last month:

"local fundholding GPs who get a budget to buy hospital treatment for their patients are not affected by the latest cash squeeze on services.

They will continue to have fast-track access to services in what has become a two-tier health care system for patients in Southampton."

As I have mentioned, Eastleigh is split between two health authorities. My constituents in the south are suffering increased waiting times in Southampton, while for those in the north, health care services are being cut across the board as the North and Mid-Hampshire health authority battles to meet its budget.

I have not always supported the authority, especially over its long-term care policy, but I support its claim that its problems stem from the fact that it has had to fill the gap left by the closure of Cambridge military hospital in Aldershot, with little, if any, extra funding. As a result, it is facing underfunding of £7 million a year, every year. The immediate effect has been savage cuts across a wide range of health care services, not just in Eastleigh, but throughout Hampshire.

Hundreds of people and practitioners have written to me, to other Members of Parliament in the region, to the community health council, to the health authorities and to Ministers. The community is alarmed, disgusted and, in many cases, desperate as the NHS crumbles before its eyes. The most vulnerable people, for whom health care can make the difference between a tolerable and a miserable quality of life, are bearing the brunt of the cuts.

Time does not permit me to spell out the litany of service cuts, but let me give the Minister some graphic examples. Community dental health services have been reduced by 25 per cent., which means that, in Andover, dental sessions will be reduced from 16 to 10 a week. Dental surgeons running Andover's dental health centre have written to me. They say:

"We are a practice with eight dentists providing NHS dental care for almost 20,000 people in Andover and the surrounding area. It is becoming increasingly difficult to cope with the huge influx of patients who wish to continue to be treated under the National Health Service. Patients of the practice are now having to wait four months for an appointment for routine treatment.

The Community Dental Service provide a necessary and very valuable service in the area, particularly for children, the elderly and the handicapped who are most in need of treatment.

Any cut in the CDS budget will result in fewer patients being treated and increased pressure on what are already inadequate levels of service."

That dental health centre is facing 25 per cent. cuts. In Eastleigh, we are to lose four of our 18 weekly dental sessions. In Winchester, sessions will be cut from 22 to 16 per week.

Staff at the orthodontic department of Winchester's hospital have also written to express their great concerns to me. Without going into great detail, the letter states that 99 per cent. of their patients are children aged eight to 17, that, because of their limited budget, they can treat only those with the most serious malocclusions, and that, if patients are not treated, later in life they will face prolonged surgical procedures and, in some cases, severe emotional problems, which would require far more costly treatments.

Such appliances are made and used only in specialist units under the supervision of a consultant orthodontist and his highly trained and dedicated team. The general dental practitioner would not be able to undertake that type of treatment due to lack of qualification, experience and time. The £160,000 to run that department is a small price to pay to enable around 1,000 patients each year to receive orthodontic treatment. Those are just two examples from the many letters that I have received from practitioners and patients.

Given that Eastleigh is faced with the loss of one quarter of its specialist dental services, the local health care trust can afford to recruit only a salaried dentist as a safety net for patients who are unable to find an NHS general dental practitioner. That is no substitute for specialist orthodontics and it forces trusts to ignore the plight of many thousands of my constituents without access to an NHS dentist. Some extra dentists have been provided, but the number is still woefully inadequate to meet the needs of people who cannot readily find an NHS dentist.

Another example is the 20 per cent. reduction in the family planning service, which means that the well woman and psychosexual clinics in Eastleigh will be discontinued. Dozens of women of all ages and clinical practitioners have written to me expressing their shock and distress. Dr. Angela Stewart, senior clinical medical officer, states:

"These cuts are directly against the Government's guidelines in 'The Health of the Nation' and in particular the quest for a reduction in teenage pregnancies. They also deny their right to choose where they go for such services."

Mrs. Marlene Wood, a family planning nurse for more than 30 years, lives in Hedge End and works at a clinic in Winchester county hospital. She wrote:

"Of particular concern is that one of 'The Health of the Nation' targets is specifically aimed at reducing teenage pregnancies. Youth advisory clinics are targeting this group of people. Where will they go when the clinics close?"

Those cuts are only part of the dismal picture for Hampshire residents. Eastleigh's GP consortium has for years carried the burden of a relatively low general medical services allocation. The amount that it receives per patient from the North and Mid-Hampshire health authority is £375, compared with an average of £425 for the whole area. When patients transfer to the Southampton and South West Hampshire health authority, they are underfunded compared with the Southampton average of £413. The Eastleigh GP consortium is a dedicated team that spares no effort in serving my constituents, but it is caught in a vice of underfunding from the two health authorities that will tighten each year that cuts continue. Dr. Tim Frank, the consortium's co-ordinator, told me:

"Eastleigh is underfunded because of the legacy of the burden of underfunding from North and Mid Hants being left with Southampton and South-West health commission."

Tensions are increasing as decisions to cut particular services are made at the expense of others.

A common theme runs through the stream of letters and telephone calls that I have received from constituents, patients and medical practitioners. There is deep dismay and anger because the enforced cuts in health care are decimating services that prevent health problems from escalating. Savage cuts to solve current financial problems will lead to serious ill health for many more people over time—storing up a legacy of a growing need for extensive and costly health care in the future. Even given the Government's discredited health care policy, there is no excuse for ignoring the lack of equity.

The Department's response to pleas for help has been at best crass and at worst insulting. The response to Southampton's £11 million shortfall was an announcement by the Secretary of State for Health that five more intensive care beds were to be provided for Hampshire children, which was a disgraceful distortion of the truth. Those five so-called new beds already exist. Southampton general hospital had, on its own initiative, decided to reorganise the beds into a dedicated children's unit. While Ministers scramble to take the credit, no extra money or facilities will be provided. Last year, Southampton had to refuse almost one in every three patients needing intensive care, cancelling major surgery for some patients at the last minute.

In response to the savage cuts in services in the Winchester and Eastleigh Healthcare trust, the junior Health Minister—the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Malone)—is quoted as welcoming the fact that the programme included no elimination of patient services. However, well woman clinics and some chiropody services have been eliminated. As I said earlier, a whole range of patient services have been savagely cut.

I need make no apology for mentioning the junior Minister in his absence. I have lived in his constituency for more than 25 years and I am one of his constituents. I declare an interest in the Winchester hospital—two of my children were born there. One was critically ill, but was nursed with great skill and care through those early weeks and is now enjoying remarkably robust health and appetite for life.

Only last year, late on the night of Good Friday, my wife was admitted to Winchester hospital, critically ill. Again, as on a number of occasions over the years, the care and the skill of the staff at Winchester saw us through a health crisis to full recovery. I, like so many others in the area, have the highest regard for the dedication of the staff at Winchester hospital. I take strong exception to the cavalier and dismissive response to the cuts in its patient services.

When I opened the debate, I referred to what I believe to be the crux of the funding crisis—the impact of the closure of the Cambridge military hospital on the North and Mid-Hampshire health authority. Having brought the matter to the Minister's attention before the debate, I hope that he can respond positively. The Cambridge, in common with other military hospitals, provided a wide range of services to otherwise national health service patients. The area it served fell within both the South Thames health region and the South and South West health region, so it shared a burden with two regional health authorities—which, at the time, acted with a great deal more autonomy from the Department of Health than regional health authorities do today.

The unexpected speed of the closure of the Cambridge allowed the regional authorities little time to assess their new health care responsibilities. As a result, the South Thames region made provision for its additional responsibilities, but the South and South West region did not. With hindsight, that was clearly the wrong decision and it has left the North and Mid-Hampshire health authority with a continuing funding crisis. The powers exercised by the regional health authorities have now been taken over by the Department of Health. Therefore, it falls to the Minister and his Department to correct past mistakes.

The North and Mid-Hampshire health authority will have to find an additional £7 million a year to provide NHS treatment for patients previously cared for by the Cambridge. The authority has hardly any reserves to help cover this year's costs. It has brokered a £5 million loan from the Department to see it through this year. Much has been made in the press of the Minister's statement about a one-off £5 million grant recently allocated to the authority from the NHS emergency fund. In reality, it is merely the conversion of a loan into a one-off grant. The additional £5 million referred to by the Minister in his letter to the community health council in March is not new money at all; the only new money is the interest payments that will be saved which otherwise would be paid on the loan. To resolve that long-term funding crisis, it is essential that the one-off grant is translated into a £5 million uplift in the annual budget, year on year.

That one-off grant is no more than a sticking plaster over a gaping wound. As the community health council said in a response to the Minister only last week:

"The severity of the situation means there are no local solutions available. We are asking most urgently that you now address this unacceptable situation. We cannot emphasise enough how some of the most vulnerable members of the community are going to be adversely affected."

Can the Minister, in all conscience, ignore the depth of feeling—almost desperation—in that letter? Can he ignore the dismay expressed by medical practitioners throughout Hampshire's health care service? Can he ignore the distress felt by so many people in Eastleigh and across Hampshire, who have contacted me and other local Members of Parliament? In the interests of fairness and justice, surely he cannot.

2.49 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Horam): I am pleased that the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) has chosen to raise the important subject of health care funding. I am sure that he will agree that, too often, the House indulges in debates on health policy with little or no mention of how the services will be paid for.

[Mr. John Horam]

Such is the geographical location of Eastleigh that the hon. Gentleman has a constituency interest in all three Hampshire health authorities—which, no doubt, is why he called his Adjournment debate "healthcare funding in Hampshire."

In April, all three authorities received a real increase in their budgets, from a total, combined cash boost of more than £26 million. That was part of another £1.3 billion injection into patient care that was announced in the Budget, and it shows the extent to which the Government are honouring their commitment to increase the real resources going into health care across the country.

Dealing specifically with authorities that concern the hon. Member for Eastleigh, the North and Mid-Hampshire health authority received an extra £7.5 million, which is an increase of 4.3 per cent., or 1.27 per cent. in real terms. That authority is close to its target level. Equally, the Southampton and South West Hampshire health authority had an increase of £10 million, which is an increase of 4.82 per cent. in cash terms, or 2.3 per cent. in real terms. Those are substantial increases in funding for the health authorities of concern to the hon. Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh also referred, quite rightly, to the excellent work being done at the Southampton University Hospitals NHS trust. I fully agree with him that that work is exciting and forward looking. I can tell him that cardiac expansion at that trust—including extra ward and intensive therapy unit capacity—will be ready this autumn. A new patient management system—a £1 million, fully computerised patient records and appointment system—was opened there in March 1996.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh also referred to the excellent work being done about schoolgirl pregnancies in his area. Southampton and South West Hampshire health authority is spending an extra £180,000 over the next six years in a bid to cut schoolgirl pregnancies. The authority will open more family planning clinics for teenagers, which will offer contraceptive advice after school and on weekends, and increase the number of trained sex education advisers.

Mr. Chidgey: The specific point is that the clinics in my constituency of Eastleigh will close. The fact that there are extra resources in the city of Southampton will not help my constituents.

Mr. Horam: I think that there will in fact be a general increase in provision for the entire area. It remains to be seen exactly what happens in particular parts of the area. None the less, one cannot get away from the fact that a considerable effort is being made by the authority, which I think the hon. Gentleman should recognise.

Another development in Southampton is the new, £10 million hospital development for elderly people—the Southampton western hospital. Three new neurosurgical theatres at Southampton general hospital are due to open soon, at a cost of £6 million. All that is a huge investment in revenue and in capital terms in the area with which the hon. Member for Eastleigh is concerned.

As I said, and as the hon. Member for Eastleigh understands, he is served by several health authorities. At the top of the extra funds for health authorities this year is the North and Mid-Hampshire health authority, which is also of great concern to him. It has received a special allocation of £5 million, to smooth the adjustment process following the closure of the Cambridge military hospital, which we realised would have a knock-on effect on the area that he represents and on other parts of north and mid-Hampshire. That is why, over and above the increases that have come to that authority, there is the extra £5 million that the Secretary of State announced quite recently.

When Ministers considered how best this year's extra money for the NHS should be distributed, some key principles underpinned the process. The first was equity, which I stress to the hon. Member for Eastleigh. The formula that we use, which guides the allocation process, uses the best available and robust knowledge on health needs. It is being developed by York university and is generally considered to be as sophisticated an approach as one can get when considering real health need. Of course, any formula is capable of improvement and, indeed, work is under way to refine that process further. We can also interpret any formula flexibly. We want to look not only at what the formula says but at how we can guarantee continuity and stability.

Consistent significant growth in funding for the NHS means that we can gradually move all health authorities towards their target allocation. The hon. Gentleman quoted figures for per capita funding in Eastleigh. I recognise that the Hampshire authorities are a little behind their target allocation, but we hope that, by a process of levelling up over the next two or three years, all authorities will achieve their target level of allocation, which is based on a thorough understanding of the health needs of the people of the whole country.

Mr. Chidgey rose—

Mr. Horam: I cannot give way. The hon. Gentleman consumed two thirds of the available time, and I must complete my reply.

Although the Hampshire authorities are currently below target in the areas that are of concern to the hon. Gentleman, they are getting closer. That is something that we all wish to achieve sensibly and systematically. As I said, one of the areas with which he is concerned is only 0.26 per cent. below the target level as we have agreed it.

In addition to the extra £26 million for the three Hampshire health authorities, the capital spending and the funds for pregnancy advice services that I have mentioned, an extra £300 million is going into the health budget for the country as a whole as a result of the efficiency improvements that we hope to obtain from the system. All that is available and the hon. Gentleman's constituency will get an appropriate share of it.

As the hon. Gentleman pointed out, comparing last year with this year is complicated in his particular case by the substantial local changes to health authority boundaries which took place on 1 April. He would be the first to agree that it is complicated, but I have studied his local situation carefully and can reassure him and the people of Eastleigh that they are receiving the correct level of increased funding after having made the necessary adjustments for the boundary changes. However, we plan to monitor the situation carefully and our flexible approach to resource allocation will allow us to deal with problems in future years, should they arise.

Clearly, from a commonsense point of view, it is a complicated situation. As I said, Eastleigh is getting its correct share but if, in practice, things turn out differently from how we expect, we can review matters when the time comes. I give the hon. Gentleman that reassurance.

A problem arises not only from the change in Eastleigh's position but from the special situation of north and mid-Hampshire, which is partly the result of the closure of the Cambridge military hospital. We have recognised that by allocating an extra £5 million to the North and Mid-Hampshire health authority this year to help it to manage this period of change. This grant is a critical component of an agreed action plan to deal with specific local pressures. The action plan aims to produce long-term solutions and to ensure continued stability. The special grant is clearly a key element in that.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government will not play fast and loose with the NHS. We never have, either nationally or locally, and we shall stick to the principles of equity, continuity and stability when making future funding decisions, as has been the case since 1979.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned chiropody specifically. He must accept that medical need will still be met in full measure. No one who has a medically diagnosed problem will be unable to get the chiropody service that he requires. There was a certain amount of self-referral which may be affected, but people in medical need will still get the service that they require.

I have seen the hon. Gentleman's press notices containing charges about underfunded health services in Hampshire. Those charges are clearly untrue in this context. It is ironic that he should have made such charges only two weeks before Hampshire's health service received £26 million from the Government. He should perhaps have waited to see the real situation before making his unfounded charges.

Decisions on how best to invest the money that taxpayers put into the NHS are not easy. I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman's local health authorities and all those who provide patient care have been working closely together to ensure that local people receive the best possible care. Any politicians who claim that the NHS is underfunded should first say whether they would even match the Government's record of increased funding year on year.

The residents of Eastleigh can rest assured that the Government will continue to meet their commitments to ensure that a growing health service is matched by the growing funding that it needs—that is as true in Eastleigh as it is anywhere else.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Three o'clock.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fishing Vessel Decommissioning

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the fishing vessels St. Benedict, St. Jerome and St. Jasper were decommissioned; how much was paid by his Department for each; to what (a) company and (b) liquidator; and who owned the vessels at the time they were decommissioned. [29568]

Mr. Baldry: The fishing vessels (financial assistance) scheme 1983 provided for the payment of decommissioning grant in respect of vessels which were either scrapped, exported for fishing outside Community waters or assigned permanently to another use.

In the case of the St. Benedict, the St. Jerome and the St. Jasper, the applicant was Thomas Hamling and Co. Ltd. The St. Benedict was sold for the purpose of fishing outside Community waters. The St. Jerome and the St. Jasper were permanently assigned to other uses. Once the conditions had been met in respect of the three vessels, payment was made to Mr. W. F. Ratford, joint receiver of Thomas Hamling and Co. Ltd. The table sets out the other information required.

Vessels	Amount £	Date of decommissioning	Owner at the time of decommissioning
St. Benedict	581,504	17 February 1984	Thomas Hamling and Co. Ltd. (in receivership)
St. Jerome	515,280	2 October 1984[1]	Thomas Hamling and Co. Ltd. (in receivership)
St. Jasper	51,484	6 August 1984	Thomas Hamling and Co. Ltd. (in receivership)

[1] Vessel sold for alternative use on 2 October 1984, but not removed from the fishing vessel register until 19 November 1984. It is not now possible to determine the reasons for this discrepancy.

Sugar Beet

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what research his Department is undertaking to find a means of sterilising soil in which sugar been has been grown, to avoid the necessity for its disposal in landfill. [29766]

Mr. Baldry: Maximising potential uses for soil such as landscaping is more likely to be cost effective than sterilisation.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he intends to take to relieve sugar beet growers of the landfill tax on soil. [29767]

Mr. Baldry: MAFF officials stand ready to explore with the sugar beet industry ways in which the volume of waste soil returned to farmland, and therefore not subject to the landfill tax, can be increased.

Beef and Suckler Cow Premiums

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has made to the Council of Ministers for increases in payments under (a) the beef special premium scheme and (b) the suckler cow premium; and if he will make a statement. [30140]

Mr. Baldry: The 29 to 30 April Agriculture Council asked the Commission to suggest measures at this week's Agriculture Council to assist beef producers affected by recent market turbulence and seek guidance on how and where the additional support should be targeted. This may include proposals to supplement the 1995 suckler cow and beef special premiums. I am determined to explore all possible ways of assisting producers and will be pressing for the implementation of such measures as soon as possible.

Meat Hygiene Service

Mr. Stephen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has fixed the 1996–97 Meat Hygiene Service inspection charges; and if he will make a statement. [30458]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The industry was notified by the Meat Hygiene Service in a letter from the MHS chief executive dated 15 March, of proposed increases to inspection charges for 1996–97. Bearing in mind the current crisis in the abattoir industry however, I have decided to defer the application of increased rates until 1 August 1996. In the light of BSE developments, we will be reviewing the proposed charges over the next few months against the aim of achieving full cost recovery for the Meat Hygiene Service in 1996–97. Should any change to the already notified charges prove to be necessary to meet that aim, they will be subject to further notification in accordance with statutory requirements. In the interim, the current charges will continue to apply.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29430]

Mr. Boswell: No records are held centrally of how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20, and (d) 10 employees were used by the Department in each of the last five years. The information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Beef Ban

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the legality of (a) the original Fischler ban on United Kingdom beef, (b) the ban by individual EU countries on United Kingdom beef and (c) the Commission ban on United Kingdom beef (i) within the EU and (ii) internationally indicating how, whether and when the Government may seek to challenge any of the above; and under what circumstances and to whom compensation may be payable. [23997]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 2 April 1996]: The EU ban on the export of British beef is not justified on the basis of science as a measure necessary to protect public health, and it is totally disproportionate. We are pressing at every opportunity in the Council of Ministers for this ban on the export of British beef to be lifted. We are also intending to challenge the legality of the ban before the European Court of Justice.

Compensation is a matter to be pursued by the private parties affected either before the domestic courts or the European Court.

Sandeels

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make it his policy to call for a precautionary total allowable catch for sandeels at the forthcoming meeting of EU Ministers in Bergen; and if he will make a statement. [29883]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 17 May 1996]: I called for the introduction of precautionary total allowable catches for sandeels at the last meeting of EU Fisheries Ministers on 22 April.

Industrial Fishing

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the scale of industrial fishing in the North sea; and what is the Government's policy in respect of industrial fishing in sensitive areas. [29886]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 17 May 1996]: The fisheries scientists of the International Council for the Exploration of Sea advised last year that annual landings from the industrial fisheries of the North Sea increased to approximately 1.8 million tonnes in the early 1970s but have fluctuated around 1 million tonnes in recent years.

The UK applies a precautionary total allowable catch for sandeels in the Shetland territorial waters, taking account of the sensitivity of the area. The Government have also called for the introduction of TACs under the common fisheries policy for sandeels throughout the North sea, in the Skagerrak and west of Scotland. We have asked ICES to provide advice on the appropriate level of precautionary TACS and have urged that account be taken of the need to protect local aggregations of sandeels in sensitive areas by consideration of seasonal and localised catch regulations.

EU Ministers Meeting

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food who will represent the United Kingdom at the meeting of EU Ministers scheduled for 10 June to discuss agriculture and fisheries; and what is the agenda of the meeting. [29887]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 17 May 1996]: I plan to represent the United Kingdom at the meeting of EU Fisheries Ministers on 10 June, along with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland.

The draft agenda of the Council currently includes multi-annual guidance programmes 1997–99, technical conservation measures, fisheries research, redfish quotas in the north-east and north-west Atlantic, the sprat fishery in the Skagerrak and Kattegat, preparations for a conference on Mediterranean fisheries and a communication from the Commission on small-scale coastal fishing. Other items are likely to be added.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on industrial fishing in the North sea; and what proposals his officials plan to present at the meeting in Bergen on 13 and 14 June on steps to address industrial fishing in sensitive areas. [29888]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 17 May 1996]: I have recently received representations from Greenpeace on industrial fishing in the North Sea.

The officials attending the Committee of North Sea Senior Officials in Bergen in June will report on the United Kingdom's initiatives on sandeels and my call for a greater collaborative research effort to increase understanding of the impact of industrial fishing on other species.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Unfilled Teacher Posts

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many unfilled teacher posts there are currently in (a) the primary sector, (b) the secondary sector and (c) total, giving the numbers per subject in the secondary sector; and what are these figures as percentages of (i) the primary sector as a whole and (ii) secondary teachers grouped according to subject. [29636]

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on teacher vacancies as at January 1995, the latest currently available, were published in press notice 110/95 on 24 May 1995. A copy has been placed in the Library. The figures were published as provisional but they have since been finalised without any amendments being necessary.

Provisional figures for January 1996 will be published in a press notice on 23 May 1996. A copy will be placed in the Library.

Teachers (Early Retirement)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, how many and what percentage of teachers sought early retirement in each of the last five years in (a) the primary sector and (b) the secondary sector and (c) overall, broken down by the grounds on which early retirement was sought and given in total. [29635]

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on teachers seeking early retirement is not collected centrally. The following table shows the latest information on members of the teachers' superannuation scheme obtaining early retirement.

Number of percentage of nursery, primary and secondary school teachers[1] obtaining early retirement. Retirements in each financial year

[1] Excludes peripatetic teachers, supply teachers and teachers providing nursery, primary or secondary education other than in school.
[2] Includes only members of the teachers' superannuation scheme some of whom were not working as teachers immediately prior to retirement.
[3] The numbers of early retirements from the TSS shown as a percentage of teachers in service in schools at 31 March, prior to each financial year. The number of teachers in service includes some who may not have been members of the teachers' superannuation scheme.
[4] Excludes sixth-form colleges throughout.

Class Sizes

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many and what percentage of children in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools in January of (i) 1980, (ii) 1991, (iii) 1992, (iv) 1994, (v) 1995 and (vi) 1996 were being taught in classes of (1) 30 and (2) 40 or more in each local education authority in England and in total. [29641]

Mr. Robin Squire: The available information is contained in a number of tables which have been placed in the Library.

Teacher Training

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many and what percentage of those enrolled on teacher training courses in each of the last five years failed to complete the course; and what estimate she has made of the cost of the training which they received. [29638]

Mr. Robin Squire: The only information centrally available is calculated from the difference between the numbers embarking on bachelor of education and postgraduate certificate of education courses and those successfully completing them four years or one year later. The numbers and percentages of entrants failing successfully to complete initial teacher training courses in the last five years for which such calculations can be made are as follows. The table includes those failing examinations as well as those dropping out voluntarily. We do not know how much of the course was completed in each case, and cannot therefore calculate the costs of training.

B Ed Non-completers[1]
Number of Students	1,539	1,924	2,316	2,588	2,500
Percentage of intake	19 per cent.	22 per cent.	24 per cent.	24 per cent.	21 per cent.
PGCE Non-completers[1]
Number of students	1,191	1,391	1,493	1,451	2,445
Percentage of intake	11 per cent.	12 per cent.	10 per cent.	9 per cent.	13 per cent.

[1] These figures include students who failed, as well as those who dropped out. The calculations are based on the assumption of all PGCE courses lasting one year, and all B Ed courses four years. Figures are for England and Wales.

Pupil-teacher Ratios

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the average pupil-teacher ratio (a) for each LEA and (b) for England (i) in the primary sector, (ii) in the secondary sector and (iii) overall as of January in each year since 1980. [29634]

Mr. Robin Squire: The available information is contained in a number of tables which will be placed in the Library.

Funding Agency for Schools

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the cost of running the Funding Agency for Schools in 1995–96, and what is the provisional cost for 1996–97. [29637]

Mr. Robin Squire: Grant for the agency's running costs was £11.5 million in 1995–96. Budget provision for 1996–97 is £12.5 million.

New Technology

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to increase the resources available to universities for investment in new technology for teaching. [29852]

Mr. Forth: Higher education institutions receive their funding from the Higher Education Funding Council for England as a block grant. It is for institutions themselves to decide their priorities for investment.

The funding council is investing more than £16 million over three years in a programme of metropolitan area networks to improve institutions' access to the higher education and research broadband network SuperJANET. The higher education funding bodies are contributing around £33 million over four years to the UK teaching and learning technology programme which develops innovative approaches to teaching and learning using modern technology.

Pupil Exclusions

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will place in the Library the guidance issued to local education authorities in respect of the proper use of exclusions; and what plans she has to update it. [29683]

Mr. Robin Squire: A copy of the Department's circular 10/94 on exclusions from school is already in the Library. That guidance will be updated as necessary in the light of policy developments, including possible legislation, which are presently under consideration.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what procedures are in place to monitor whether any school exclusion was used (a) as a last resort and (b) prior to a last resort; what action can be taken if the latter applies; and if she will make a statement; [29681]

(2) what action her Department can take if it finds a school exclusion is unjustified; and in how many cases in the last two years it has taken such action. [29682]

Mr. Robin Squire: Only the headteacher has the power to exclude a pupil from school. In all cases of exclusion, parents have the right to make representations to the school's governors and, in the case of local education authority maintained schools, to the LEA. In the case of a permanent exclusion which is confirmed, as applicable, by governors or the LEA, the parents may appeal to an independent appeal committee. The decision of such a committee, which must consider all relevant circumstances in each case, is final and binding. My right hon. Friend has no power to overturn its decision.

Secondary School Governors

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she last met governors of state secondary schools in the Greater London area. [29720]

Mr., Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend and other Ministers frequently meet governors of secondary schools, including Greater London schools, in a variety of contexts.

School Spending, Wandsworth

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the spending, per child in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools, in the London borough of Wandsworth in 1995. [29723]

Mr. Robin Squire: Expenditure per pupil in Wandsworth in local education authority maintained (a) pre-primary/primary and (b) secondary schools was £2,268 and £3,053 respectively in 1994–95, the latest year for which figures are available.

Ethnic Minority Pupils

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the review of recent research on achievement by ethnic minority pupils commissioned by the Office for Standards in Education will be published. [29754]

Mr. Robin Squire: This is a matter for Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools, who heads the Office for Standards in Education. I have asked Mr. Chris Woodhead to write to the hon. Member.

Students (Study Abroad)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to increase the number of United Kingdom students studying abroad. [29822]

Mr. Forth: Information about the opportunities for studying in Europe have been published in the Department for Education and Employment booklet, "The European Choice", over the last the last three years. The UK is a keen participant in programmes run by the European Commission which promote student mobility. In particular, the Government is a strong supporter of the Socrates-ERASMUS programme which provides UK students with additional support to study for three to 12 months in another country within the European Economic Area.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much her Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29459]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information required could be provided only at disproportionate cost to the Department. The Department does not maintain this information in the form requested.

Modern Apprenticeship Programme

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how she plans to ensure that more young black people participate in the modern apprenticeship programme; [29412]

(2) what percentage of places on the modern apprenticeship programme are currently held by young black people. [29414]

Mr. Paice: Young black people currently account for about 1 per cent. of starts in modern apprenticeships. The results of work to identify good practice in recruitment and selection have been made available and further guidance for employers will be available shortly. The Department is currently exploring with the Commission for Racial Equality and others how best to ensure these new opportunities are drawn to the attention of young black people.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by her Department in each of the last five years. [29444]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Warwick and Coventry Universities

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students were at (a) the university of Warwick and (b) Coventry university in each year since 1989, (i) in total and (ii) as a percentage change on the previous year. [29623]

Mr. Forth: The information is given in the following table:

	1989	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994[1]
University of Warwick:
Numbers	8,262	8,828	9,701	12,471	13,836	15,851
Percentage change	5	7	10	29	11	n/a
Coventry University:
Numbers	8,484	10,158	12,233	12,550	16,086	14,646
Percentage change	3	20	20	3	28	n/a

n/a = not applicable

[1] Due to changes in data collection, 1994 figures are not directly comparable to those in earlier years. Percentage changes between 1993 and 1994 are therefore not calculated.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the undergraduate student to staff ratio in (a) the university of Warwick and (b) Coventry university for each year since 1989. [29624]

Mr. Forth: Information on student-staff ratios for the university of Warwick has been published by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals in its volume "Universities' Management Statistics and Performance Indicators". Similar data for Coventry university have been published by the Polytechnic and College Funding Council in its volume "Student Staff Ratios in Former Polytechnics and Colleges". Copies of these volumes giving data up to 1993–94 are held in the Library.

Mr. Cunnigham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the capital allocation to (a) the university of Warwick and (b) Coventry university in (i) 1994–95 and (ii) 1995–96; and what it will be in 1996–97 and 1997–98 in (1) cash terms, (2) real terms and (3) as a percentage change on the previous year. [29625]

Mr. Forth: The Higher Education Funding Council for England formula capital funds allocations for 1994–95, 1995–96 and 1996–97 are set out in the table, and the 1996–97 figure is given in cash terms, real terms at 1995–96 prices and as a percentage change on the previous year. For 1996–97, the council allocated a single block grant to institutions for recurrent and capital purposes; the figure shown is that element of the grant derived from the council's equipment and estates funding formula.

	University
	Coventry	Warwick
1994–95 cash	2,246	2,667
1995–96 cash	2,575	2,962
Cash	1,725	2,225
1997–98 real terms	1,678	2,166
Percentage change	–35	–27

Figures for 1997–98 have not yet been decided.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the level of DFEE funding per undergraduate student at (a) at the university of Warwick and (b) Coventry university in each year since 1990; and what it will be in 1996–97 in (i) cash terms, (ii) real terms and (iii) as a percentage change on the previous year. [29626]

Mr. Forth: The information is not readily available for individual institutions.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funding has been given by her Department to (a) the university of Warwick and (b) Coventry university in each year since 1990 for the construction of new buildings. [29627]

Mr. Forth: Since 1992, the university of Warwick and Coventry university have both received funding from the Higher Education Funding Council for England towards the cost of specific capital projects. In both cases only a minority of the project cost has been funded by HEFCE. Details are as follows:

	Projects	Total HEFCE funds approved £	Financial year in which awarded
Coventry	Extension and refurbishment of 90–94 Gosford Street	1,750,000	1992–93
Warwick	Library extension	313,000	1995–96

Information for 1991 and earlier years is not readily available.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is her Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if her Department required bonds from businesses with under (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29418]

Mr. Robin Squire: Advice on the use of performance bonds is set out in the central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48, "Bonds and Guarantees", copies of which are available in the Library. This guidance makes it clear that bonds are not always necessary and are no substitute for considered judgments about the risks of a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources of the available contractor. These factors will vary for each contract independent of the size of the contractor.

Schools (Serious Measures)

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the schools which have required serious measures under the provisions of the Education Act 1993 to be taken against them; in respect of each school, how long the serious measures have been in force; and into which schools the Education Association has been sent. [29965]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is given in the following table:

[1] Excludes schools where inspection report is not yet in the public domain.

One school, Hackney Downs, Hackney, was transferred on 1 September 1995 to the conduct of an education association, and subsequently closed. On 9 May 1966 the Secretary of State announced that she was minded to transfer Langham school, Haringey, to the conduct of an education association, subject to responses to consultation.

Engineers and Scientists

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 11 March Official Report, column 431, how many professional engineers and technology officers of each category were employed at each grade in each of the Department of Education and Employment agencies in each year since 1991. [29826]

Mr. Robin Squire: The DFEE agencies employed one higher professional technology officer in the Employment Service in each year from 1 January 1991 to 1 January 1995. There are no practising professional engineers.

There may be professionally qualified engineers and technology officers working in mainstream grades. However, this information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Company Grants

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what grants were given by her Department to company V, whose identity has been supplied to her, between 1989 and 1991; and which grants covered training in welding and lamination. [30035]

Mr. Robin Squire: My Department has paid no grants directly to company V between 1989 and 1991.

Departmental Employees (Unfair Treatment)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many cases of unfair treatment have been taken to industrial tribunals by employees of the Department of Employment in each year since 1988; and in how many of these the industrial tribunal found in favour of the employee. [28661]

Mr. Robin Squire [holding answer 13 May 1996]: Prior to its break-up on 5 July 1995, the Department of Employment Group held no central records of the number of cases of alleged unfair treatment taken to industrial tribunals by employees. The best information available is as follows:

Year	Number of cases taken	Number of cases found in employee's favour

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what representations he has received from Sir Richard Scott on communications between the secretary to his inquiry into military exports to Iraq and his civil service superiors in the course of that inquiry; what response he has made; and if he will make a statement. [29501]

The Deputy Prime Minister: None.

One-stop Government Shop

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to introduce a one-stop Government shop; and if they require the introduction of a combined smartcard/ID card. [29695]

The Deputy Prime Minister: There are no present plans to introduce a one-stop Government shop beyond the networks of Government offices in the regions and the business links nation-wide. A prototype of a computerised business start-up system is being demonstrated at selected business links around the UK at present. No decisions have been made on its future.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29417]

Mr. Willetts: The Office of Public Service and its agencies, HMSO and the Central Office of Information, follow the Treasury's central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48 on "Bonds and Guarantees" which states that bonds are not always necessary and are no substitute for considered judgments about the risks of a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources of the available contractor. These factors will vary for each contract independent of the size of the contractor. There have been no payments made by bond to the Department in any of the last five years.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29445]

Mr. Willetts: The information is not held in the form requested.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29460]

Mr. Willetts: The information is not held in the form requested.

Civil Service Pensions

Dr. Marek: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to the answer from the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) of 14 May, Official Report, column 384, what other groups of civil service pensions will not be (a) market tested and (b) privatised as regards their administration. [30160]

Mr. Willetts: The intention is to open up the administration of the principal civil service pension scheme and associated schemes to competition. Decisions on the timing of individual market tests will be for employing Departments and agencies to take.

Millennium Exhibition

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many times the ministerial group to co-ordinate the Government's participation in the millennium exhibition has met; what were its conclusions; and if he will make a statement. [30052]

The Deputy Prime Minister: "Questions of Procedure for Ministers" makes it clear that information relating to the proceedings of Cabinet or Cabinet committees is not normally made public. The committee meets whenever necessary to oversee the Government's role in relation to the millennium festival and to take forward any necessary planning of the Government's involvement in this event.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are his plans in respect of the United Kingdom derogations from Council of Europe recommendation No. R(87)15; and which other signatories to the convention have adopted the same derogations. [29692]

Mr. Kirkhope: The United Kingdom has reserved its right to comply or not with principles 2.2 and 2.4 of the Council of Europe recommendation. There are no plans to lift these reservations.

The Republic of Ireland entered a general reservation to comply or not with the recommendation as a whole and Switzerland abstained.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce secondary legislation to implement the data protection directive in the next Session of Parliament. [29700]

Mr. Sackville: We shall decide how to implement the data protection directive in the light of responses to the Government's consultation paper. This was issued on 22 March and responses have been invited by 19 July.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will name each member of the Data Protection Tribunal and indicate the relevant professional qualification or experience which qualify him or her for appointment to the tribunal. [29698]

Mr. Sackville: A list of the current members of the Data Protection Tribunal, together with some brief biographical information, has been placed in the Library. The biographical information relates to the reason for appointment to the tribunal, and is not necessarily the current position of the person concerned.

Identity Cards

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Data Protection Registrar in respect of the benefits and risks of ID cards. [29690]

Mr. Sackville: We have received the Data Protection Registrar's booklet "Identity Cards—Putting you in the Picture" and also her formal response to the Government's Green Paper on identity cards.

Prisoners (Life Sentences)

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his timetable for informing all prisoners serving life sentences of the minimum sentence they will serve; and by when he expects that all such prisoners who have already served five years of their sentence will have been so informed. [28796]

Miss Widdecombe: Arrangements have been made, following the House of Lords judgment in Doody and others in June 1993, for newly sentenced murderers to be informed of their tariff within nine weeks of receipt of any representations they make to my right hon. and learned Friend about the tariff recommendations made by the judiciary. The judicial recommendations are disclosed to these prisoners as soon as possible after conviction.

A special exercise was completed in December 1994 to disclose previously undisclosed tariff information to some 2,400 convicted murderers still in prison in England and Wales. Representations have been received in about 390 of these cases and 127 have been reconsidered and tariffs set afresh. The rest will be reconsidered as quickly as possible, priority being given to those whose existing tariffs are nearest to expiry.

The disclosure exercise included about 80 prisoners for whom no exact tariff had been set but who were told that their tariffs would be at least 20 years. Subject to receipt of representations, we expect to complete the setting of tariffs in these cases within the next six months.

Coroners Court Service

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has had concerning the effectiveness of the coroners court service. [28800]

Mr. Sackville: Complaints about the conduct of coroners and suggestions concerning the inquest system are received from time to time from individuals and organisations.

WPC Yvonne Fletcher

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what questions relating to the death of WPC Yvonne Fletcher were asked of people taken from the Libyan bureau to Sunningdale; and if he will make a statement on the answers received; [29292]

(2) pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State of 8 May, Official Report, column 212, if the bullets from the spent cartridge case coincided with the bullet found in the body of WPC Fletcher; [29298]

(3) pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State of 8 May, Official Report, column 212, how many shots were fired from the first floor window of the building. [29299]

Mr. Howard: The continuing investigation into the murder of WPC Fletcher is a matter for the police. The police could not give details which may form part of the evidence in future criminal proceedings without running the risk of prejudicing those proceedings.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State of 8 May, Official Report, column 214, at what angle was the body of WPC Fletcher at the time of shooting. [29293]

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on 8 May, Official Report, column 214, and to the pathologist's evidence which was put before a jury.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State of 8 May, Official Report, column 213, what meetings or correspondence he has had with the parents of WPC Fletcher since the memorial service in Salisbury cathedral. [29294]

Mr. Howard: I have had no meetings or correspondence with the parents of WPC Fletcher.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State of 8 May, Official Report, column 211, what report he has had from the Metropolitan police about why the video was not presented in evidence at the inquest. [29295]

Mr. Howard: The police are reviewing the contents of the Channel 4 "Dispatches" programme of 10 April, including giving specific consideration to this question. I have not yet had a report of their conclusions.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State of 8 May, Official Report, column 211, what factors led him to describe Professor Bernard Knight, Surgeon Hugh Thomas and Lieutenant-Colonel George Styles as so-called experts. [29301]

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the explanation given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on 8 May, Official Report, column 211.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State of 8 May, Official Report, column 211, what factors have made it impossible to charge anyone with the murder of WPC Fletcher. [29300]

Mr. Howard: The investigation of crime is a matter for the police. As my right hon. Friend the Minister of State made clear to the House on 8 May, the police were unable to obtain enough evidence to sustain a prosecution without the full co-operation of those concerned in the Libyan people's bureau. Such co-operation was not forthcoming. None the less, the police were of the view that it was likely that the murder was committed by one of two people who were in the bureau. Both of them possessed diplomatic immunity and could not be prosecuted under English law even if the necessary evidence had been available.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State of 8 May, Official Report, column 209, if he will put in the Library the exchange of reports between the Libyan people's bureau and Tripoli, indicating the date on which this information was passed to the police. [29291]

Mr. Howard: It is not Government policy to comment on matters which relate to operations carried out by the Security and Intelligence Services or to confirm or deny that such operations have been carried out.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29440]

Mr. Howard: The information required to answer this question is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with under (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29422]

Mr. Howard: My Department follows advice on the use of performance bonds which is set out in the central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48, "Bonds and guarantees", copies of which are available in the Library. This guidance makes clear that bonds are no substitute for considered judgments about the risks of a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources of the available contractor.

My Department has not received any payments from performance bonds in the last five years.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29455]

Mr. Howard: Information for 1995–96 in the form requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. A new accounting system, introduced from 1 April, should provide a means to answer such questions in the future.

European Year Against Racism

Mr. Bernie Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's policy regarding the European Commission's proposal for a Council decision designating 1997 as European Year Against Racism. [29943]

Mr. Kirkhope: The United Kingdom has expressed its support in principle for a European Year Against Racism. We are now discussing with other member states of the European Union how this can best be taken forward.

Ballot Papers

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discretionary powers are available to those responsible for the local administration of (a) local government, (b) general and (c) European elections to (i) issue copies of appropriate ballot papers to electors together with poll cards and (ii) arrange for the symbols of the main political parties to be displayed on ballot papers; and if he will make a statement. [29748]

Mr. Sackville: Under current electoral legislation

(i) there is nothing to prevent a returning officer from issuing a poll card together with a postal ballot paper for local, parliamentary or European parliamentary elections to an elector who is an absent voter and entitled to vote by post as proxy at the election; we understand, however, that because of different timing requirements this is not normal practice;

(ii) there are no discretionary powers available to returning officers to add party political symbols to the ballot paper.

Scientists and Engineers

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 442, how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed at each grade in each of his Department's agencies in each year since 1991. [29837]

Mr. Howard: No professional scientists or engineers have been employed by the UK Passport Agency or the Fire Service College in the period in question. The numbers of staff in these categories in the Prison Service and the Forensic Science Service are set out in the following tables. Figures are not available in the form requested for 1991 and 1992, nor in the case of the Prison Service for 1993.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the implications for the Lockerbie investigation of developments at the forensic science laboratory in Kent. [29972]

Mr. Howard: An independent scientific review is to be conducted by Professor Brian Caddy which will consider the instances where contamination might have taken place from the particular centrifuge in question. It would be quite wrong to attempt to pre-empt the results of that review by indulging in speculation concerning what those results might be. It is a matter of public record that residues of both RDX and PETN, which are components of a high performance plastic explosive, Semtex, were identified in debris from the Lockerbie disaster by the forensic explosive laboratory. I understand from my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate that the evidence which forms the basis of the charges against the two Libyans does not depend on the identification of the high performance plastic explosive which destroyed the aircraft at Lockerbie.

Prison Service (Performance)

Dame Angela Rumbold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the Prison Service will publish its plans for 1996 to 1999; and what key performance indicators will measure the service's performance in 1996–97. [30446]

Miss Widdecombe: The Prison Service is today publishing its plan for 1996–99. The six strategic objectives of the period are:

(1) to achieve unit cost reductions of 10.2 per cent. and to contain capital spending by encouraging greater private sector involvement while maintaining the balance between security, control, purposeful regimes, and support for staff.

(2) To sustain a permanent step improvement in performance on escapes, building on what we achieved in 1995–96; in particular to complete the programme of work to enhance security for category A and high profile category B prisoners, and to achieve a significant reduction in escapes from escorts.

(3) To maintain control and a safe environment for staff and prisoners in the face of cost reductions and operational pressures; specifically, to carry through work on incentives, the drugs strategy and prevention of suicide.

(4) To maintain balanced regimes which support control and include affordable, effective activities to reduce risk of re-offending.

(5) To meet basic health care needs of the population, and to target particularly the transfer of mentally ill prisoners to hospital.

(6) To strengthen effectiveness of staff at all levels and specifically to increase the effectiveness of financial controls and systems.

The plan also sets performance targets for 1996–97.

With the agreement of colleagues in the Treasury and the Office of Public Service, as required by the Prison Service framework document, we have decided to make changes to the service's key performance indicators.

These changes aim to:

recognise that the service has achieved some of its key performance targets in full; reflect the emerging priorities for the service in the coming years; and take account of the recommendations made by Sir John Learmont on performance indicators.

For 1996–97, we have decided that the service should drop two of its existing key performance indicators.

These are:

KPI4 (access to sanitation): the service achieved its target of ensuring that all prisoners have 24-hour access to sanitation on 12 April 1996; and

KP 7 (access to minimum visits): all prisoners have had the opportunity to exceed the minimum visiting entitlement for the last two years, so KPI7 has been fully achieved.

In their place, the service has three new KPIs covering:

the proportion of random drug tests that prove positive. This new indicator was recommended by Sir John Learmont and will measure the service's performance in achieving one of its key priorities, dealing with drug abuse in prisons; the number of prisoners who complete programmes accredited as being likely to reduce the risk of re-offending. This new indicator will measure the service's performance in fulfilling one of its primary functions: preparing prisoners for release; the number of days per year staff spend in training. This new indicator was recommended by Sir John Learmont. It will encourage the service to improve its performance on staff training, which in turn will lead to improvements in performance across the board.

We have also decided that the service's existing KPI on time unlocked should be amended. Currently, this measures the proportion of prisoners held in establishments that unlock all prisoners for at least 12 hours per weekday. The director general has advised me that some establishments have experienced problems, including drugs trafficking and intimidation of vulnerable prisoners, where prisoners are unlocked in the evenings without constructive activities being available to keep them occupied. We judge a lower threshold to be more appropriate, but with an increased target for purposeful activity. Therefore, from 1996–97, the KPI will measure the proportion of prisoners who are held in establishments that unlock all prisoners on standard or enhanced regimes for more than 10 hours per weekday. This will maintain pressure for improvement in those establishments unlocking only for eight or nine hours. There will be an increased target for purposeful activity of 26.5 hours per week for 1996–97, compared with 25.5 hours per week for 1995–96.

In addition, the plan will include additional performance information covering:

a breakdown of assaults showing separately those on staff and on prisoners and others;

the number and distribution of self-inflicted deaths staff turnover and sickness rates; and the rate of reduction in the headquarters overhead.

Taken together, these changes will give the Prison Service a challenging set of targets across the range of its activities while allowing it to focus on its top priorities of custody, control, tackling drug abuse and working to reduce re-offending.

The targets we have set for 1996–97 will require the service to improve performance against most of its indicators, including escapes, the rate of assaults, the rate of positive testing for drug misuse, the amount of purposeful activity for prisoners, investment in staff training and cost per prisoner place.

Ademola Onibiyo

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all the representations received by his Department concerning Ademola Onibiyo in the seven days preceding his departure from Britain. [29480]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 14 May 1996]: In the seven days preceding Mr. Onibiyo's deportation on 4 May, representations were received from:

Bernie Grant MP

Bill Morris—Transport and General Workers Union

Lord Gifford QC—Councillor Adam Sandell, Oxford city council

John Monks TUC

Baroness Williams of Crosby

Harry Cohen MP

Fisher Meredith—Solicitors

Jeremy Corbyn MP

The President of Guyana

Jack Straw MP

Rodney Bickerstaff—UNISON (by telephone) together with 65 letters from the general public.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total cost of (a) legal action, (b) administration and (c) holding in custody of Ademola Onibiyo since January 1995; and if he will make a statement. [29479]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 14 May 1996]: The total legal costs which fall to be met by the Home Office in connection with the deportation of Ademola Onibiyo amount to £21,000. Mr. Onibiyo was detained for two periods totalling 360 days prior to his deportation on 4 May. The average cost of detaining a person for this length of time is £39,225. The information requested concerning administration costs is not available centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Abdul Onibiyo

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statements were issued by his Department on Wednesday 1 May to (a) the Daily Mail, (b) the Daily Express and (c) The Guardian concerning Abdul Onibiyo. [29481]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 14 May 1996]: Information confirming that Mr. Abdul Onibiyo was living safely in Nigeria was given to a number of newspapers which had previously expressed an interest in his whereabouts when that information became available on 30 April.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish (a) all correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and Nigeria and (b) all Interpol briefings the Metropolitan police have received on the whereabouts of Abdul Onibiyo. [29486]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 15 May 1996]: It is not our practice to publish correspondence with foreign or Commonwealth Governments about individual cases or the text of communications received from Interpol. However, I can confirm that on 30 April information was received from Interpol in Lagos that Mr. Onibiyo had been located in March this year living with his family in Ibadan and that at no time since his return to Nigeria had he been arrested or detained by the Nigerian authorities.

Nigeria (Missing Persons)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what reference has been made to Interpol (a) by his office and (b) by British police forces concerning the whereabouts of missing persons in Nigeria; and if he will make a statement. [29487]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 15 May 1996]: No such references have been made by the Home Office.

Since January 1995, Interpol London has made one request to the Nigerian central bureau of Interpol to help trace a missing person believed to be in Nigeria. The request was made on behalf of a police force in the United Kingdom which had been contacted by concerned relatives.

Council of Europe Meetings

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995 have been attended by Ministers or officials of his Department; and if he will make a statement. [29359]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 17 May 1996]: The readily available information suggests that Home Office Ministers or officials have attended some 68 meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefits

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about how he devolves his powers to suspend payment of any particular social security benefit as between civil servants in his Department and the Benefits Agency. [28640]

Mr. Roger Evans: The Benefits Agency forms part of the Department of Social Security and its staff are civil servants engaged in the implementation and administration of social security legislation. Decisions, including suspension of payment of benefit under the claims and payments regulations, are taken by civil servants in the Benefits Agency acting on behalf of the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what performance indicators apply to the payment of housing benefit; and if these apply equally to the new unitary authorities. [28982]

Mr. Roger Evans: The Department of Social Security does not set performance indicators for the payment of housing benefit but information from departmental statistical returns is used by local authorities to provide the base data for housing benefit performance measures compiled for and published under the citizens charter initiative by the Audit Commission. The most recent publication was for 1994–95.

The Housing Benefit (General) Regulations 1987 provide that every authority shall make the first payment of any housing benefit awarded by it within 14 days of the receipt of a properly completed claim and all claims should be determined within 14 days of receipt of all the relevant information. Where this is impracticable, payments on account must be made. The regulations apply to all local authorities administering housing benefit.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what powers he has to intervene where a local authority is failing to pay housing benefit on time; and what procedures exit for a special audit of those local authorities who have a backlog in the payment of housing benefit. [28981]

Mr. Evans: The day-to-day administration of housing benefit is the statutory responsibility of local authorities and the quality of service is largely a local matter. The Department monitors administrative performance through the examination of statistical returns and other information backed by a programme of visits to a range of local authorities. Where a local authority appears to have serious administrative problems, departmental officials will consider making a special visit to discuss them at a senior level. In addition, a local authority housing benefit subsidy returns are subject to annual audit by an auditor approved by the Audit Commission which many, as part of this process, draw the Department's attention to authority failings.

Incapacity Benefit

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of the former recipients of invalidity benefit who had been transferred on to incapacity benefit up to the end of February 1996 were (a) disqualified for failure to return the IB50 questionnaire, (b) disqualified for failure to attend a medical examination and (c) failed the all-work test. [29477]

Mr. Burt: The latest available information is in the table.

Former Invalidity Benefit recipients who transferred to Incapacity Benefit	Total to 30 November 1995
(a) disallowed following failure to return questionnaire	1,200
(b) disallowed following failure to attend a medical examination	260
(c) disallowed following application of the all work test	21,680

Source:

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many former recipients of invalidity benefit who had been transferred on to incapacity benefit had been reviewed up to the end of November 1995. [29476]

Mr. Burt: As at 30 November 1995, 165,000[1] former recipients of invalidity benefit who transferred to incapacity benefit had been reviewed under the new provisions for the assessment of incapacity for work introduced on 13 April 1995.
Note:
[1] Includes those reviewed under the all work test and those found to be exempt from the test.

Family Credit Payments

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the reductions in family credit payments following DSS action to recover child maintenance during the period 1988–89 to 1992–93. [29375]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information requested is not available.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29436]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29452]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the format requested.

The Department's total expenditure on goods and services in 1994–95, the most recent year for which figures are available, was £1.47 billion[1].

Notes:
[1] Includes spend with both the private and public sectors—that is, Royal Mail, Post Office Counters etc, our records do not differentiate.
[2] Figures for 1995–96 are not yet available.

National Insurance

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the value for money achieved to date by the national insurance records 2 system; and if he will make a statement. [29371]

Mr. Heald: When considering schemes under the private finance initiative it is a fundamental principle that overall best value for money in providing a service is assessed by taking into account all aspects of design, finance and operation as a unified whole. During the NIRS2 evaluation process, tenders from suppliers were compared with a fully costed in-house option to confirm that a PFI procurement represented value for money; and were compared with each other to establish the most economically advantageous option.

Under the NIRS2 contract, Andersen Consulting will receive no payment until the system is fully accepted and operational. Andersen Consulting has therefore incurred the development costs to date that would otherwise have fallen to the public sector.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures he has taken to ensure that the delay in the delivery of the national insurance records 2 system will not be repeated in other private finance initiative projects undertaken by his Department and its agencies; and if he will make a statement. [29372]

Mr. Heald: Variations to implementation timetables are not uncommon when procuring computer systems of the size and complexity of, for example, NIRS2. They can occur for a variety of reasons; and in both publicly and privately financed projects. Under private finance initiative principles, service providers are required to take the responsibility, and the risks, for the design, development and delivery phases of projects. The Department will continue to employ vigorous contract management and service monitoring on all of its PFI procurements to ensure that contractual obligations are met.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29426]

Mr. Burt: Our aim is to follow the advice on the use of performance bonds set out in the central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48 in "Bonds and Guarantees". The decision to use a performance bond is made on a case-by-case basis, after considered judgment of any risks a specific contractor may present to a particular contract, regardless of the size of the contractor. We do not collect information of amounts paid by bond.

Asylum Seekers

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many asylum seekers receive reduced rate benefits under the urgent cases regulations at (a) the Euston district benefits office and (b) the Neasden district benefits office; [29749]

(2) how many income support claimants registered at (a) the Euston district benefits office and (b) the Neasden district benefits office are awaiting the outcome of asylum applications; [29750]

(3) how many income support claimants have been taken off the register as a result of the application of the Social Security (Persons from Abroad) Miscellaneous Amendments Regulations 1996 introduced on 5 February at (a) the Euston district benefits office and (b) the Neasden district benefits office; [29751]

(4) how many income support claimants awaiting the outcome of asylum appeals have been refused benefit by (a) the Euston district benefits office and (b) the Neasden district benefits office since 1 February 1996. [29977]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Earnings Top-up Scheme

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to publish detailed rules of the earnings top-up scheme. [30192]

Mr. Burt: I have today published, and placed in the Library, the printed version of the rules of the earnings top-up pilot scheme. The draft version of the rules was presented to the Social Security Advisory Committee and to Parliament in November last year.

The aim of earnings top-up is to help people without dependent children enter and remain in work. The three-year pilot, running in eight areas from October 1996, at a cost of £65 million, will test how effective it is in doing that. Couples could receive up to £56 a week on top of earnings and single people up to £28 a week.

I have also today placed in the Library a summary of the research programme for earnings top-up. This paper in the Department's research series explains how this important evaluation will be undertaken by three independent research institutes.

To help with the technical evaluation I have appointed a panel of experts to provide advice on the research programme. The members are:

Mr. David Stanton—director of analytical services division, DSS.

Professor Roger Jowell—director of social and community planning research.

Professor Stephen Nickell—director of the institute of economics and statistics, university of Oxford.

Mr. Andrew Dilnot—director of the institute for fiscal studies.

Mr. Paul Gregg—centre for economic performance, London school of economics.

Professor Jane Millar—school of social sciences, university of Bath.

Ms Jane Ritchie—director of qualitative research at social and community planning research.

Child Benefit

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total number of children aged (a) 16, (b) 17, (c) 18 and (d) 19 years; and how many in each age group are in receipt of child benefit. [30137]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is in the table. Child benefit is not payable in respect of 19-year-olds; entitlement ends on the 19th birthday.

	16	17	18	19
Total number of children in age bands	637,200	627,300	656,900	686,200
Numbers receiving Child Benefit[1,2]	577,100	400,700	177,600	Nil

Notes:

[1] Figures are based on a 1 per cent. sample of the Child Benefit computer system.

[2] The figures quoted are provisional and do not include any late amendments or awards.

Pensions

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of (a) the annual savings in public spending which will result from the pension changes, with particular reference to the state earnings-related pension scheme, made by the Social Security Act 1986 in the years (i) 2000, (ii) 2005, (iii) 2010, (iv) 2015, (v) 2020 and (vi) 2025, and (b) the maximum annual saving from those changes. [30141]

Mr. Heald: The information requested is not available. Net savings in public expenditure cannot be estimated over the period; for example, we cannot predict the offsetting savings on income-related benefits this far in advance.

Estimates of expenditure on additional pension are given in the table.

The maximum annual saving in expenditure on additional pension from the changes made by the Social Security Act 1986 is estimated at over £35 billion in 2050. Estimates are not available for years after 2050.

Social Security Benefits

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set out the actual figures for social security spending, excluding housing benefit, for each year since 1980. [30143]

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table.

Year	Cost (£ million)
1980–81	22,707
1981–82	27,316
1982–83	30,880
1983–84	34,364

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families in receipt of family credit have children in receipt of child benefit. [30136]

Mr. Roger Evans: Almost all family credit recipients also receive child benefit. Nearly 95 per cent. of families declare receipt at the time of their claim but, as child benefit does not affect entitlement to family credit, it is not always declared.

Sir Norman Fowler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security he will set out the actual figures for spending on housing benefit for each year since its introduction. [30142]

Mr. Evans: Information relating to the current housing benefit scheme is set out in the table:

Housing benefit expenditure—Great Britain

TRANSPORT

Network Enhancement Projects

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate has been made of the likely accident reduction implications for each of the network enhancement projects announced in the Highways Agency's business plan for 1995–96. [29552]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 20 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question asking what estimate has been made of the likely accident reduction implications for each of the network enhancement projects announced in the Highways Agency's Business Plan for 1995–96.

We estimate that our 1995/96 programme of network enhancement projects will result in a reduction of at least 500 casualties a year. All the individual projects in the programme will contribute to this but uncertainties associated with factors such as weather and road conditions make it unrealistic to give a precise estimate of their contribution.

Traffic Congestion

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the links on the national motorway and trunk road network where traffic in 1995 was at levels which resulted in regular congestion. [29553]

Mr. Watts: The parts of the trunk road and motorway network most subject to congestion due to heavy traffic flows in 1995 were in peri-urban areas, namely the M25 and the M1, M3 and M4 approaches to London

the M6 and M42 around the west midlands conurbation

the M62/M63 around Manchester

the M62 approaches to Leeds and Bradford

In some cases, congestion was aggravated by roadworks necessary for improvement and maintenance works.

It is worth noting, however, that most of the trunk network was not subject to regular congestion in 1995.

Road Maintenance

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the number and value of awards made against his Department or the Highways Agency in each of the last five years in (a) out-of-court settlements and (b) court judgments as a result of neglect of road maintenance. [29546]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 20 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question asking what is the number and value of awards made against his Department or the Highways Agency in each of the last five years in (a) out-of-court settlements and (b) court judgments as a result of neglect of road maintenance.

The information is not available in the form requested, except at disproportionate cost.

Driving Instructors

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on policy regarding the reinstatement of driving instructors found guilty of sex offences; what is the present policy on such reinstatement; and what recent changes have been made. [29971]

Mr. Norris: Following a recent case, the matter was taken up by one of the national associations that represent approved driving instructors and by a local instructor.

Under part V of the Road Traffic Act 1988, the registrar of approved driving instructors has to be satisfied that an instructor is a "fit and proper person" to be an ADI. A conviction of the sort referred to would be viewed most seriously by the registrar, leading potentially to removal from the ADI register. He might well also decide that such a person could never again be a "fit and proper person". As a matter of administrative law, the registrar's discretion under the Act cannot be fettered so that he is committed to any specific course of action in every case and he cannot refuse to consider any fresh application on its merits.

There have been no recent changes in how these matters are dealt with.

Search and Rescue Helicopters

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the interdepartmental group set up to review search and rescue helicopters has reported; and if he will make a statement. [30302]

Mr. Norris: The review group has submitted its report. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

The group was set up in July 1995 to examine the national requirement for search and rescue helicopters, and how this might most efficiently and effectively be met, as part of an integrated approach to search and rescue. It has made six recommendations, listed in chapter 6 of the report.

The Government have accepted recommendation 4, to set up a new joint advisory board for search and rescue helicopter provision. This board will consider further work on establishing a national database of emergency incidents and helicopter call-outs—recommendation 1—on monitoring helicopter availability—recommendation 3—and on examining the options for interdepartmental charging—recommendation 6.

Formal consultation on the report is being launched today with the UK Search and Rescue Committee and other interested parties. Views are particularly invited on the group's proposed additional coverage criteria—recommendation 2—and on ways to strengthen the co-ordination and consultation machinery for search and rescue generally—recommendation 5.

The Government are considering the best location for the two aircraft currently based on the south coast at Lee-on-Solent and at Portland. Our consideration will have regard to the search and rescue requirements along the south coast and mid-channel. Views on these additional issues have also been sought.

Replies have been requested by Friday 28 June.

National Bus

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many buses were operated by each company within National Bus at the enactment of the Transport Act 1985. [30004]

Mr. Norris: This information is not available for the date on which the Transport Act 1985 received Royal Assent—30 October 1985—but the annual report of the National Bus Company for 1985 listed the number of vehicles of each operating subsidiary at the end of that year. The list is reproduced:

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29449]

Mr. Norris: The information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Railtrack

Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Government's sale of their shareholding in Railtrack group plc. [30483]

Sir George Young: I am pleased to report that the Government's UK public offer and international offers of Railtrack shares were successfully completed this morning when dealings in interim rights started on the London stock exchange.

As a result of bids received in the international offers, the price of the second instalment for all investors in the UK public order and the international offers were set at 190p per interim right.

Accordingly, the price for Railtrack interim rights purchased in the United Kingdom public offer was 380p per share, comprising 190p paid on successful application and 190p to be paid by 3 June 1997.

The price for interim rights purchased in the international offer of Railtrack shares was 390p per share, comprising 200p paid on successful application and 190p to be paid by 3 June 1997.

The Government offered for sale up to 434.8 million Railtrack shares in the UK public offer and the international offers.

Some 665,000 applications were received in the United Kingdom public offer for a total of some 391 million Railtrack shares. This represented some three times the shares initially expected to be sold in the UK public offer. In response to this demand, the Government increased the total number of shares allocated to the UK public offer to 210 million shares. At this level, the number of shares applied for in the UK public offer represented some 1.9 times the shares available.

Over 44 per cent. of applicants in the UK public offer received an allocation of shares. Over 97 per cent. of applicants had their applications met in full.

Some 180.4 million shares were allocated to bidders in the international offers. This number does not include any shares that SBC Warburg may have over-allotted in connection with the international offers. The extent of any such over-allotment will not be disclosed until later.

Individual investors bidding in the United Kingdom retail tender bid for some 136 million shares in Railtrack. Of these numbers, some 32.5 million shares were in respect of personal equity plan applications.

In addition to the shares sold in the UK public offer and the international offers, SBC Warburg, as global co-ordinators for the sale, hold an option to acquire from the Secretary of State for Transport up to a further 65.2 million Railtrack shares for the purposes of meeting any over-allotment made by them in connection with the international offer. This option must be exercised by 14 June.

Total gross proceeds from the UK public order and international offers are expected to amount to some £1.67 billion, of which some £849 million is expected to be received in this financial year.

Total gross proceeds may be further increased by a maximum of £254 million to the extent that, if at all, the global co-ordinator, SBC Warburg, exercises its option to acquire further shares.

The costs of the sale will be disclosed to Parliament in due course.

Following the offers, and assuming the exercise in full of the option over Railtrack shares granted by the Secretary of State for Transport to SBC Warburg Ltd., the Secretary of State for Transport expects to hold not more than 1 per cent. of Railtrack group plc's issued share capital. These amounts comprise principally shares that may be needed to meet share bonus entitlement under the UK public offer.

The demand for shares in Railtrack gives me great confidence in the future of the railways.

Heavy Vehicle Driving Standards

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many light goods vehicles and passenger carrying vehicles drivers have been disqualified in each of the last 10 years; [29543]

(2) how many LGV and PCV drivers have been required to take a driving retest for each year since the implementation of the north report. [29542]

Mr. Norris: Information about the number of LGV and PCV drivers who have been disqualified from driving during the last 10 years or ordered to re-sit a driving test since the implementation of the North report is not readily available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29434]

Mr. Norris: The information is not available.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29427]

Mr. Norris: Advice on the use of performance bonds is set out in the central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48 "Bonds and guarantees", copies of which are available in the Libraries of both Houses. The guidance, which my Department follows, makes it clear that bonds are not always necessary and are no substitute of considered judgment about the risks of a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources available to the contractor. These factors will vary for each contract independent of the size of the contractor. Such bonds have been called for by my Department only twice in the past five years and in neither case was it necessary to call upon the bonds' protection.

Scientists and Engineers

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 471, how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed at each grade in each of his Department's agencies in each year since 1991. [29836]

Mr. Norris: The information requested, as recorded in the Department's central personnel computer records, is as set out in the following tables:

ENVIRONMENT

Inhabited Bridge (London)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with (a) developers and (b) other interested parties concerning proposals to build an inhabited bridge across the Thames in central London. [28710]

Mr. Gummer: As Minister for London, I have had numerous discussions about the idea that an inhabited bridge across the Thames could once again be built in London.

It is the Government's policy to encourage ideas which can help bring new life and activity back to the River Thames corridor, an aspiration which is clearly very widely shared.

The idea of a new inhabited bridge in London deserves wide consideration. I have therefore particularly welcomed the initiative by the Royal Academy to stage a major public exhibition in September which will explore the long European tradition of inhabited bridges. I have also welcomed its announcement of an architectural ideas competition, the results of which will form apart of the exhibition, and have agreed to be a member of its judging panel for this competition. It is to be hoped that the Royal Academy's exhibition and competition will enable the possibilities to be more thoroughly aired and debated among Londoners and all those with an interest in the future of London.

In view of my involvement in the matter, I will take no part in any decision, relating to an inhabited bridge, which may subsequently need to be taken in the name of the Secretary of State for the Environment. Any such decision will be taken by my right hon. friend the Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Conservation.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29419]

Sir Paul Beresford: This Department does not have a formal policy on the use of performance bonds but takes direction from published guidance notes issued by HM Treasury, copies of which are available in the Libraries of both Houses. Each major project is judged on its merits, including whether or not the use of performance bonds would be appropriate. The decision to include the requirement for a performance bond will be made independent of the size of the contractors concerned. There have been no cases of performance bonds being enforced by this Department in the last five years.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29458]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information requested is not held centrally and is available only at disproportionate cost.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29443]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is not held centrally and is obtainable only at disproportionate cost.

Essex County Council

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he proposes to synchronise the elections of Essex county council with those of the vesting day of the two new continuing unitary authorities of Southend and Essex. [29858]

Sir Paul Beresford: It is our policy to require fresh elections for each continuing unitary authority in the year before reorganisation, to ensure that planning and implementation of unitary functions is done on the basis of a fresh mandate. For reorganisations, including Southend and Thurrock, being planned for 1998, this will entail elections in May 1997, which will take place on the same day as the county council elections for the rest of Essex.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what powers he has to extend the life of the existing Essex county council to 1 April 1998. [29856]

Sir Paul Beresford: My right hon. Friend has no such general powers.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if county councillors can be elected from (a) Southend and (b) Thurrock, to Essex county council at the election scheduled for May 1997. [29857]

Sir Paul Beresford: My Department has recently consulted on a draft order under the Local Government Act 1992 which would convert the existing Southend-on-Sea and Thurrock borough councils into unitary authorities. The order would, among other things, suspend Essex county council elections for county divisions in the areas of Thurrock and Southend which would otherwise take place in May 1997. Instead, the terms of office of the existing councillors would be extended until 1 April 1998, when the two districts would become unitary. We are currently considering representations on the draft order.

Council of Europe Meetings

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995 have been attended by Ministers or officials of his Department; and if he will make a statement. [29354]

Sir Paul Beresford [holding answer 17 May 1996]: Since January 1995, officials from my Department have attended 25 meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe. These meetings covered various aspects of the Department's responsibilities.

Scientists and Engineers

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 422, if the information he provided includes professional scientists and engineers working in Department of Environment agencies; and how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed in each grade in each of the agencies from 1991 to the current year. [29918]

Sir Paul Beresford: The previous question referred to staff in the headquarters division of the Department and therefore did not cover the agencies; this information is provided in the following tables:

East Yorkshire Council

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average amount of standard spending assessment per person in East Yorkshire unitary council in 1996–97. [29827]

Sir Paul Beresford: The standard spending assessment per person in 1996–97 for the east riding of Yorkshire council is £668.03.

Local Government Finance

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his decision on the final caps for the two local authorities which challenged their cap; and if he will make a statement. [30445]

Mr. Gummer: I have laid before the House a draft order, under section 57 of the Local Government Finance Act 1992, setting out our decisions on the final caps for Cambridgeshire and Oxfordshire county councils.

We have considered very carefully all the available relevant information, including the case made by the authorities in support of a higher cap, before taking our decisions. We have decided to confirm the caps proposed for both authorities.

The caps are, in our view, reasonable, appropriate and achievable in all the circumstances of the authorities concerned. These decisions will reduce public expenditure, and the burden on council taxpayers in the areas concerned, by £13 million in 1996–97. This will result in a council tax reduction, at band D of £25.26 in Cambridgeshire and £34.89 in Oxfordshire.

However, I have concluded that Oxfordshire has certain pressures on its budget which may lead to problems in the short term. I have therefore invited Oxfordshire to consider making an application for a chaptalisation direction and supplementary credit approval. This would enable Oxfordshire to capitalise certain costs, thereby releasing resources to support is revenue expenditure.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Financial Assistance

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 363, (1) if his Department is looking at ways of making the declaration of interest of Members of his Department's regional industrial development boards and external advisers more transparent to the public; what further measures his Department is proposing to take in this area; and if he will make a statement; [28301]

(2) if he will place the register of personal financial interests of members of his Department's regional industrial development boards and external advisers in the Library. [28300]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answers 7 May 1996]: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave him on 15 May 1996, Official Report, column 494.

Coal Mining (Wages)

Mr. Etherington: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what were the average earnings in 1995 of (a) faceworkers, (b) other underground workers and (c) surface workers in the deep-mined coal sector. [29611]

Mrs. Angela Knight: I have been asked to reply.

Information is not available for the specific occupations requested. Information regarding the mining industry as a whole and broader occupational groups can be found in the new earnings survey, part A, a copy of which is available in the House Library.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Scottish Grand Committee

Mr. Galloway: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, if he will list the cost to public funds of (a) each meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee in financial year 1995–96 and (b) each meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee in each year since 1992. [29509]

Mr. Beith: The House of Commons Commission is not in a position to provide details of the total cost to public funds of meetings of the Scottish Grand Committee, but the cost to parliamentary funds of individual meetings in Scotland for the financial year 1995–96 are set out in the table. They have been produced by a manual/clerical check as the information is not readily available in the format requested.

Location	Date	House direct costs
Aberdeen	23 October 1995	2,685
Edinburgh	11 December 1995	8,023
Glasgow	18 December 1995	4,841
Edinburgh	15 January 1996	11,005
Stirling	29 January 1996	8,056
Inverness	5 February 1996	7,457
Aberdeen	19 February 1996	6,852
Kilmarnock	4 March 1996	4,421
Glasgow	15 March 1996	500

These will not be the final costs for meetings in 1995–96 as there are still invoices and claims outstanding. Excluded from these figures are staff overtime and Members' travel.

It is not possible to provide details of costs for each meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee since 1992. This can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

TREASURY

Average Incomes

Mr. Hall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the average earned income in the most recent year for which information is available of (a) the 5 per centile and (b) the 95 per centile of taxpayers. [29227]

Mr. Jack: Based on the estimated distribution of earned income for income taxpayers in 1996–97, the 5th percentile is about £4,150 and the 95th percentile is about £35,000.

Child Tax Allowances and Benefits

Sir David Knox: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish figures setting out the treatment for tax and benefit purposes of children aged 16 to 18 years and still in full-time education, in each of the member states of the EU, showing in each case the amounts allowable in (a) child benefit, (b) child tax allowances and (c) educational maintenance allowances in (i) national currencies, (ii) euros and (iii) as percentages of average production worker earnings. [29583]

Mr. Jack: Available figures for child benefit and child tax allowance are given in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development publication "The Tax/Benefit position of Production Workers" which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29428]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury has had no reason to use performance bonds in the last five years. The policy for such bonds is covered by the central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48 "Bonds and Guarantees", copies of which are available in the Libraries of both Houses.

European Loan Insurance Schemes

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects the European loan guarantee scheme to begin in the United Kingdom; what will be the maximum size of loans; which companies will qualify; who will pay the premium for the guaranteed support; and if companies who receive loan guarantees under the small firms loan guarantee scheme will be eligible to apply. [29411]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Commission recently published a proposal for a European loan insurance scheme for employment—ELISE. Detailed discussions with member states on its working have not yet begun and there are a number of issues to be resolved before the Council of Ministers can consider whether or not to adopt the proposal. It is therefore not possible to give information about a possible start date in the United Kingdom. The maximum size of loans covered is not mentioned in the proposal.

As proposed, ELISE would cover 50 per cent. of loans from private sector institutions, or up to 75 per cent. where the loan is transnational. Small and medium enterprises with plans to create permanent jobs with the help of loans from private sector institutions would be eligible to apply for the guarantee. It is anticipated that the scheme would focus particularly on SMEs with fewer than 50 employees. More detailed eligibility criteria are set out in Commission recommendation C (96) 261 final. Under the terms of the proposal, the premium for the guarantee would be met from the Community budget.

If the scheme were to be adopted, the Government would consider whether firms who had received loan guarantees under the small firms loan guarantees scheme would be eligible to apply for further assistance under ELISE.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the outcome of discussions between his Department and the European Commission regarding the European loan insurance scheme for employment. [29413]

Mrs. Knight: The proposal has only just been published. Therefore, as yet there has been no discussions either with individual member states, in a Council working group, nor with the Commission.

Salisbury Tax and VAT Offices

Mr. Key: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer who owns the freehold of the Salisbury tax office. [29922]

Mr. Jack: The freehold of Alexandra house, which accommodates Salisbury tax office, is owned by the Crown and is on the estate of the Court Service, western circuit.

Mr. Key: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people are employed in the VAT sub-office in Salisbury; and what is the total floor area of the premises. [29917]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Currently, there are eight people working in Salisbury VAT sub-office. The total floor area of the premises is 156.9 sq m.

Mr. Key: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the location of, and number of people employed by, the Inland Revenue in respect of Salisbury taxpayers, in (a) hard collection, (b) soft collection and (c) the compliance section. [29919]

Mr. Jack: Details of staff employed by the Inland Revenue on compliance and collection work in respect of taxpayers dealt with by the Salisbury tax office are as follows:

(a) Hard collection—where some action required to collect tax in addition to the issue of demand notes—8 people employed at Swindon collection office

(b) Soft collection—tax paid following issue of demand notes—2–3 people employed at Accounts Office in Shipley

(c) Compliance—8 people employed in Salisbury tax office; 2 people employed in Swindon collection office

National Savings

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to reduce the minimum deposit sum for national savings investment accounts to encourage savings; and if he will make a statement. [29878]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 17 May 1996]: None. The minimum deposit was increased to £20 in February 1993. National savings has an important role in encouraging savings, and has a wide range of schemes to promote this, but its costs are borne by the taxpayer and large numbers of very low value transactions are administratively costly.

DEFENCE

Exports (Crown Status)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the value of defence exports having Crown status in each of the last 10 years. [29870]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Army Legal Aid Scheme

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what criteria are used to determine eligibility for the Army legal aid scheme. [29759]

Mr. Soames: The general principles to be followed in deciding whether the case justifies the provision of legal aid are that:

(a) Legal aid would have been provided if the case had been brought in the criminal courts of the United Kingdom. This principle is designed to ensure that Army personnel are not placed at a disadvantage because they are posted aborad.

(b) The accused is being brought to trial by court martial for a service offence which is serious or involves points of legal difficulty, or the expert examination of witnesses is required.

Infra-red Technology

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 30 April, Official Report, column 511, how much his Department has spent in the last 10 years on the development of infra-red technology. [29818]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The information is not available in the form requested.

Polaris

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence at what temperature the Polaris missile propellant is burned when it is disposed of; and what containment measures are taken to prevent leakage of unburnt propellant. [29872]

Mr. Soames: Polaris rocket motors contain solid propellant. Disposal is achieved by using explosive charges which cut open the casing and then ignite the propellant. No record is held of the temperatures reached on burning, but a debris check of the disposal site is carefully carried out to ensure that the motors and propellant have been totally destroyed.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29416]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department's policy is that any request for a bond should be based on a judgment of the capabilities and financial resources of the bidder to fulfil the requirements of a particular contract. It is not related to the size of the company concerned. Such a bond would be called upon only in the event that the contractor defaulted or failed to perform against the contract in question.

A central record of parent company and bank indemnities and guarantees provided to cover contracts is held, but details of the values required and those relating to businesses under the three categories could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Western European Union

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the availability of NATO intelligence information to the Western European Union. [29893]

Mr. Soames: The recent conclusion of a security agreement between NATO and the WEU will improve the exchange of classified information, including intelligence, between the two organisations.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement concerning the establishment of a Western European Union political and military situation centre. [29892]

Mr. Soames: At their meeting in Lisbon in May 1995, WEU Ministers approved a decision to provide WEU with new decision-making mechanisms and structures, including the establishment of a situation centre to monitor and report on developing crises and act as a communication channel during operations. The UK's current Presidency of WEU has ensured that the situation centre will be operational by the second phase of Exercise WEU Crisex 95-96 in June this year.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy concerning the Western European Union's use of NATO military assets. [29894]

Mr. Soames: In accordance with the NATO summit declaration of 1994, our policy is that collective assets of the alliance should be available, on the basis of consultation in the North Atlantic Council, for operations that may be conducted by the WEU. This will include the possibility of making available combined joint task force headquarters.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the measures adopted by his Department to enhance the operational capabilities of the Western European Union. [29891]

Mr. Soames: Details of the defence initiatives undertaken during the UK Presidency of WEU, which runs from 1 January to 30 June 1996, can be found in chapter 1 of the 1996 "Statement on the Defence Estimates", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. As well as securing agreement to our proposals on WEU exercises and strategic mobility, we have offered sea training facilities to other WEU nations and have given impetus to the work to set up a situation centre. We have worked, and will continue to work, to improve links between WEU and NATO. As Presidency, we were instrumental in arranging for the signature on 6 May of the NATO—WEU security agreement, clearing the way for the exchange of classified information between two organisations.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list Western European Union joint exercises planned for the next five years. [29895]

Mr. Soames: Exercise WEU Crisex 95-96 is the only WEU-led exercise currently planned. Phases 2 and 3 of this exercise, which take place in June and December 1996, will test operational procedures for a WEU humanitarian mission. WEU nations have also invited the organisation to participate in a number of nationally led exercises. At the WEU Council of Ministers in Birmingham on 7 May, Ministers agreed the establishment of an exercise planning conference which will set out a future programme of WEU exercises. We expect that the first conference will be held this year.

Sea King Helicopters

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total number of Sea King helicopters in the possession of the Royal Navy; how many of them have been identified as having cracks in the lift frame; what is the average cost of repairing such cracks; and how many Sea Kings are currently unserviceable as a result of lift frame or other cracks. [29920]

Mr. Soames: The Royal Navy owns 119 Sea King helicopters and the RAF owns a further 25. Over the life of the combined fleets, 170 lift frames have cracked. The average cost of a repair is £58,000. Eight RN Sea Kings and one RAF Sea King are currently unserviceable for lift frame or similar cracks.

Equipment Procurement

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the value of equipment procured from single prime contractors has been directed supply in the last five years; and which United Kingdom technologies have been protected and enhanced as a result. [29863]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Information of this nature is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy on directed supply of systems and sub-systems when equipment is procured from a single prime contractor. [29862]

Mr. Arbuthnot: My Department's policy is that, wherever possible, requirement specifications are written in such a way that prime contractors are given the freedom to nominate and select the sub-contractors of their choice. There will, however, from time to time, be situations where suitable equipment is available only from a single source. Obviously, in this case, only that supplier will be able to meet the requirement but the prime contractor will still be responsible for managing the sub-contract.

Combined Joint Task Force

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contingency planning he has carried out concerning Britain's participation in NATO's combined joint task force initiative. [29890]

Mr. Soames: The UK has participated fully in the development of the combined joint task force concept since it was announced at the January 1994 NATO summit. The concept will provide NATO with a capability to form deployable headquarters, from within existing fixed headquarters, to provide the command and control of multinational and multi-service forces deployed on contingency operations. We expect to play a full part in implementation of the concept, through our participation in NATO headquarters affected by the initiative.

HMS Sheffield

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action (a) has been taken and (b) will be taken to recover the nuclear weapons on board HMS Sheffield in the south Atlantic; what assessment has been made of the environmental risks arising from nuclear materials on board; and what action (i) has been taken and (ii) will be taken to reduce the risk to the marine environment. [29743]

Mr. Soames: There has been no action to recover any weapons from HMS Sheffield, either between when she was hit and sank or since. There is no risk to the marine environment in the area where she sunk.

Contractors

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what monitoring is undertaken of post-programme completions to ensure that non-United Kingdom contractors have achieved the offset work promised. [29859]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Companies with offset obligations are required to submit reports to my Department every six months, detailing relevant contracts awarded to UK defence industry during the reporting period. A full audit of these reports is conducted in order to establish the validity of the claims, and to ensure that the companies are complying with the terms and conditions of their offset commitment.

Research Investment

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his procurement policy in respect of equipment which has been developed as a result of Government research investment. [29861]

Mr. Arbuthnot: As described in pages 68–71 of the current "Statement on the Defence Estimates", my Department's procurement policy on research investment is to obtain best value for money, encourage technological innovation and reduce equipment procurement risk. The extent of Government research investment in a particular piece of equipment is one of the many factors taken into consideration when procurement decisions are made, as are the potential benefits of defence research spin-off to the private sector.

Works of Art

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 7 May, Official Report, column 22, if he will list the 107 works of art belonging to his Department which are classified as missing, indicating their individual estimated value. [29829]

Mr. Arbuthnot: It has not been my Department's practice to obtain valuations for our works of art, but most of the missing items are prints and photographs which we believe are of little value. I will place a list of missing works of art belonging to my Department in the Library of the House.

Acoustic Processing

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what level of Government funds have been invested in the research and development of United Kingdom acoustic processing capabilities for the last 10 years. [29860]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Details of expenditure on development of defence capabilities are not available in the form requested. However, estimates of research expenditure on underwater acoustic processing for the period in question, at 1996 prices, are:

1988–89: 9.2
1989–90: 9.0
1990–91: 8.8
1991–92: 8.6
1992–93: 8.4
1993–94: 8.2
1994–95: 7.8
1995–96: 6.9[1]

[1] Provisional outturn.

All figures £ million, excl–VAT.

Housing Stock

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will maintain a golden share after the sell-off of the married housing stock. [29648]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 16 May 1996]: My Department's continuing interest in the married quarters estate will be reflected in the terms of the leases, and other contractual arrangements, for example the provision for profit share.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29457]

Mr. Hanley: The FCO diplomatic wing does not yet have this information available. We will forward it to the House of Commons Library as soon as possible.

ODA figures on payments made for goods and services to the private sector are not separately held, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29442]

Mr. Hanley: We do not hold this information in the form requested. It could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29420]

Mr. Hanley: The FCO diplomatic wing does not use performance bonds in the United Kingdom. Performance bonds are used in overseas countries where it is standard practice to use such bonds, and where the risk of technical or financial failure is high.

The ODA uses performance bonds in accordance with normal commercial practice on capital aid contracts between overseas clients and United Kingdom contractors.

The FCO (DW) has not called in any performance bonds during the last five years. The ODA has called in one; the money was used to complete the contract.

In both the FCO (DW) and ODA, information about performance bonds is not held on companies according to the number of employees.

Sudan

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received about human rights violation in the Nuba mountain region in Sudan. [29897]

Mr. Hanley: We have received disturbing reports of human rights violations in the Nuba mountains. Access to the area is difficult because of the civil war, but there is evidence of a policy of forced arabisation and islamisation of the Nuba people. The United Nations special rapporteur has stated that a large number of civilians, including women and children, have been killed in attacks by Government forces, or summarily executed.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the forced acculturation policy of the Sudanese Government. [29898]

Mr. Hanley: There is credible evidence, including that cited by the United Nations special rapporteur, Dr. Biro, that the Sudanese Government have been conducting forced islamisation and arabisation, notably in the Nuba mountains, in the camps for southern Sudanese in northern Sudan, and among children.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding human rights violations in Sudan. [29899]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. MacShane) on 13 May, column 360.

Bhutan

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received concerning human rights in Bhutan; and if he will make a statement. [29738]

Mr. Hanley: A representative of the Bhutanese refugees in eastern Nepal called on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 22 March. The human rights situation in Bhutan was discussed. A number of British non-governmental organisations have also raised the issue with us.

Mr. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received concerning the number of refugees who have recently left Bhutan for Nepal and the reasons for their departure; and what assistance is being provided by the United Kingdom to assist those refugees. [29739]

Mr. Hanley: We understand that only a few family groups have arrived in Nepal from Bhutan over recent months. The United Kingdom has contributed more than £475,000 to refugee relief in Nepal over the past three years.

Mr. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has recently made to the Indian Government about the detention of appeal marchers campaigning for change in Bhutan; how many such marchers were detailed; how many remain in custody; and if he will make a statement. [29740]

Mr. Hanley: While we discussed Bhutan in our bilateral talks with India on 28 March, we have made no specific representations to the Indian Government about the arrest of the marchers, but we continue to monitor the situation closely with our EU partners. We understand that about 1,400 marchers have been arrested, of whom 792 remain in custody.

Mr. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received concerning the outcome of the 7th round of inter-ministerial talks on Bhutan and Nepal; what steps he is taking to ensure (a) the constructive involvement of India in those talks and (b) a just resolution of the problems with which they are dealing; and if he will make a statement. [29741]

Mr. Hanley: The latest round of inter-ministerial talks between Bhutan and Nepal in Kathmandu on 4 to 8 April ended with agreement to continue the talks in Thimpu, though no dates were set. We have regularly raised Bhutan in bilateral talks with India—most recently on 28 March. We believe that negotiation between Bhutan and Nepal offers the best solution to this problem and will continue to encourage both governments in this.

Mr. Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the Official Report the terms of the resolution of 14 March passed by the European Parliament in relation to refugees from Bhutan. [29742]

Mr. Hanley: I am arranging for the resolution to be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Overseas Visits (Royal Family)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, column 362, (1) when the detailed records relating to the royal visit to Oman, Qatar, Bahrain and Saudi Arabia in 1986 were destroyed; [30031]

(2) when it became his Department's policy to destroy detailed records relating to overseas visits. [30032]

Mr. Rifkind: Accounting records, including those relating to royal visits overseas are destroyed in accordance with guidelines agreed with the National Audit Office which require that detailed invoices are kept a minimum of three years.

All detailed accounting records relating to 1986 were destroyed during the routine weeding of documents. The date of destruction was not noted.

Mr. Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what budgetary controls exist within his Department in respect of costs arising from royal visits abroad. [30033]

Mr. Rifkind: An overall cost estimate is provided before each visit is agreed. A detailed estimate is then agreed with the household concerned. Expenditure is subsequently checked against invoices and statements provided by the household.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Uganda

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made on the recent elections in Uganda; and if he will make a statement. [29896]

Mr. Hanley: International observers have concluded that the presidential elections, which were won by President Museveni with 72.4 per cent. of the vote, were carried out in a transparent manner and in accordance with the interim election statute and that the result reflects the polling process. We welcome this further step in Uganda's constitutional development.

Know-how Funds

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what occasions and in relation to which contracts United Kingdom contractors and consultants who have been engaged on know-how fund sponsored contracts in 1994 were given such contracts without a requirement to tender. [30172]

Mr. Hanley: This answer could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will list all projects funded by the know-how fund in 1994 relating to food distribution in Moscow; [30171]

(2) on what occasions and in relation to which contracts, contracts sponsored under the know-how fund in Moscow in 1994 were allocated and subsequently extended without being the subject of tendering or retendering procedures; [30173]

(3) if he will list all United Kingdom contractors and consultants who have been engaged on know-how fund sponsored food distribution projects in 1994. [30174]

Mr. Hanley: The information requested will take some time to complete. I shall write to the hon. Member shortly.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates Courts (Witnesses)

31. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps are taken to inform witnesses of (a) delays and (b) procedures in magistrates courts. [28792]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: It is generally for the prosecution and the defence to keep their witnesses informed. However, both magistrates and court staff will assist witnesses at the court to the extent that they properly can.

Royal Family (Records)

32. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on what basis records relating to members of the royal family are not released to the Public Record Office. [28793]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: As announced in 1993, in the White Paper on Open Government, public records relating to the royal family will be treated in the same way as all other records and closed for longer than 30 years only if they fall into one or more of the three criteria governing closure.

Pension Sharing

33. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on his proposals in respect of pension sharing in the Family Law Bill; when those provisions will come into force; and if he will make a statement. [28794]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: There are a number of issues which need to be resolved before pension splitting could be introduced. The Government intend to issue a Green Paper this summer to explore all these issues.

Legal Aid

34. Mr. Booth: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps he is taking to speed up legal aid payments. [28795]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Several steps have been taken by my Department and by the Legal Aid Board to ensure swift payment to solicitors and barristers for legal aid work. The introduction of standard fee systems and enhanced interim payment mechanisms for franchise holders are examples.

36. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what new proposals he has to improve the legal aid system. [28799]

Mr. Evans: The Lord Chancellor published a Green Paper setting out proposals for the reform of legal aid in May 1995. More than 200 responses were received. The Lord Chancellor has examined these responses and expects to publish a White Paper on the future of the legal aid scheme before Parliament rises for the summer.

37. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations he has recently received about the size of the legal aid budget. [28801]

Mr. Evans: I have received many representations on this matter. As my hon. Friend knows, the Lord Chancellor has announced that he intends to introduce a number of measures to gain more effective control over legal aid expenditure.

Judicial Appointments

35. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many judicial appointments were advertised in 1995. [28797]

Mr. Evans: Out of 149 appointments made to the full-time judiciary in 1995, 84 were made following either advertisement or notice to eligible candidates where eligibility is restricted. Some 550 part-time professional judicial appointments were made in the same year, just over 100 of which were made following either advertisement or notice to eligible candidates.

Commonhold

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what progress is being made on the introduction of commonhold. [28790]

Mr. Evans: A new draft Bill is being prepared and it remains the Government's intention to publish this for consultation during the summer and to introduce legislation to implement commonhold as soon as possible.

Repossession (West Midlands)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many homes have been repossessed in the west midlands since 1992. [30159]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The questions concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer. I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from Michael Huebner to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 20 May 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, has asked me to reply to your Question about the number of repossessed houses in the West Midlands since 1992.

The figures for the numbers of repossession orders made in the county courts in the West Midlands since 1992 are:

1993: 3,358

1996: 770 (first quarter).

However, not all repossession orders result in actual repossession of the property. The figure for the numbers of actual repossessions is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Lord Chief Justice (Appointment)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make it his policy to consult opposition parties regarding the appointment of a new Lord Chief Justice; and if he will make a statement. [27898]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is responsible for advising the Queen on the appointment of the Lord Chief Justice. In conjunction with the Lord Chancellor, he will ensure that the necessary consultations are undertaken as appropriate.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Primary Schools, Killyleagh

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many pupils attend the Cedar integrated primary school at Crossgar; how many of these pupils travel from the Killyleagh district; what is the weekly cost to public funds of their travel arrangements; what assessment his Department has made of the impact of this school on enrolment at St. Mary's primary school, Killyleagh; and if he will make a statement. [29877]

Mr. Ancram: At present, 26 pupils attend Cedar integrated primary school. Of these, 12 travel from the Killyleagh district at a weekly cost to public funds of £91.80. The impact of Cedar on all schools in the area, including St. Mary's primary school at Killyleagh, was assessed when the development proposal was considered in 1995. It was considered then that the long-term viability of these schools would not be affected by a new integrated school.

Sainsbury's, Londonderry

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the public inquiry was held into the planning application by Sainsbury's in Londonderry; when the planning appeal commission will issue its report; and if he will make a statement. [29902]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Planning Service under its chief executive, Mr. T. W. Stewart. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from T. W. Stewart to Mr. John D. Taylor, dated 17 May 1996:

Mr Moss has asked me to reply to your question about the Public Inquiry into the planning application by Sainsbury's in Londonderry.

The Public Inquiry, which was held by the Planning Appeals Commission (PAC), ran from 20 February 1996 until 29 March 1996, and closing submissions were later made on 16 April 1996.You will appreciate that the report and recommendations of the Inquiry is a matter for the Chief Commissioner. However I understand from the PAC that their report is unlikely to be available before the summer.

I can assure you that when the report is received, it will be carefully considered by the Department before a final decision is reached. The PAC report will of course be made available to the public once the Department's decision has issued.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29438]

Sir John Wheeler: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29453]

Sir John Wheeler: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Ordnance Survey

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for Ordnance Survey of Northern Ireland in 1996–97. [30308]

Mr. Moss: For 1996–97 the following performance targets have been set out for OSNI:

1. To survey 32,000 survey units in the revision programme.

2. To complete 875 data capture units representing 1,716 basic scale map sheets converted to digital format.

3. To update the digital topographical database with 93 per cent. of the updates completed within seven working days of receipt of the field data.

4. To despatch, within seven working days, 92 per cent. of orders for folded and basic scale maps.

5. To reduce unit costs so that they weighted mean percentage reduction of selected representative activities is 3 per cent.

6. To recover from the supply of goods and services, 27 per cent. of the total costs incurred by the agency.

Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what targets have been set for the Driver and Vehicle Testing Agency during 1996–97. [30310]

Mr. Moss: For 1996–97, the following performance targets have been set:

	Target
Vehicle test appointments	24 days average waiting time
Driving test appointments	48 days average waiting time
Productivity (vehicle testing)	18.0 units per man per day
Productivity (driver testing)	7.9 units per man per day
Error rate	Faulty inspections not to exceed 0.20 per cent. of tests conducted
Level of complaints about booking arrangements	Less than 0.75 per cent. of applications received
Level of complaints about the conduct of tests	Less than 0.75 per cent. of applications received
Level of customer satisfaction with test procedures	At least 85 per cent. plus or minus 2 per cent. within the range of sampling error
Number of compensation payments for cancelled tests	Less than 0.4 per cent. of applications received
Composition unit cost of testing operations	£16.81

Public Record Office

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what performance targets have been set for the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland in 1996–97. [30309]

Mr. Moss: For 1996–97, the following performance targets have been set out for PRONI:

Efficiency

1. To reduce PRONI's composite unit cost in the areas of selecting and accessing, records listing, records storage, document production and reader service by 5 per cent. from £105.21 to £99.95.

2. To manage the agency's workload, including an anticipated 20 per cent. increase in readers and the maintenance of extended opening hours, while absorbing a 4.5 per cent. reduction in staff and ensuring that expenditure is within financial limits approved by the Department.

Quality of Service

3. To process customer queries within 10 working days of receipt in 75 per cent. of cases and within 14 working days in 96 per cent. of cases, thus improving PRONI's citizens charter commitment.

4. To upgrade 10 per cent. of 33,360 linear metres of records stored on mobile shelving at Balmoral avenue, in accordance with defined standards of archival protection.

5. With the help of a new computerised document request system to improve the speed of production to the public by reducing waiting time from 45 minutes to 40 minutes or less in 90 per cent. of cases.

Effectiveness

6. To process 335.5 linear metres of records deposited and to ensure that 100 per cent. of all new "open" material is processed within one year of receipt.

Schools (Intruders and Trespassers)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has to give additional powers to school authorities with regard to (a) intruders and (b) trespassers into schools; and if he will make a statement. [29905]

Mr. Ancram: The Offensive Weapons Bill, which is currently going through the House of Commons, will make it an offence to carry a knife on school premises and give the police the powers of search on school premises. These provisions will be extended to Northern Ireland. In addition, the Department of Education for Northern Ireland is urgently considering the action needed to implement in Northern Ireland the recommendations in the recent report from the working group on school security published on 14 May.

WALES

University Hospital of Wales

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when the department of postgraduate medicine at the University hospital of Wales is expected to take over responsibility for all appointments to the specialist registrar grade; if pay arrangements for all specialist registrars are to be centrally funded; and what representations he has received from NHS trusts in Wales and the Department of postgraduate medicine concerning payment arrangements for (a) this grade and (b) other junior medical staff. [30191]

Mr. Hague: The postgraduate department started taking over the responsibility for operating the appointments procedures for the specialist registrar grade on 1 December 1995 in line with the timetable for commissioning the new grade in each speciality. There is 100 per cent. central funding available, in the first year only, for additional posts and thereafter the postgraduate department will continue to fund 50 per cent. of the salary costs. Discussions take place with NHS trusts and the postgraduate department as part of the management of these arrangements for all junior medical staff.

Higher Education

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the expenditure in Wales on higher education in real terms in each of the past 10 years. [28615]

Mr. Hague: The expenditure on higher education in Wales for the years 1993–94, 1994–95, 1995–96 and the provision for 1996–97 is shown in the following table. The amounts include tuition fee income and adjustments relating to dual support provision for research. Prior to 1993–94, higher education was funded from a variety of sources, including the University Grants Committee, the University Funding Council, the Welsh Office and local authorities, and it is not possible to provide comparable expenditure figures for that period.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29447]

Mr. Hague: The information is not available in the form requested, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29432]

Mr. Hague: My Department does not hold the information requested.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29429]

Mr. Hague: Advice on the use of performance bonds is set out in the central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48 "Bonds and guarantees", copies of which are available in the Libraries of both Houses. This guidance makes it clear that bonds are not always necessary and are no substitute for considered judgments about the risks of a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources of the available contractor. These factors will vary for each contract independent of the size of the contractor. Information regarding the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years is not held by my Department

EU Funding

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the recipients of funding for education and training purposes from the European Union in each of the last three years, giving the programme under which the funding was provided. [29303]

Mr. Richards: The information requested is not held centrally.

Rendering and Incineration Facilities

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to the letter of 15 May of the Minister of State for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give details of the rendering facilities and incineration facilities available in Wales to be used in conjunction with the abattoirs listed; and if he will make a statement. [30188]

Mr. Hague: There are no rendering facilities in Wales, the intervention board is considering which incinerators in Wales could be used under the scheme.

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to the letter of the Minister of State for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food of 15 May, if he will give details of the pattern of alternating use of the slaughterhouses listed in Wales as between participation in the cull scheme and normal slaughter for sale. [30189]

Mr. Hague: The precise pattern of slaughtering is a matter for abattoirs themselves, as long as they meet the normal hygiene regulations.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the (a) slaughtering industry and (b) food retailing industry concerning the desirability of (i) exclusive use of slaughterhouses designated for the 30-month and over special beef slaughter schemes and (ii) alternating use of such facilities with normal slaughtering of meat for sale; and if he will make a statement. [30190]

Mr. Hague: (a) My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State met a delegation last month.

(b) None.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

WPC Yvonne Fletcher

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Attorney-General, pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State of 8 May, Official Report, column 214, if he will make it his policy to give permission to grant an application under section 13 of the Coroners Act 1988 to order a fresh inquest in the case of WPC Yvonne Fletcher. [29296]

The Attorney-General: I have no power to order a fresh inquest. Section 13 of the Coroners Act 1988 permits the High Court to do so where an application is made on my authority. Any request to me for the grant of my authority would be considered on its own merits. In each instance, I consider whether there is a reasonable prospect of establishing that it is necessary or desirable in the interests of justice for a fresh inquest to be held.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Tourism

14. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the Government's policies on tourism. [28771]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government's work programme set out in "Tourism—Competing with the Best" fully recognises the importance of the industry as a creator of wealth and employment. My Department continues to work in partnership with the industry to improve our competitiveness in the world market. We have made significant progress on measures to help improve quality and value for money in the accommodation sector, and we are developing an agenda for action on the industry's use of its human resources.

24. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what recent representations she has received regarding deregulation of the tourism industry; and if she will make a statement. [28783]

Mrs. Bottomley: Last week, I took part in the Government's deregulation seminar for the tourism and hospitality industry. We will respond to the concerns raised about burdensome regulations. Much has already been achieved in the Government's drive towards deregulation, but we will continue to work towards removing unnecessary obstacles to the growth of this £35 billion industry.

National Lottery (Gambling)

16. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what proposals she has to assess the impact of the national lottery on the gambling habits of individuals. [28774]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The protection of participants in the national lottery is the responsibility of the Director-General of the National Lottery, who has carried out research on playing, and has plans to carry out further work. Gambling is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, whose Department has undertaken to monitor the impact of the national lottery on the horserace betting levy which involves examining betting expenditure.

National Lottery (Drama Groups)

17. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many drama groups have been awarded funds from the national lottery. [28775]

Mr. Sproat: Drama groups throughout the United Kingdom have benefited from the national lottery. To date, there have been 64 awards to a total of over £3.5 million, including, for example, an award to the Weymouth drama club to help it create a new rehearsal and performance space.

Euro 96

18. Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what financial support the Government have given to the promotion of cultural events in London at the Euro 96 tournament. [28776]

Mr. Sproat: The Government have contributed £100,000 towards cultural events in the eight host cities, including London. A further £150,000 has been made available from both the Sportsmatch and ABSA business sponsorship schemes, and £130,000 from the Sports Council. A wide range of musical events will also take place as part of the national music festival.

Museums and Galleries

19. Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much her Department is spending on capital projects at museums and galleries in 1996–97. [28777]

Mr. Sproat: My Department will provide £217 million in 1996–97 to museum and galleries and to the Museums and Galleries Commission. It is for the boards of these institutions to decide how much of this money should go towards capital projects.

Dance and Drama Students

20. Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement about future assistance available to young people from the lottery fund to assist them in taking up places in dance and drama schools. [28778]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Gunnell).

Millennium

21. Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how young people will be encouraged to participate in projects marking the millennium. [28779]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I am keen to see young people playing a full part in the millennium celebrations. The Millennium Commission is currently considering applications from partner organisations for its millennium awards. Among the ideas put forward are schemes which offer new opportunities to young people in inner cities. Other commission—funded capital projects will provide opportunities for children to benefit both in terms of education, at sites such as the Earth centre at Doncaster and enjoyment, such as the Sustrans national cycleway.

The Government are currently considering what machinery is needed to co-ordinate other millennium events and projects and they are mindful of the need to involve all sections of the community.

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a further statement on her Department's plans to celebrate the millennium. [28772]

Mrs. Bottomley: The Government are currently putting in place machinery to co-ordinate the many projects and events that are being planned around the United Kingdom to celebrate the millennium. These will embrace the projects which the Millennium Commission is funding through the national lottery, including the millennium exhibition and festival. My Department will take the lead in this co-ordination.

Royal Palaces

22. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans her Department has for improving public access to the royal palaces and their gardens [28781]

Mr. Sproat: The Historic Royal Palaces Agency is responsible for the unoccupied royal palaces, all of which are open to the public. They have plans to improve access for disabled visitors at Hampton Court palace.

The Royal Collection Trust is responsible for public access to the occupied royal palaces. Details are given in the trust's annual report.

Millennium (Christians)

23. Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what discussions she has had with the established Church regarding the celebrations to mark the 2000 anniversary of the birth of Christ. [28782]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The millennium will be an event for everyone to celebrate. It will also be an important anniversary for all Christians, and I recently met the Archbishop of Canterbury to discuss the Church's role. The Millennium Commission has also met many other faith groups to discuss their part in the celebrations.

FM Radio Frequencies

25. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations she has received about the availability of FM radio frequencies. [28785]

Mr. Sproat: My Department receives representations on a wide variety of frequency spectrum issues from time to time.

National Lottery (Conservation)

26. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what has been the funding from the national lottery allocated to the conservation of the United Kingdom built and landscape heritage; and what percentage this represents of total national lottery funding. [28786]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A total of 189 projects involving the preservation of the built and landscape heritage have received £61.4 million from the heritage lottery fund. These are only two areas of our diverse heritage that the heritage lottery fund supports. The heritage lottery fund is distributing 20 per cent. of the proceeds of the national lottery to heritage projects. In total it has made 302 awards to a value of 172.3 million.

The Amsterdam

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what progress is being made in resolving the outstanding problems with the Dutch Government over responsibility for the wreck of the Dutch East Indiaman the Amsterdam. [28773]

Mr. Sproat: The Dutch Government is the owner of the wreck of the Amsterdam. I understand that they have been approached by a local group and have entered into discussion on the future of the wreck. My officials are being kept informed of developments by the Dutch Government.

Playing Fields

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on her policy for playing fields. [29027]

Mr. Sproat: The Government are seriously concerned at the loss of playing fields and attach a high priority to ensuring that people have access to high quality sports facilities. Following a commitment made in "Sport: Raising the Game", the Government consulted on proposals that the Sports Council should become a statutory consultee for development affecting playing fields. Responses indicated broad support and, subject to further consideration of some technical and legal points, it is expected that the necessary statutory instrument will come into force in July.

SCOTLAND

Mr. and Mrs. McInnes

Mr. Galloway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the cost to public funds of disinterring the cadavers of Mr. John McInnes and his mother; and if he will make a statement. [29508]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The estimated cost of exhuming and re-interring the bodies of Mr. McInnes and his mother by Strathclyde police is approximately £2,900. I fully appreciate how distressing this must be for the family and relatives of Mr. and Mrs. McInnes and I am glad that the bodies have now been re-buried. While this is, of course, a police operational matter in which Ministers have no powers to intervene, I hope that the investigations can now be concluded as speedily as possible.

Departmental Equipment and Furniture

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was (a) the cost and (b) the number of items of equipment and furniture that (i) have been stolen and (ii) are otherwise accounted for from the (1) Scottish Home and Health Department, (2) Scottish Industry Department, (3) Scottish Education, (4) Scottish Environmental Department in each of the past five years specifying any such items valued at £5,000, and showing information technology material separately. [28756]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) on 18 March.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29437]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 28 November, Official Report, column 590, to her question on total spend with small and medium enterprises. Our financial and procurement systems in use in 1995–96 and earlier years had no facility for categorising suppliers according to their number of employees.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Crown Office will conduct an inquiry into the implications for the Lockerbie inquiry of developments in respect of the forensic science laboratory in Kent. [30187]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: An independent scientific review is to be conducted by Professor Brian Caddy which will consider the instances where contamination might have taken place from the particular centrifuge in question. It would be quite wrong to attempt to pre-empt the results of that review by indulging in speculation concerning what those results might be. It is a matter of public record that residues of both RDX and PETN, which are components of a high performance plastic explosive, semtex, were identified in debris from the Lockerbie disaster by the forensic explosives laboratory. I understand from my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate that the evidence which forms the basis of the charges against the two Libyans does not depend on the identification of the high performance plastic explosive which destroyed the aircraft at Lockerbie.

Crofters (Building Grants and Loans)

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the conclusions of the Committee of Public Accounts set out in paragraphs 29 to 33 of its 17th report, Session 1989–90, "Grants to Aid the Structure of Agriculture in Great Britain" (HC 150). [29573]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 16 May 1996]: My right hon. Friend broadly agrees with the conclusions about the crofters building grants and loans scheme expressed by the Public Accounts Committee in its 17th report for Session 1989–90. However, he also believes that it is important to consider from time to time whether there are ways of getting better value for money from Government spending. In his statement to the Scottish Grand Committee, he indicated that CBGLS would continue in its present form. This decision is based on a judgment that the scheme continues to play a key role in improving housing conditions in crofting areas.

Council of Europe Meetings

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995 have been attended by Ministers or officials of his Department or the Lord Advocate's Department; and if he will make a statement. [29367]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 17 May 1996]: Since January 1995, no Minister from the Scottish Office has attended a meeting organised by the Council of Europe. The Solicitor-General has attended one such meeting. Officials from the Scottish Office attend Council of Europe meetings whenever there is a subject on which Scotland has interest or a particular expertise. Since January 1995 three such meetings have been attended.

Cullen Inquiry

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many firms of solicitors are to represent the families of the deceased at the Cullen inquiry; and how many families are to be represented by each firm. [29942]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 17 May 1996]: One firm of solicitors represents the families of all the deceased children. A different firm represents the family of the deceased teacher.

Caledonian MacBrayne

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 14 May, Official Report, column 434, if he will list all the factors involved in the need to increase the revenue deficit grant to Caledonian MacBrayne in 1996–97; if he will indicate the compliance costs associated with additional safety requirements applying to ro-ro ferries; and if he will make a statement. [29940]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 17 May 1996]: Caledonian MacBrayne Ltd. prepares an annual report and accounts which comply with the requirements of the Companies Act 1985, and which are presented each year to Parliament in accordance with section 8(1) of the Transport (Scotland) Act 1989. The Government do not consider that it is appropriate to disclose more detailed information about the company's revenues and expenditure than is contained in the published annual report and accounts.

Sheriff Courts

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the average waiting time a defendant has had to wait between being charged and the subsequent trial in sheriff courts in the last five years. [28670]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not available.

HEALTH

Speech and Language Therapists

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of speech and language therapists at each grade from spine points 23 to 27 in each of the past five years. [28445]

Mr. Malone: The available information is shown in the table. A new pay and grade system, using pay points on a single spine, was introduced in March 1991. Data are available only by the new spine points from September 1991 to September 1994, which is the latest year available. The figures are "snapshots" of a process of gradual transition which was on-going throughout the period 1991 to 1994.

Long-term Care

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost of one year's long-term care for a disabled person. [29033]

Mr. Bowis: Information collected centrally on expenditure and use of care relates to the client group and not to the nature of an individual's disability. Provisional 1994–95 figures are of a gross cost to local authorities of £18,000 per supported physically or learning disabled resident in residential or nursing homes—calculated from reported gross expenditure divided by the average number of supported residents at the beginning and end of the financial year.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of disabled people in Britain need long-term care. [29031]

Mr. Bowis: Information on the percentage of disabled people in need of long-term care is not available centrally.

Duplicate NHS Numbers

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many duplicate NHS numbers have been issued by his Department; what plans he has to end this duplication; and if he will make a statement. [29697]

Mr. Horam: Duplicate national health service numbers have so far been issued to some 7,500 newly registered babies

We are able to identify duplicate numbers quickly. Until the problem is resolved, the NHS central register is giving all of the babies concerned new NHS numbers to replace the duplicate numbers issued originally.

More than one option has been identified to prevent the issuing of duplicate numbers and these options are being evaluated. The study is due to make its recommendations at the end of May 1996. The chosen option will be implemented as quickly as possible.

GP Fundholders

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what have been the payments made to GP fundholders in each region in each year since 1990–91 in (a) management allowances and (b) computer costs. [29401]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my right hon. Friend the then Minister for Health gave him on 26 January 1994, column 300; the reply I gave him on 25 January 1995, columns 259–60; and the reply I gave him on 18 July 1995, columns 1152.

Information about management allowances in 1994–95 is shown in the table. Information about 1995-96 is not yet available.

Redundancies

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 19 December 1995, Official Report, column 1134, if he will update the figures of redundancy payments. [29473]

Mr. Malone: Expenditure by Dorset Healthcare trust has been amended from £88,293 to £23,394, a difference of £64,889 as a result of a validation exercise. This exercise has not yet been concluded and the figures for 1994–95 remain provisional.

Research Fraud

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what study his Department has commissioned through the scientific research councils into the prevalence of research fraud; and what plans he has to commission further studies. [29566]

Mr. Malone: It is the responsibility of the whole medical research community and all its sponsors to ensure good practice in the conduct of research and this operates primarily through the principles of peer review and through guidelines on good practice. The Department's research programmes cover research into health and social care of relevance to the Department and the national health service. The Department has not commissioned work on the more general issues of research conduct and there are no plans, currently, to do so.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what investigations in respect of misconduct are undertaken before research funds are allocated to units undertaking research; and what plans he has to increase the level of these investigations. [29563]

Mr Malone: The Department is committed to maintaining high standards in the commissioning and management of research which operates primarily through peer review and through guidelines on good practice—the Department's code of practice for commissioning and managing research, introduced in 1992.

Research commissioned by the Department, whether from an individual or an academic institution, is subject to the terms of an agreed contract which embodies the code of practice.

With such research management arrangements in place, it is not considered necessary to carry out separate investigations in respect of misconduct before research funds are allocated and there are no plans, at present, to introduce such investigations in the future.

Codes of Research

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many Government-funded scientific research units have developed printed codes of research, which they require junior scientists undertaking research for the first time to sign; and if he will make a statement. [29560]

Mr. Malone: The Department has had a code of practice for the commissioning and management of research and development in place since 1992 to help ensure quality and relevance of research funded by this Department. The management arrangements of all research undertaken by the Department, and by the non-departmental public bodies funded by the Department, is reviewed annually with particular emphasis on the application of the code of practice. The conditions of employment of researchers are a matter for the employing authority. Any research commissioned by the Department, whether from an individual or from an academic institution, is subject to the terms of an agreed contract which embodies the principles of the code of practice.

Codes of research in other scientific research units are the responsibility of the Office of Science and Technology.

Health Visitors

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will review the policy of general practitioner alignment of health visitors; and if he will publish the results of that review. [29567]

Mr. Horam: Health visitors work very closely with their general practitioner colleagues, other members of the primary health care team and the practice population.

From 1973, some district nurses and health visitors have become attached to GP practices and this has enhanced both the practice team and patient care.

We are currently completing a major listening exercise about primary care. A report will be published in June this year.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will review the target requirements for health visitors to visit a new patient within five working days. [29549]

Mr. Horam: The patients charter standard is based on current good practice. It is a challenging but achievable standard, and there are no plans to review it.

NHS Spending

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total amount of spending in the UK on the NHS, expressed as a percentage of total public spending, in each year since 1974. [29643]

Mr. Horam: A consistent series of figures is available only from 1978–79. The information is in the table:

Year	UK expenditure on the national health service as a percentage of general Government expenditure(X)[1]
1978–79	10.9

1995–96 (estimated outturn)	13.3

[1] GGE(X) is General Government Expenditure excluding privatisation proceeds and lottery-financed spending and net of interest and dividend receipts.

Biomedical Research

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received concerning conflicts of interest in biomedical research where Government bodies fund such research; and if he will make a statement. [29561]

Mr. Malone: We have received no representations concerning conflicts of interest in biomedical research where Government bodies fund such research.

Children (Part-time Employment)

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his Department's latest estimate of the number of children under 16 years of age who are in part-time employment; and how many of these have a work permit issued by their local education authority. [29762]

Mr. Bowis: The information is not available centrally.

NHS Funding

Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will announce the 1996–97 hospital and community health services revenue and capital initial cash limits for the new health authorities. [30301]

Mr. Dorrell: The initial revenue and capital cash limits for the new health authorities are given in the table.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29421]

Mr. Horam: The Department has not required any performance bonds in the last five years. Advice on the use of performance bonds is set out in the central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48 "Bonds and Guarantees", copies of which are available in the Library. This makes it clear that a performance bond is no substitute for considered judgments about the risks attached to a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources of the available contractors. These judgments apply, irrespective of the size of the contractor.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29441]

Mr. Horam: This information is not collected. To do so would add an unnecessary burden on suppliers.

Scientists and Engineers

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 490, how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed at each grade in each of his Department's agencies in each year since 1991. [29900]

Mr. Horam: It is not always possible to distinguish between scientific and engineering specialisms. Figures for 1991 are not available for the Medicines Control Agency.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 11 March, Official Report, column 490, how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed at each of the unified grades in the headquarters division of his Department in each year since 1991. [29835]

Mr. Horam: Information for Department of Health headquarters only is not available prior to April 1995. Information for 1995 and 1996 is set out as follows.

There are no staff in the Department of Health Headquarters divisions employed as engineers.

Pharmacists

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is taking to alleviate the clawback of settlement discount to pharmacists from wholesalers when that discount has not been received by pharmacists. [29575]

Mr. Malone: None. The discount clawback system is based on an assessment of discounts received by all pharmacists for drugs and appliances dispensed against NHS prescriptions. The incentive for individual pharmacists is to achieve at least the average level of discount for the value of items dispensed.

Mr Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is taking to protect community pharmacists in the event of the breakdown of resale price maintenance. [29576]

Mr. Malone: The review of resale price maintenance on medicaments being undertaken by the Director General of Fair Trading is a matter for the director general. Representations concerning the viability of community pharmacies and other aspects of the review should be made direct to him.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29456]

Mr. Horam: From an examination of the payment records of the Department and its agencies, it is estimated that payments of about £130 million were made to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96.

Community Pharmacists

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is taking to speed up payments to community pharmacists. [29574]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) on 12 December 1995, column 580.

Medical and Surgical Services

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the Government's current policy on the concentration of individual medical and surgical services, other than cancer services, at fewer hospitals. [29744]

Mr. Horam: Each individual case will be considered on its merits balancing the loss of choice, access, competition and responsiveness that may follow concentration against any gains in quality of patient care or economies of scale where these cannot otherwise be achieved.

The Department has issued guidance, HSG (94)55, on the subject "The Operation of the NHS Internal Market: Local Freedoms, National Responsibilities", copies of which are available in the Library. We have also commissioned a short study into concentration and choice in acute services from a team led by Trevor Sheldon of the centre for reviews and dissemination in York.

Hospitals (Training Centres)

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made as to which hospitals in the north-west are insufficiently large to be registered as training centres. [29745]

Mr. Malone: None; the Department does not register hospitals for training purposes. Training posts or programmes for junior doctors are approved by the relevant medical royal colleges.

Vitamin K

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he has taken to license oral vitamin K for infants. [30009]

Mr. Malone: The Medicines Control Agency has had extensive discussions about the licensing of oral vitamin K. Currently, no marketing authorisation for oral vitamin K for infants has been granted. Information about all applications for a marketing authorisation for a medicinal product is confidential and no information can be released until the announcement is made in the London, Belfast and Edinburgh gazettes that a marketing authorisation has been granted.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to issue guidance on the use of intra-muscular vitamin K for infants. [30010]

Mr. Horam: The chief medical officer and chief nursing officer issued guidance on the use of intramuscular vitamin K for infants in December 1992. They await the results of departmental commissioned research, expected during 1996, to inform further guidance.

Hip Replacements

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hip replacement operations were performed in 1995 on the national health service; how many were on patients from general practitioners fundholder practices; and how many patients had waited (a) more than and (b) less than one year. [29768]

Mr. Horam: The latest available information relates to 1993–94 and is shown in the table.

Vehicles (Child Restraints)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will discuss with the Department of Transport the requirement on national health service trusts to implement a policy of child restraints in all vehicles used for the transport of children. [29550]

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply.

There are several hundred NHS trusts in England which, although accountable to the Secretary of State for Health, have considerable autonomy over their day-to-day operations. Some trusts may have their own guidelines on child restraints, although I have no details on this. However, the Department of Health has informed me that it has no plans to issue any specific guidelines.

Safety of Medicines

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 14 March, Official Report, column 751, if he will give a breakdown of the sum of £821, 986 devoted to running the spontaneous adverse drug reaction reporting scheme in 1994–95. [26256]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 24 April 1996]: This figure relates to the budget allocated to the ADROIT—adverse drug reactions on-line information tracking—group of the Medicines Control Agency, which is responsible for the day-to-day running of the United Kingdom's spontaneous adverse drug reaction reporting scheme. Of this amount, £612,482 relates to the basic salary of staff working within the unit—excluding national insurance and pension contributions—and £209,504 relates to the costs of running and maintaining the ADROIT database for the financial year 1994–95. This database records all reports of adverse drugs reactions received from doctors and pharmaceutical companies.

NHS Paperwork

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the report of the efficiency scrutiny into the burden of paperwork in NHS trusts and health authorities will be published. [30012]

Mr. Dorrell: I will be publishing the report on Tuesday 21 May. Copies will be available from the Vote Office and Library from 11am on that day.

HEALTH

Asthma

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 19 February, Official Report, column 34, when he expects to announce his conclusions on the inclusion of asthma as a target area in the "The Health of the Nation". [29201]

Mr. Horam: In due course.

Research

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the measures he has taken to prevent conflicts of interest in biomedical research addressed by the Government bodies funding such research. [29562]

Mr. Malone: The Department is committed to maintaining high standards in the management of research commissioned by the Department through peer review and guidelines on good practice—the Department's code of practice for commissioning and managing research, introduced in 1992.

Guidelines on the protocols that govern the operations of the national health service research and development programme, including conflicts of interest, have been issued to all those working within the programme. Under the guidelines members and the chairperson of NHS research and development commissioning groups are reminded of the need for impartiality in the commissioning of research and advised that they must declare a conflict of interest when one occurs and withdraw from the discussion.

The main agency through which the Government support biomedical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, for each of the last five years, the number of cases of research sponsored by Government agencies which have been shown to be fraudulent; and if he will list the estimated cost to public funds of that misconduct. [29564]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many scientific research units in the United Kingdom supported by Government funds have held formal courses in the organisational ethics of scientific research in the past two years. [29559]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

Training carried out by research units is a matter for directors of the individual research units concerned.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on liaison between his Department and private research charities about research fraud. [29565]

Mr. Malone: The Department gives a high priority to collaborating with other research funders to increase understanding of matters of mutual concern and to promote co-operation.

We work closely with the Association of Medical Research Charities, which represents some 48 charities. The AMRC is also represented on the national forum which brings together a wide range of research funders and provides an important means of establishing closer links between research interests in the NHS and elsewhere.

Within this framework, the guidelines for good research practice to which different research sponsors adhere are discussed and kept under review.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the procedure his Department follows when a case of suspected misconduct in medical research is reported to it. [30005]

Mr. Malone: Any allegation of misconduct in medical research reported to the Department would, in the first instance, be referred to the host institution for investigation in line with the clearly agreed terms of the contract signed between the Department and the research organisation.

If necessary, following the outcome of the inquiry, the complaint would be referred to the relevant professional body for further investigation. The Department would ensure that it was fully informed of the result of these inquiries and would, if appropriate, terminate any contract in place at that time.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each of his Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30119]

Mr. Horam: Since the "Competing for Quality" programme started in 1992–93, the Department of Health's four executive agencies have market tested activities with a total value of £10.68 million with resulting savings of £3.66 million. This is broken down by agency in the table.

£ million

Agency	Cost of activity before competition[1]	Resulting savings[1]
Medicines Control Agency	0.260	0.132
Medical Devices Agency	0.195	0.150
NHS Estates Agency	2.981	0.041
NHS Pensions Agency	7.248	3.339

School Doctors and Nurses

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many whole-time equivalent (a) school nurses and (b) school doctors have been employed by the NHS in each NHS region in each of the last seven years. [28454]

Mr. Horam [holding answer 15 May 1996]: The information relating to school nurses is shown in the table. School nurses provide health surveillance for children who miss child health or general practitioner health screening, immunisation and developmental checks. The latest data available, published in October 1994, shows that 96 per cent. or 25,400 general practitioners perform childhood immunisations and 94 per cent. 24,900 carry out child health surveillance.

School doctors include community paediatrician and general practitioners depending on local arrangements and therefore cannot be identified separately in Department statistics.

NHS hospital and community health services qualified nursing and midwifery staff, excluding agency staff, working in the school nursing area of work by regional health authority in England at 30 September each year 1988 to 1994

Heathway Residential Home, Seaham

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future of the Heathway residential home in Seaham. [30215]

Mr. Bowis: This is a matter for County Durham health authority, in discussion with Priority Healthcare Wearside national health service trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the authority for details.

In Vitro Fertilisation

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many HIV patients have been provided with IVF treatment in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [30237]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally. The decision to provide fertility treatment to any particular patient is one for the clinicians involved, taking into account all the circumstances of the case. The Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act 1990 requires as a condition of any treatment licence issued under the Act that account be taken of the welfare of any child who is born as the result of treatment.

NHS Trust Hospitals (Greater London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the chairpersons of each national health service trust hospital covering the Greater London area, indicating the annual salary paid to each for the year 1995–96. [30307]

Mr. Malone: Information on all appointments of chairmen and non-executive directors to national health service authorities and trusts, and the remuneration paid, will be published in the summer of 1996.

Contact Lenses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many persons get free repeat prescription contact lenses on the ground that they are susceptible to eye infections, for the most recent years for which figures are available. [30357]

Mr. Malone: Where a consultant ophthalmologist decides that a patient requires frequent changes of lenses on clinical grounds, the patient pays only for their first pair unless they are, in any case, entitled to help with national health service charges, in which case they can use their vouchers to help meet the cost. The number of patients who benefit from this provision is not available centrally.

Child Care Workers

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which bodies are responsible for checking the suitability of child care workers supplied by employment agencies. [30406]

Mr. Bowis: It is the responsibility of each individual employer to ensure that people they employ to work with children are suitable for such work.

EU Health Council

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Health Council on 14 May. [29655]

Mr. Malone: The Council took note of a working document submitted by the Commission on transmissible spongiform encephalopathies and, after an extensive and constructive debate, agreed conclusions on action to be taken to understand better the pathogenesis and transmissibility of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease and to extend epidemiological surveillance of the disease.

The Council agreed a common position text based on the Commission's proposal for a decision adopting a programme of Community action on health monitoring, taking account of the European Parliament's opinion on that proposal.

The Council confirmed that, as a number of European Parliament amendments to its common position text could not be accepted, the Conciliation Committee should be convened to reach agreement on a joint text for a decision adopting a programme of Community action on the prevention of drug dependence.

The Council had a short orientation debate on the Commission's proposal for a decision creating a Community network for the epidemiological surveillance and control of communicable diseases and took note of action in hand to develop a global early warning system and response network for communicable diseases, within the context of the EU-US action plan which was agreed in December last year.

There was a short discussion also of the Commission's amended proposal for a Council directive on the approximation of laws relating to the advertising of tobacco products and of a paper from the Italian presidency that explored possibilities for making progress with the proposal. The presidency concluded that it had not found the basis for a compromise.

Carers

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information of a financial nature is required, under guidance issued by his Department, from a spouse who is a carer where the person receiving care, being the marriage partner, requests (a) domiciliary services and (b) respite care, from a local authority social services department. [29865]

Mr. Bowis: Advice relating to these issues is in the Department's guidance to local authorities, "Charging for Residential Accommodation Guide", copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information of a financial nature is required, under guidance issued by his Department is required from a partner of a person to whom he or she provides care where the person receiving care requests (a) domiciliary and (b) respite care from a local authority social services department and where there is no marital relationship. [29866]

Mr. Bowis: Advice relating to these issues is in an advice note on non-residential services, "Discretionary Charges for Adult Social Services", for use by the social services inspectorate, copies of which are available in the Library.

Euro 96 (Emergency Services)

Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much additional funding is being accorded to North Manchester hospital emergency services to serve the June Euro 96 competition being held in Manchester. [30040]

Mr. Horam: Trusts are not funded directly by the Department but from contracts with purchasers. The hon. Member may wish to approach Professor Joan Higgins, chairman of Manchester health authority, for details.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30064]

Mr. Horam: The members of staff working centrally in the Department on deregulation issues are a grade 5, a senior executive officer, an executive officer and an administrative officer, a total of 2.5 whole-time equivalents. All are career civil servants. In addition, there is a network of officials around the Department, responsible for co-ordinating deregulation activities in their area of work—where appropriate in close consultation with people from the private sector. The budgeted expenditure for the unit in 1996–97 is £70,000.

NHS Employees

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department collates on (a) chief executives and (b) senior managers who resign employment with one NHS employer and take up employment with another. [30411]

Mr. Malone: None.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff in (a) his Department and (b) the NHS executive have declared potential conflicts of interest over the last three years. [30431]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) on 27 February at column 461.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what investigations (a) his Department and (b) the NHS executive have undertaken into conflicts of interests involving (i) trust board and (ii) health authority members. [30432]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 12 July 1995 at column 552.

Trusts and Health Authorities (Debts)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department collects on (a) debts owed to and (b) bad debts written off by (i) trusts and (ii) health authorities. [30426]

Mr. Horam: The Department collects annual returns from each trust and health authority. Included in these returns is the total debtors for each body analysed in accordance with the current generally accepted accounting principles. Unaudited high level analyses are also collected in the year for management purposes.

Prior to the 1995–96 annual returns trusts did not separately analyse bad debts written off. The 1995–96 annual returns will show bad debts and claims abandoned analysed by private patients, overseas visitors and others.

Prior to the 1995–96 annual returning health authorities analysed bad debts and claims abandoned by private in-patients, private non resident patients, overseas visitors, Road Traffic Act claims and other. The 1995–96 annual returns will show the same analysis as trusts.

Health Services (Private Contractors)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which services previously provided by regional health authorities have been won by private contractors; and if he will list the contractors. [30430]

Mr. Horam: There is no information available centrally on all services previously provided by regional health authorities. The table lists the former regional health authority trading agencies which are known to have been transferred to the private sector since 1989.

Patients (Discharge from NHS Care)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department collates on patients who refuse discharge from NHS care. [30428]

Mr. Bowis: None.

Health Authorities and Trusts

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many NHS trusts have (a) a chairman, (b) a chief executive and (c) a board of directors; [30250]

(2) how many NHS health authorities have (a) a chairman, (b) a chief executive and (c) a board of directors. [30251]

Mr. Malone: All 429 national health service trusts and 100 NHS health authorities have chairmen and chief executive posts, and they all have a board of executive and non-executive directors.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information his Department collates on management and administrative spending by individual trusts and health authorities. [30429]

Mr. Malone: For national health service trusts, information is collated on management and management consultancy spending and non-clinical administration spending as defined by the Audit Commission and circulated to trusts under circular FDL(95)32. For health authorities, information is collated on health authority costs as defined in circular FDL(96)20. Copies of FDL(95)32 and FDL(96)20 will be placed in the Library.

Consultants

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 14 May, Official Report, column 419, what information his Department collates about consultants. [30438]

Mr. Malone: The annual medical work force census gathers data, as at 30 September each year, on consultant vacancies by specialty. These refer to posts which were vacant for whatever reason on the actual day of collection, including, for example, vacant posts in the process of being filled.

Beta Interferon

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in which health authorities trials were conducted on the effectiveness of the drug beta interferon for sufferers of multiple sclerosis; on how many patients; and over what period. [30313]

Mr. Malone: Such information is confidential. Section 118 of the Medicines Act 1968 precludes the disclosure of confidential information received in pursuance of the Act.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list those authorities which have (a) agreed and (b) refused to prescribe beta interferon to MS sufferers who are suitably fit to receive it; [30314]

(2) what guidelines have been issued to health authorities regarding the prescription of the drug beta interferon to MS sufferers. [30315]

Mr. Malone: Executive letter (95)/97 issued to health authorities in November 1995 suggested that, where it is clinically appropriate to prescribe beta-interferon to treat multiple sclerosis, it should be prescribed by hospital neurologists. The guidance was accompanied by clinical advice from the Standing Medical Advisory Committee. Decisions about prescribing in individual cases are a matter for clinical judgment.

Health Authorities (Efficiency Targets)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many health authorities have failed to meet their efficiency index targets in each of the last two years. [29669]

Mr. Horam [holding answer 16 May 1996]: 1993–94 and 1994–95 are the last two years for which final figures are available. The national efficiency index targets were applied at regional health authority level for these years and they all achieved them.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. Steen: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what account was taken of the place of residence of the individual granted legal aid in January 1996 (reference 06936J). [30039]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: None. Legal aid is available for most matters justiciable in the courts of England and Wales, subject to the statutory tests of eligibility.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 21 May. [29028]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 21 May. [29029]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Hawk Aircraft

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will arrange the withdrawal of (a) export licences and (b) export guarantees issued by the Export Credits Guarantee Department in relation to the supply to India by British Aerospace of Hawk aircraft and the transfer of technology enabling the production of Hawk aircraft in India; and if he will make a statement; [30145]

(2) if he will make representations to British Aerospace urging to cancel any agreement with the Government of India concerning the supply of Hawk aircraft and the transfer of technology enabling India to manufacture Hawk aircraft; and if he will make a statement. [30144]

The Prime Minister: No. I have nothing further to add to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade on 15 May, Official Report columns 942–43.

WPC Yvonne Fletcher

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what action Her Majesty's Government have taken in the case of WPC Yvonne Fletcher, in relation to the statement of Colonel George Styles, Professor Hugh Thomas, and Home Office pathologist, Professor Bernard Knight, since the Adjournment debate on 8 May. [29290]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The investigation of crime is a matter for the police. As my right hon. Friend the Minister of State at the Home Department made clear to the House on 8 May, the Metropolitan police are aware of the television programme to which the hon. Member refers, and are reviewing its contents as part of their continuing investigation into the murder of WPC Yvonne Fletcher.

Abortion

Mr. Alton: To ask the Prime Minister if he will extend the conscience clause of the Abortion Act 1967 to non-NHS employees affected by abortion procedures. [30236]

The Prime Minister: The Government always encourage employers to give due consideration to their employees' beliefs and feelings, and to operate fair and objective disciplinary procedures. It has been a longstanding convention that the Government do not initiate change in legislation relating to abortion. It is open to Members of both Houses to introduce proposals for parliamentary consideration.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Correspondence

Mr. Dixon: To ask the Attorney-General if he will publish in the Official Report his letter to the hon. Member for Jarrow of 10 May. [29729]

The Attorney-General: No. I have, however, placed in the Libraries of the House a copy of the letter to which the hon. Member refers.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum and Immigration Bill

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 7 May, Official Report, column 45, how many respondents to the consultation on the Asylum and Immigration Bill (a) were in favour of the measures and how many against, (b) mentioned costs or burdens to business, (c) objected to the checking of documents other than national insurance and (d) suggested that compliance costs would be higher than those indicated in the compliance cost assessment. [29964]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 17 May 1996]: A summary of 67 responses to the consultation document on the prevention of illegal working was made available to the House before report stage of the Asylum and Immigration Bill. It indicates that

Fifteen respondents indicated either support or opposition. Of these four respondents actively supported the particular proposals whereas 11 expressed clear opposition to the principle of employers making any checks on their new employees;

Twenty-seven respondents commented on costs or burdens to business in response to a specific question on compliance costs. Fifteen respondents suggested that compliance costs would be higher than those indicated in the compliance cost assessment. Ten said that they expected no, or very minimal, compliance costs and two indicated that in their view the assessment seemed reasonable.

Three respondents suggested that national insurance numbers should provide the sole defence for employers. Twenty-one respondents indicated that the checking of documents such as foreign passports would be more complicated or onerous, although five suggested that such checking should not be too difficult if written guidance and a telephone helpline were available.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his Department estimates will be the initial and annual cost per small firm of the implementation of clause 8 of the Asylum and Immigration Bill. [29963]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 17 May 1996]: The compliance cost assessment prepared last November estimated that the non-current costs of clause 8 will be £13,524,800. For a firm with under 100 employees non-recurrent costs were estimated to be £10.70. It was estimated that the total recurrent costs for all employers might be up to £11,451,200 or less than 68p per employee per annum, but no assessment was made of the proportion of those costs which might fall to small firms.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the cost to business of clause 8 of the Asylum and Immigration Bill; how much it will cost each year; and what estimate he has made of the cost to businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29950]

Miss Widdecombe: The compliance cost assessment prepared last November estimated that the non-recurrent costs of clause 8 will be £13,524,800. For a firm with under 100 employees non-recurrent costs were estimated to be £10.70. It was estimated that the total recurrent costs for all employers might be up to £11,451,200 or less than 68p per employee per annum. No assessment was made of the proportion of the recurrent costs which might fall to firms of the sizes mentioned.

Illegal Working Helpline

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment his Department has made of the cost of the proposed helpline on illegal working; how many people will staff the helpline; and when it will begin. [29952]

Miss Widdecombe: Details of how the helpline will operate are currently under consideration. Full information about the facility will be given to employers in the written guidance to be issued in due course.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has carried out into the ease with which small employers can identify the documents required under clause 8 of the Asylum and Immigration Bill. [29948]

Miss Widdecombe: In our consultation document, we asked respondents, including representatives of small employers, to comment on this point.

Race Relations

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the funding arrangements after March 1997 for projects funded by his Office under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966; for what reasons there has been a delay in the announcement; and when he expects to be able to notify local education authorities of the arrangements. [29853]

Mr. Kirkhope: The funding position from April 1997 remains under consideration. I expect to be able to let local authorities have more information shortly.

Crimes Against Children (National Registers)

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will establish a national register of persons convicted of offences of a violent nature against children; [30423]

(2) if he will establish a national register of persons convicted of offences of a sexual nature against children. [30422]

Mr. Maclean: The national criminal records contain details of all those convicted of offences of a violent or sexual nature against children. In order to strengthen these arrangements, the Government are considering suggestions that convicted sex offenders should be required by law to notify the police of any changes of address. We plan very shortly to issue a consultation paper which will canvass these and other measures to improve public protection against sex offenders.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements exist under Home Office guidelines for unsolicited communication to local authority (a) social service, (b) education and (c) youth services departments of the termination of employment of those persons convicted of sexual and or violent offences against children. [30424]

Mr. Maclean: The arrangements under which the police report convictions of employees to local authorities are set out in Home Office circular HOG 45/86 a copy of which is in the Library. it is for the local authority concerned to decide on the action which it wishes to take.

Live Animal Experiments

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he proposes to take to increase public scrutiny of project licence applications for experiments on live animals. [30374]

Mr. Sackville: None. The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 prevents disclosure of confidential information.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many small animals were bred in medical schools in the London area for research purposes over the past five years for which figures are available. [30373]

Mr. Sackville: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he proposes to increase the publicity given to procedures adopted by the Home Office inspectors overseeing experiments in live animals. [30375]

Mr. Sackville: Public information is already available in the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, the guidance to that Act, and the annual statistics published by the Home Office.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the eligibility criteria for appointment to the Animal Procedures Committee; and how many lay-persons are included in the current membership. [30376]

Mr. Sackville: The eligibility criteria for appointment to the Animal Procedures Committee are set out in section 19 of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. The current membership consists of nine scientists and veterinary surgeons, two academic lawyers, one academic philosopher and four animal welfarists.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has, in relation to the Europol convention, to appoint the data protection registrar to (a) the national supervisory body and (b) the joint supervisory body; and if he will list the countries which do not submit disputes concerning the convention to the Court of Justice of the European Communities. [29691]

Mr. Maclean: Officials are in discussion with the data protection registrar over a number of aspects of the Europol convention and its implementation. These include the designation of the national supervisory body, members or representatives of which will comprise the United Kingdom delegation on the joint supervisory body.

The Europol convention is not yet in force. On signing the convention, 14 member states made a declaration that they intended to refer to the Court of Justice disputes between them that were not resolved by the Council. The United Kingdom did not make such a declaration.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the implications of the Europol convention for the Data Protection Act 1984 in respect of powers of access of the Data Protection Registrar. [29693]

Mr. Maclean: Ratification of the convention will not require any amendment to the Data Protection Act 1984. Officials are discussing with the data protection registrar practical aspects of its implementation.

Criminal Records

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to come forward with proposals to allow for wider access to criminal records; if these proposals will include proposals to stop enforced subject access under the Data Protection Act 1984; and if he will make a statement. [29701]

Mr. Maclean: The Government expect to publish a White Paper setting out our proposals for new arrangements for access to criminal record checks within the next few months.

Police National Computer

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to include drink-drive offences on the Phoenix database on the police national computer. [30668]

Mr. Maclean: The police will begin to record drink drive offences on Phoenix from 1 June. This will allow the police, for the first time, to have access to records of drink drive offences dealt with in forces other than their own. Such offences include driving or being in charge of a vehicle when under the influence of drink or drugs and failing to provide a specimen of breath when required to do so.

Fire Safety Legislation

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the interdepartmental review of fire safety legislation and enforcement and on the implementation of the general fire safety aspects of the EC framework and workplace directives. [30669]

Mr. Sackville: The review was established to examine what scope there might be for rationalising relevant legislation and enforcement arrangements whilst maintaining or improving standards of fire safety. It found that there were overlaps in present legislation and enforcement arrangements which could impose burdens on business and create uncertainty. Consultation on the report showed that while there was general agreement that existing legislation should be simplified and made more coherent, there was no consensus on what precisely should be done to effect those improvements.

In the light of the consultation exercise we have decided:

- that fire safety should, in general, be treated separately in legislation and that its enforcement should rest principally with fire authorities;
- that the outstanding fire safety elements of the European Community framework and workplace directives will be implemented by regulations to be made under the European Communities Act 1972; we believe that the minimum safety standards required by the directives broadly reflect the safety standards required by existing legal obligations on employers and therefore that the good employer has nothing to fear from the proposed regulations;
- that monitoring, control and supervision of the fire safety aspects of the risk assessment and of the other actions that the regulations require employers to take will be the responsibility of fire authorities;
- that section 9A of the Fire Precautions Act 1971 will be disapplied by the regulations to the extent its provisions overlap with the specific requirements of the regulations;
- that the powers provided under section 5 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 will be applied to the enforcement of the Fire Precautions Act 1971, to improve further the fairness, transparency and consistency of the supervision and control of the Act's requirements;
- to consult, by July, on widening the scope for fire authorities to exempt premises which do not constitute a high risk from the need to have a fire certificate;
- to consult on a revised fire certification system based on risk assessment to target it more accurately at premises where there is a high risk of loss of fire from life;
- to invite the Health and Safety Commission to review in parallel the operation of the Fire Certificates (Special Premises) Regulations 1976 (for which it has policy responsibility);
- to commence consultation in June 1996 on the elimination of overlaps between the physical fire standards in national legislation and fire safety provisions in local acts and byelaws;
- to review physical fire standards and codes of practice to ensure greater consistency and simplification for business. We shall commence consultation in the autumn;
- to bring forward proposals by the summer to amend the building regulations to cover certain physical fire precautions currently covered by fire certification to provide a "one-stop shop" for developers;
- to clarify the respective responsibilities of building control and fire authorities with the aim of streamlining current arrangements to help reduce costs for developers;

We are issuing today for consultation draft regulations intended to give effect to our remaining obligations under the European Community framework and workplace directives. The draft regulations will be made under the European Communities Act 1972. The draft aims to avoid imposing unnecessary burdens and so, where appropriate, follows as closely as possible the language of the directives to ensure that the regulations go no further than strictly required. The duty imposed on all employers by the directives to conduct a risk assessment for their workplaces has generally been implemented by the Management of Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1992. Employers will be able to carry out the fire safety element of the risk assessment either as an integral part of an overall risk assessment, or may undertake it separately.

Where an employer fails to comply with any duty in relation to fire safety, the fire authority may apply to the courts for an order requiring compliance or if the breach is a serious one, may issue an enforcement notice. If the breach is deliberate, reckless and is serious, the employer can be prosecuted.

The powers provided under section 5 of the Deregulation and Contracting Out Act 1994 will be applied to the Fire Precautions Act 1971 by means of a statutory instrument to be laid before Parliament by the end of 1996 and we shall identify other fire safety legislation where these powers could apply. The proposed new regulations to give effect to our Community obligations will also incorporate the principles underlying these powers.

We intend that rationalisation and simplification of the fire safety regime to reduce burdens on business while maintaining necessary safeguards, should be a continuing process. Subject to an analysis of the costs and benefits, we will be looking for further opportunities to rationalise both law and practice.

Copies of the consultation document, which includes the draft regulations, are being placed in the Library.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the actions taken by Her Majesty's Government to support efforts to initiate negotiations on a fissile material cut-off treaty as cited in paragraph 146 of the statement on the Defence estimates, column 3223; and if he will make a statement on the progress achieved to date in these negotiations. [29979]

Mr. David Davis: We supported the mandate agreed at the conference on disarmament in Geneva in March 1995 for an ad hoc committee to work on a fissile material cut-off treaty banning the future production of fissile material for nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices. We regret that it has not yet proved possible to start work on this issue. We continue to urge all members of the CD to agree to the early establishment of an ad hoc committee to begin negotiations.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list, for each of his Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30117]

Mr. Hanley: There has been no market testing of the services provided by FCO agencies.

Council of Europe

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the British ambassador to the Council of Europe, on the proposals of the council of Europe Assembly, to up-date the computerisation of its services. [29997]

Mr. David Davis: None so far, but the Council of Europe secretariat is elaborating a package of proposals to go into the 1997 budget. These proposals will draw on the report by the hon. Member and will be discussed with representatives of Governments in Strasbourg. Costs and priorities will need to be borne in mind during any such discussions.

EU Membership Application

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy in respect of each applicant for membership of the EU. [30003]

Mr. David Davis: The Government welcome the prospect of EU enlargement and look forward to the applicant countries joining as soon as they are ready. We believe that each applicant should be treated on its merits. Applicants will have to meet the criteria for membership set out by the Copenhagen European Council in June 1993.

Galapagos Islands

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions the Minister for Overseas Development has had with the Government of Ecuador about the shooting of female goats on those parts of the Alcedo area of the Galapagos Islands where giant tortoises breed. [28908]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: There have been no discussions between the ODA and the Ecuadorean Government about shooting goats in the Galapagos Islands. The British ambassador in Quito recently visited the islands to see the problem caused by feral goats on Alcedo which threaten the survival of the population of giant tortoises. The ambassador has offered to donate £5,000 from the heads of mission gift scheme to the national park and to the Darwin Foundation for their programme to protect the tortoises. He is also examining the possibility of a contribution to the goat eradication programme from a FCO fund for small environmental projects.

General Affairs Council

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU General Affairs Council on 13 to 14 May. [29656]

Mr. David Davis: The "A" points in document 7127/96, which will be placed in the Libraries of the House as soon as it is available, were approved.

The presidency noted the resolutions adopted by European Parliament in document 6216/96, PE-RE 33 and drew attention to Nos. 8 (co-operation on EU fisheries with Morocco), 23 (outcome of Turin European Council), 24 (central and eastern Europe integration into internal market), 30 (Baltic sea co-operation) and 32 (economic and monetary union and social cohesion).

The Council heard a progress report from the chairman of the consultative commission on racism and xenophobia, Jean Khan, about the comission's study on a possible EU observatory on racism and xenophobia.

The Council reached political agreement on draft negotiating directives for a new EU-Mexico agreement. The Commission also presented draft negotiating directives for new agreements between the Community and Cambodia and Laos; and updated agreements between the Community and Bangladesh and Pakistan.

The Commission gave a brief report on progress in the negotiations for Euro-Med agreements between the EU and Egypt, Jordan and Lebanon; progress towards opening negotiations with Algeria; and the Commission's exploratory contacts with the Palestinian authority and Syria. The Council decided to reconsult the European Parliament on the text of the MEDA regulation.

The presidency reported on progress in the middle east peace process and Ministers had a meeting in the margins of the Council with Lebanese Prime Minister Hariri. Ministers also discussed reconstruction aid for the Lebanon.

EU high representative Carl Bildt briefed Ministers about the current situation in Bosnia. Mostar administrator Casado briefed the Council on the Mostar elections. Ministers also had a brief discussion on Albania.

The Council agreed the EU-Russia action plan and adopted conclusions reaffirming its support for the reform process, looking forward to free and fair elections, and restating EU willingness to take part in observation of them.

The Council endorsed conclusions on preparation for the World Trade Organisation ministerial conference in Singapore in December.

The Council also adopted conclusions on Niger, foreseeing progressive resumption of EU cooperation, subject to a review at the Council on 10 June of the results of the 12 May referendum and the lifting of the ban on political parties; and on Liberia, expressing concern at the humanitarian situation and affirming EU willingness to provide humanitarian aid.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary urged EU partners to agree to a relaxation of the ban on the export of gelatine, tallow and semen.

The second substantive ministerial meeting of the intergovernmental conference also took place on 13 May. Ministers had before them a presidency note, CONF 3847/96, which has been deposited in the Library of the House, which raised two broad issues for discussion: flexibility of the Union and the efficiency and balance of the institutions. On the former, Ministers considered the desirability of more flexible structures in the Union and whether treaty provisions were necessary to provide a framework for this. On the latter, Ministers considered a range of institutional issues, including the size of the Commission, the scope and weighting of qualified majority voting, the role of the European Parliament and the European Court of Justice, in particular in the light of future enlargement.

The ministerial session was preceded by an exchange of views with the European President and two representatives of the European Parliament.

There were association Councils with Malta and Cyprus on 14 May, followed by a joint structured dialogue meeting and lunch.

Gibraltar

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last visited Gibraltar; and if he will make a statement about his policy towards that country. [29843]

Mr. David Davis: I visited Gibraltar on 7 and 8 November 1995. I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) on 14 December 1995 at columns 753–54.

Bosnia

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met Mr. Carl Bildt; and if he will make a statement about the progress of the reconstruction fo Bosnia. [29844]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary last met Carl Bildt at the EU General Affairs Council on 13 May.

At the Brussels donors conference on 12 and 13 April, $1.25 billion was pledged for reconstruction projects for the remainder of 1996. United Kingdom bilateral programmes, aimed at restoring power and water supplies to both entities, are well under way.

Croatia

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met President Tudjamn; and if he will make a statement about his policy towards the progress of democracy in Croatia. [29845]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary met President Tudgjman on 19 September 1995 in Zagreb.

We continue to encourage the Croatian Government to bring about greater democracy in Croatia so as to achieve stronger political and economic relations with Europe and its institutions.

Diplomatic Representation

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries in the continent of (a) Asia, (b) Africa, (c) America, (d) Europe and (e) Australasia in which the United Kingdom has diplomatic representation indicating the level of representation, and by number and grade his Department's staff serving in these countries. [29846]

Mr. Hanley: The information requested is published in "H.M. Diplomatic Service Overseas Reference List", a copy of which is in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries which are members of the Untied Nations in which the United Kingdom has no diplomatic representation. [29847]

Mr. Hanley: The member states of the United Nations in which the United Kingdom has no resident diplomatic representations are listed in table 1. Those states in which an office has been opened but has no UK-based resident staff are listed in table 2.

Albania

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the progress of democracy in Albania; and if he will make a statement about his policy towards that country. [29849]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The British Government have good relations with the Government of Albania. We believe that Albania has made good progress towards greater democracy since the fall of communism in 1992.

We are contributing to the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe mission to observe the forthcoming Albanian elections.

Former Warsaw Pact Countries

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the likely date of the accession to the North Atlantic treaty of members of the former Warsaw pact. [29850]

Mr. David Davis: NATO has yet to decide when to invite countries from the former Warsaw pact to join the alliance. NATO Foreign Ministers decided in December 1995 to consider the way forward at their meeting this December.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30058]

Mr. Hanley: We are not directly involved in domestic deregulation policy and therefore have no deregulation unit or staff.

British Council

Mr. Renton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance the Government propose to make available to the British Council to help with its restructuring costs and to avoid overseas port closures. [30511]

Mr. Rifkind: I have today written to the chairman of the British Council informing him that my Department is prepared to meet 80 per cent. of the actual costs of redundancies among its grant in aid funded UK appointed staff this financial year. I propose to finance this from the Overseas Development Administration's contingency reserve. Since this reserve is higher than originally planned, this can be accommodated without affecting our ability to respond to foreseeable emergencies or reducing planned aid programmes. That part of the funding which serves aid objectives will be provided directly through the ODA vote. For the balance, I shall be seeking parliamentary authority later this year to make the appropriate transfer between the ODA and British Council votes.

In my letter to the chairman I have also assured him that an additional £5 million in 1997–98 and £9 million in 1998–99 will be made available to the Council from within my departmental programme in order to avoid closures of British Council offices overseas to help sustain their programmes in priority countries and to contribute towards their continuing redundancy costs.

The British Council will of course be continuing with their existing programme of efficiency savings.

DEFENCE

Bosnia and Croatia

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what has been the total cost to date to his Department of renting property for use as British bases as part of the implementation force operations in (a) Bosnia and (b) Croatia; [29672]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 26 January, Official Report, column 468, if he will update the information on charges for the bases currently used by British members of the implementation force operating in (a) Bosnia and (b) Croatia. [29824]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 17 May 1996]: A list of the major sites in Bosnia and Croatia currently occupied by British forces is as follows, together with the monthly charges where these have been established.

Between January and April this year, my Department spend £665,000 and £688,000 on leases for all sites occupied in Bosnia and Croatia respectively.

Bosnia	Monthly charge £
Banja Luka—factory	38,000
Bosanski Petrovac—garage	5,000
Bugojno—factory	Not yet known
Glamoc—sawmill and factory	8,000
Gornji Vakuf—2 factories	44,000
Jajce—factory	6,000
Kljuc—depot	Not yet known
Krupa—factory	3,000
Kupres—various sites	34,000
Mrkonjic Grad—2 factories, sawmill and dam	Not yet known
Sanski Most—factory	8,000
Sipovo—3 factories, hotel and sawmill	Not yet known
Tomislavgrad–warehouse and other sites	42,000
Vitez—Bulk Fuel Installation (BFI) and school	3,000
Croatia
Split—3 factories and warehouse	243,000
Split—North Port and warehouse facilities	Not yet known
Trogir (near split)–Divulje Barracks	No charge

Royal Navy Wrecks

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his Department's policy on the recovery of munitions and other weapons from sunken Royal Navy ships; and what environmental monitoring is undertaken at such sites where it has not proved possible to recover military material. [29980]

Mr. Soames: Our policy, in normal circumstances, is to leave munitions and other weapons on Royal Navy wrecks undisturbed. However, recovery may be considered where sensitive technology is involved, or where there is a risk that the munitions may fall into the hands of terrorists, criminals or unfriendly foreign powers.

Should munitions be disturbed in some way, consideration may be given to their recovery on a case-by-case basis, taking account, among other things, of the extent of any danger to the public, the potential risk to those who would be involved in the recovery operation, and technical feasibility.

As current scientific evidence shows that, provided they remain undisturbed, such sites do not present a significant risk to safety, human health or the marine environment, my Department does not undertake environmental monitoring of wrecks in which there is remaining military material.

Wine and Spirits Stocks

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what (a) number of bottles and (b) value of stocks of (i) wine and (ii) spirits are held by (1) the Army, (2) the Royal Navy and (3) the Royal Air Force; and if he will make a statement. [29999]

Mr. Soames: The only stocks of publicly funded wines and spirits held by the armed forces are for use in cooking, as recipe ingredients. Details of the stocks held for this purpose are not maintained centrally. Spirits can be authorised for issue in special circumstances, but these are purchased only when required. Stock levels of wines and spirits purchased with non-public funds are a matter for individual messes and no central records are held.

Polaris

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated cost of decommissioning the Polaris system; and from which subheads of which votes these funds will be taken. [29871]

Mr. Soames: Details of all costs associated with decommissioning or disposal of equipments and facilities connected with the Polaris programme are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The cost of the defuelling, de-equipping and day-up procedure for the four submarines is expected to total some £61 million; to be attributed to vote 2 subhead 2A21.

Disposal of rocket motors and propellant is expected to cost some £2 million; to be attributed to vote 2 subhead 2F2.

It is not our practice to reveal costs associated with the warhead.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Competitiveness White Paper

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what date he expects to publish the third competitiveness White Paper. [29955]

Mr. Freeman: The Government plan to publish the third competitiveness White Paper in mid-June.

Deregulation

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the deregulation orders which passed into law, indicating which of them affect firms with under (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees. [29959]

Mr. Freeman: The deregulation orders which have passed into law are:

The Deregulation (Greyhound Racing) Order

The Deregulation (Building Societies) Order

The Deregulation (Salmon Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1868) Order

The Deregulation (Special Hours Certificates) Order

The Deregulation (Fair Trading Act 1973) (Amendment) Merger Reference Time Limits) Order

The Deregulation (Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976) (Amendment) (Time Limits) Order

The Deregulation (Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976) (Amendment) (Variation of Exempt Agreements) Order

The Deregulation (Length of the School Day) Order

The Deregulation (Long Pull) Order

The first four orders are sectoral measures intended to assist all firms in those sectors, regardless of their size. The next three orders amend competition legislation and, again, could potentially benefit any firm regardless of size.

Civil Service (Ethnic Monitoring)

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the progress of ethnic monitoring within the civil service. [29929]

Mr. Freeman: Equality of opportunity in employment is vital to the effectiveness of the civil service and to good race relations. Ethnic origin monitoring data provides a powerful tool for identifying where barriers exist for the recruitment and advancement of ethnic minority staff. Since 1989 departments and agencies have been working to an agreed code of practice on collecting this information from entrants and existing staff, and they continue to do so. The programme for action on race, introduced by the Cabinet Office in 1990, provides a strategic framework for progress towards race equality in Departments and agencies, which includes monitoring. Regular reports on progress as regards equal opportunities across the civil service are published by the Cabinet Office and placed in the Commons Library. In the year to April 1995, the ethnic minority representation across the civil service rose to 5.4 per cent., which compares with 4.9 per cent. in the economically active population. Information for April 1996 is currently being compiled and will become available later in the year.

Privatised Utilities (Civil Servants)

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many (a) serving civil servants and (b) retired civil servants have been appointed to the boards of privatised utilities. [30254]

Mr. Freeman: There are currently no serving civil servants who are non-executive directors of any privatised utilities on the list of non-executive directors supplied to the Office of Public Service by Departments. Comprehensive information of this kind on retired civil servants is not held centrally and could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Nigeria

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the effects of Commonwealth sanctions on Nigeria; and if he will make a statement. [29848]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Sir J. Lester) on 9 May 1996 at column 211. If Nigeria does not respond positively to the Commonwealth ministerial action group's invitation to dialogue by the end of May, the group has recommended that Commonwealth countries adopt a package of measures broadly similar to those already taken by the EU.

Somaliland

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has evaluated and what contacts he maintains with representatives of the self-styled Republic of Somaliland; what is the position of Her Majesty's Government with respect to that regime; and if he will make a statement. [29968]

Mr. Hanley: Our embassy in Addis Ababa regularly reports on its contacts with the administration in north-west Somalia. Our position remains that the future of that region must be for the Somalis as a whole to determine.

Oslo Conference (20/20 Initiative)

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by whom the United Kingdom was represented at the Oslo conference in April to try to consolidate implementation of the 20/20 initiative; and if he will make a statement. [30123]

Mr. Hanley: The United Kingdom was represented at the April Oslo conference on the 20/20 initiative by the ODA's principal finance officer, chief social development adviser, and an ODA economic adviser.

The Oslo meeting agreed that donors should be prepared to support well-considered plans for enhanced spending on basic social programmes, and recognised that it was now for developing countries to put forward such proposals, initially through consultative groups and round table meetings.

WALES

Nursery Voucher Scheme

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has had from organisations and individuals about the implementation of the nursery voucher scheme; and how many replies have been sent. [29332]

Mr. Richards: In addition to a number of petitions, some 3,300 representations have been received to date, the vast majority continuing to consist of printed pro forma letters and postcards; approximately 85 per cent. have been sent a reply and the remainder will have a response as soon as possible.

Out-of-town Superstores

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to limit the spread of superstores in out-of-town locations in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [29610]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend has today issued revised planning guidance recognising the importance of town centres and encouraging retail development within those centres rather than at out-of-town sites.

I have arranged for copies of the revised planning guidance to be placed in the Library of the House.

Dental Services

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many patients have contacted each family health services authority asking for help in finding a dentist in the period since December 1993; and if he will make a statement. [29602]

Mr. Richards: According to information supplied by Welsh family health services authorities, the following numbers of patients contacted them between the beginning of December 1993 and the end of March 1996:

Clwyd: 6,821
Dyfed: 4,533
Gwent: 3,352
Gwynedd: 15,478
Mid Glamorgan: 584
Powys: 2,466
South Glamorgan: 2,814
West Glamorgan: 221.

The Welsh Office has made £3 million available for a unique initiative aimed at addressing the needs of those areas where patients may have difficulty in registering with a dentist close to their homes. The initiative demonstrates the Government's determination to address the dental manpower needs of Wales.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many family health authorities have been unable to provide emergency dental services in the period since December 1993; and if he will make a statement. [29600]

Mr. Richards: According to information supplied by Welsh family health service authorities, one authority was unable to provide emergency dental services for unregistered patients during the period December 1993 to 1 July 1995. Since 2 July 1995, all authorities have been able to do so.

General dental practitioners are required by their terms of service to provide emergency cover for their registered patients.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many continuing care dental patients have been de-registered; how many dentists have de-registered patients in each year since 1992; and if he will make a statement. [29612]

Mr. Richards: From the information supplied by family health service authorities since August 1992, the number of patients in Wales who have been deregistered is as follows:

	Adults	Children	Total
1992[1]	8,167	15	8,182
1993	9,138	75	9,213
1994	20,172	53	20,225
1995	18,300	67	18,367
1996[2]	1,750	9	1,759
Totals	57,527	219	57,746

[1] 1 August to 31 December.
[2] To 31 March.

These are cumulative figures and do not indicate how many of those patients subsequently registered with another dentist.

The number of dentists deregistering patients in any fortnightly period has varied between 0 and 38.

This information was supplied for management purposes only and is not statistically validated.

Statistics published by the Dental Practice Board indicate that, at the end of December 1995, the number of registered patients in Wales was 38,194 higher than it was at the end of June 1992.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many dentists have given written notice to have their name removed from dental lists since 1992; and if he will make a statement. [29597]

Mr. Richards: Information supplied by Welsh family health services authorities indicates that 121 dentists gave written notice to have their names removed from dental lists between 1 August 1992 and 31 March 1996. During the same period, 265 dentists joined the authorities' dental lists.

This information was supplied for management purposes only and has not been statistically validated.

Press Office (Expenditure)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total spent by his press office in each year since 1992; and if he will make a statement. [29595]

Mr. Hague: The total spent by my press office, including running costs, is as follows:

1992–93: £360,215

1993–94: £418,370

1994–95: £406,150

1995–96: £395,531.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30068]

Mr. Hague: The Welsh Office deregulation unit is responsible for promoting and monitoring progress with deregulation activities which are undertaken by policy divisions across the Department. The 1996–97 budget for the unit, which is part of the Department's business services division, is £19,140 for running costs plus £10,000 programme. The unit consists of one higher executive officer, 0.75 whole-time equivalent.

Welsh Health Common Services Authority

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Welsh Health Common Services Authority concerning the termination of negotiations with Exel Logistics for the material managements contract under the market testing procedure; [30434]

(2) what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Welsh Health Common Services Authority concerning the award of the materials management contract under the market testing procedure to the in-house team; and if he will make a statement. [30433]

Mr. Hague: None. My Department was kept informed of developments in the negotiations between the authority and Exel Logistics which led to the decision not to award the contract to the company.

Medical Treatment Centres

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 2 February, Official Report, column 980, if he will list the number of procedures available in 1996–97 in each of the treatment centres, indicating the numbers allocated to each health authority. [30408]

Mr. Hague: The number of procedures available in 1996–97 at each of the treatment centres is as follows together with each health authority's allocation:

Health authority	Surgical centre	Ophthalmic centre	Orthopaedic centre
North Wales	0	0	39
Dyfed Powys	190	200	62
Gwent	200	340	60
Bro Taf	310	245	59
Morgannwyg	360	295	44
Total	[1]1,060	[1]1,080	264

[1] These figures were transposed in my previous answer of 2 February, Official Report, column 980.

Ambulance Service

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) when the consultation period will end on the Wales ambulance policy advisory group revision to ambulance service configurations in Wales; [30378]

(2) if he will place in the Library a copy of the Wales ambulance policy advisory group consultation paper on ambulance service configurations in Wales. [30377]

Mr. Richards: I have not received any application to reconfigure ambulance services. If such an application is received the document would be subject to public consultation and a copy placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the NHS ambulance trusts in Wales, and those ambulance services which form part of a NHS trust in Wales, their budgets for each of the last five years and the current financial year, the number of staff and the number of ambulances in each case. [30380]

Mr. Richards: I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Medical Staff (Suspensions)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 6 February, Official Report, column 98, how the notification procedure for consultants suspended over six months applies to those (a) already suspended prior to 1 April 1995 and (b) suspended after that date. [30409]

Mr. Hague: NHS trusts and health authorities were asked to ensure that the guidance issued on 7 April 1995 is taken into account in drawing up local procedures for handling all suspensions of hospital and community medical and dental staff.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the membership and terms of reference of the Wales ambulance policy advisory group; and if he will make a statement. [30379]

Mr. Richards: The Welsh ambulance policy advisory group was set up by the ambulance trusts themselves. Details may be obtained from the group's current chief executive, Mr. S. Harrhy, chief executive, Mid Glamorgan Ambulance NHS trust.

Civil Service College

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with the director of the Civil Service College concerning departmental participation in courses on devolution; what training courses he has put in place for his staff in preparation for constitutional change; and if he will make a statement. [30435]

Mr. Hague: None.

TREASURY

Value Added Tax

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how Her Majesty's Customs and Excise calculates the risk of businesses not complying with VAT for the purpose of determining which businesses should receive an assurance visit. [29910]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 17 May 1996]: Customs use statistical methods to evaluate information on businesses and their likelihood to make errors. This provides the relative ranking of each business which is advised to local offices. Staff use this ranking together with local knowledge for the purpose of determining which business should receive an assurance visit.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the amount of (a) VAT and (b) excise duties that remained uncollected or written off for each of the last five years; and if he will estimate the amount that will be uncollected or written off for the next two years for the same categories. [29911]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 17 May 1996]: Write-off figures for 1995 have not yet been finalised. The value of VAT remitted or written off in the previous five calendar years was as follows:

1994: £550,464,000
1993: £742,376,00
1992: £745,773,000
1991: £515,335,000
1990: £212,715,000.

Excise write-off figures are consolidated with Customs figures. The value of Customs and other duties written off in the same five years was as follows:

1994: £1,713,000
1993: £2,138,000
1992: £844,000
1991: £733,000
1990: £1,020,000.

The level of write-off in the present and future years is dependent on external factors, such as the rate of insolvency. Customs expect that VAT debt will be contained within 2.3 per cent. of liability for 1995–96 and 1996–97.

EU Preliminary Budget

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals Her Majesty's Government put to the Council of Ministers of the EU with regard to deleting elements of non-compulsory expenditure from the draft preliminary budget for 1995–96. [30168]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government's policy is to scrutinise all expenditure, both compulsory and non-compulsory, during the annual EC budgetary process, and to seek reductions where appropriate. This was the case in the preparation of both the 1995 and 1996 Community budgets, as in other years.

Tax Complaints

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in how many cases in each year since 1993 the revenue adjudicator has found (a) wholly and (b) partly in favour of the complainant; and if he will make a statement. [29606]

Mr. Michael Jack: The table provides details of the number of complaints about the Inland Revenue which the adjudicator has upheld wholly, substantially or partially in the three years to 31 March 1996, the figures in parenthesis denoting the proportions of the total number of complaints reviewed during the years concerned:

Year	Substantially/wholly		Partially
1993–94	50	48 per cent.	15	14 per cent.
1994–95	98	26 per cent.	95	25 per cent.
1995–96	144	29 per cent.	92	19 per cent.
Total	292	30 per cent.	202	21 per cent.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many cases have been referred to the revenue adjudicator as complaints arising out of the taxpayers charter in each year since May 1993; and if he will make a statement. [29604]

Mr. Jack: The table shows the number of complaints about the Inland Revenue that the adjudicator received in the three years to 31 March 1996:

Year	Total received	Take up for full investigation
1993–94	1,615	308
1994–95	2,581	504
1995–96	2,500	470
Total	6,696	1,282

The 5,414 cases which she did not take up for full investigation were mainly ones where the complainant had not first tried to sort out their complaint through the Inland Revenue's own complaints system. In these cases, the adjudicator puts the complainant in touch with the right person in the Inland Revenue; and where necessary helps the complainant clarify the terms of the complaint. The adjudicator calls such cases "assistance cases".

Compliance Cost Assessments

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many compliance cost assessments were produced by his Department in 1995; and if he will place copies in the Library. [25270]

Mr. Jack [pursuant to his reply, 17 April 1996, c. 498]: I regret that the list that I gave inadvertently omitted 15 compliance cost assessments produced by the Building Societies Commission and the Friendly Societies Commission, both of which are responsible to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I apologise to the hon. Member for this oversight. The full list of 30 compliance cost assessments produced by the Chancellor's Departments in 1995 is given in the list. In each case, a copy of the assessment was placed in the Library at the time it was presented to Parliament.

EU Fraud

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what requests have been made by the Court of Auditors of the European Community to the European Commission to be consulted concerning (a) the drafting of any proposed regulation concerned with the expenditure and (b) amendments to current regulations in directives aimed at the prevention of irregularities and fraud. [29986]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Any correspondence between the Court and the Commission is a matter for the institutions in question.

The European Court of Auditors submitted in May 1995 a report to the "Reflection Group" containing their proposals for treaty changes in the context of the intergovernmental conference. The general position is that in the case of legislative proposals under article 209 the Commission is required to consult the court; in other cases consultation is optional. In its report, the court considered that (a) article 209 should be used as the legal basis for all legislation intended to lay down new financial regulations or to derogate from the financial regulation; and (b) that as regards optional consultation the court could be systematically consulted on any draft legislation which, on bases other than article 209, affects the Community's budgetary and financial mechanisms, especially regarding control. The intergovernmental conference is considering the court's comments.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans Her Majesty's Government have to avail themselves of each opportunity for officials or their agencies to conduct joint inquiries and activities with officials of the Commission of the European Communities under powers to be provided under the proposed regulation covering on-the-spot inspections and checks relating to any use of funds provided by the Community. [29987]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This will be an operational matter for the authorities in question. However, my expectation is that UK officials would normally exercise their right to accompany Commission officials.

Small Businesses

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29433]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 20 May 1996]: It is not possible to give this information as the Treasury does not distinguish between its suppliers on the basis of their number of employees. The Department's aim is to award contracts which offer the best value for money irrespective of the suppliers' size.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29448]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The information requested is not available as the Treasury does not distinguish between suppliers from the public and private sectors. However the total expenditure of the Department on goods and services during the year in question was £23.7 million.

Procurement Guidelines

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to ensure that the central unit for procurement's best practice guidelines cover large lead contractors which sub-contract to small and medium enterprises. [29957]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The central unit on procurement's best practice guidance covers prime contractors and their subcontractors. The provisions apply to all subcontractors, whether large or small.

The contractual relationships between prime contractors and their subcontractors is largely a matter for the contracting parties.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Key Stage 2 Test Papers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what procedures are in place to prevent the improper early opening and misuse of key stage 2 test papers. [29717]

Mr. Paice: Teachers have received clear advice about procedures in the "Key Stage 2 Assessment Arrangements 1996" booklet distributed by the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority to all participating schools. Headteachers are required to keep the test papers and the separately packaged mark schemes as confidential and stored securely from receipt in school until the day of the particular tests. Early opening of the tests is permissible for pupils with special requirements but specific permission has to be requested for pupils without a statement of special educational needs. In all cases it remains the headteachers' responsibility to ensure that the contents of the test papers are kept confidential.

Special Needs

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which local education authorities currently include a special educational needs factor in their local management of schools formulae based on a local SEN audit; and what is the comparative value of funds allocated for pupils through such a factor, according to the stage in the code of practice they have reached, for each local education authority for which information is available. [29903]

Mrs. Gillan: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Business Starts

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what new programmes she is introducing to enable people to start their own business. [29823]

Mr. Paice: The Department will continue to offer considerable help for unemployed people to set up in business through training for work and support for the Prince's Youth business trust.

Ethnic Minority Pupils

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to institute a comprehensive system for monitoring the achievement levels of pupils according to ethnic origin. [29755]

Mrs. Gillan: As I told the House on 21 November last year, we have introduced and are extending new arrangements to monitor the number of minority ethnic pupils and pupils for whom English is a second language in each maintained school. We also intend to obtain information about the progress of minority ethnic pupils in individual schools, by means of information gathered by Ofsted as part of its regular inspection cycle; and to undertake research as necessary, to look in greater depth at particular issues.

The Dearing review of 16–19 qualifications included a recommendation for work on developing a framework for national monitoring of candidate achievement by ethnic origin, which my right hon. Friend has remitted to the School Curriculum Authority and the National Council for Vocational Qualifications for further study and advice.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list for each of her Department's agencies what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30112]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Teachers' Pensions Agency market tested its teacher pensions payment services in 1994. Three year contracts beginning in April 1995 were awarded to:

i. The Office of HM Paymaster General (Paymaster Agency)—for the supply of a pensioner payment database;

ii. The Midland Bank plc—for the supply of banking services to support the payment of pensions; and

iii. The TPA itself—for the supply of customer services to answer enquiries from individual pensioners.

Responsibility for the Employment Service has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Robert Horne to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me, in the absence of the Chief Executive, to rely to your request for details of the Employment Service (ES) market testing programme.

The attached list sets out the ES services so far market tested, and the outcome in each case. Please note that, with the exception of Jobclubs, Employment Rehabilitation Centres and Disability Occupational Psychologists supporting Placing Assessment and Counselling Teams, all entries relate to internal ES corporate support services, rather than external services to clients.

I hope this is helpful.

Higher Education

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the members of the national committee of inquiry into higher education indicating in the case of those drawn from the business community how many people are employed in the business from which they are drawn. [30124]

Mr. Forth: The members are as listed. In the case of those drawn from the business community, the number of people employed in the business from which they are drawn is shown in brackets.

	Business
Sir Ron Dearing (Chairman)
Professor John Arbuthnott	Principal and Vice-Chancellor of the University of Strathclyde
Baroness Dean of Thornton le Fylde	(formerly Brenda Dean)
Ms Judith Evans	Director of Corporate Personnel, Sainsbury's (131,298)
Sir Ron Garrick	Managing Director and Chief Executive of Weir Group (6,913)
Sir Geoffrey Holland	Vice-Chancellor of the University of Exeter
Professor Diana Laurillard	Pro Vice-Chancellor (Technology Development) of the Open University
Mrs. P. A. Morris	Headteacher, The Blue School, Wells
Sir Ronald Oxburgh	Rector of Imperial College of Science, Technology and Medicine
Dr. David Potter	Chairman of Psion plc (491)

	Business
Sir George Quigley	Chairman of Ulster Bank (4,015)
Sir William Stubbs	Chief Executive of the Further Education Funding Council and Rector Designate of the London Institute
Sir Richard Sykes	Deputy Chairman and Chief Executive of Glaxo-Wellcome plc (47,189)
Professor David Watson	Director of the University of Brighton
Professor Sir David Weatherall	Regius Professor of Medicine at the University of Oxford
Professor Adrian Webb	Vice-Chancellor of the University of Glamorgan
Mr. Simon Wright	Education and Welfare Officer, Students Union, the University of Wales College of Cardiff

Universities and colleges are also employers in their own right.

Medical Students

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the number of (a) men and (b) women studying in medical schools in England and Wales. [29990]

Mr. Forth: In 1994–95, the numbers of students studying medicine in those universities in England and Wales with medical schools were 14,760 men and 14,961 women.

Feversham College, Bradford

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received in the current year concerning the granting of voluntary-aided status to Feversham college in Bradford; when her officials (a) last met representatives of the college and (b) last visited Bradford to meet college representatives; when she expects to take a decision on an application from the college for voluntary-aided status; and if she will make a statement. [30146]

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. Friend has received no representations in the current years. Officials of the Department met representatives of the college in Bradford on 14 May 1996. There is currently no application for voluntary aided status before my right hon. Friend but she will, of course, consider carefully and on their merits any proposals which come to her for a decision.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30063]

Mr. Forth: The departmental deregulation unit is part of the briefing unit, a division which also has various other functions. The staff who deal with deregulation as part of their duties consist of one grade 5—plus personal secretary—one grade 7, one higher executive officer, one executive officer and one administrative officer. The annual salary and general administrative costs attributable to deregulation functions are approximately £29,000. None of the current staff have been seconded from business. The grade 5 divisional manager has experience of secondment to the private sector.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 15 May, Official Report, column 460, how many firms there are with fewer than 50 employees in each region listed. [30436]

Mr. Paice: Estimates of the numbers of firms of different sizes for the United Kingdom are published in the DTI statistical bulletin "Small and Medium Sized Enterprise Statistics for the UK 1993".

A regional breakdown is not available, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

A copy of the publication is available in the Library.

TRANSPORT

DoA Ltd. (Liabilities)

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the continuing funding of DoA Ltd.'s liabilities to Strathclyde passenger transport executive. [30670]

Mr. Watts: My Department has given Strathclyde written assurances that DoA Ltd.'s obligations to the PTE under the deeds of assumption will be met. A minute dated 20 May has been laid before the House.

Drivers' Eyesight Tests

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has now received all replies from the relevant national authorities on eyesight requirements for lorry drivers, required by the second European directive on driving licences. 91/439/EEC; when a final decision will be made; and if he will make a statement. [31417]

Mr. Norris: Information has not yet been received from all national authorities. We are currently considering precisely how the new eyesight requirements should be implemented.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what reconsideration has been given to his earlier pronouncement about the abolition from 1 July 1996 of the rights of drivers who under previous United Kingdom regulations had obtained a bus or lorry licence by satisfying the then statutory or administrative eyesight requirements and whose eyesight had not since their last renewal deteriorated below those standards. [30414]

Mr. Norris: My right hon. Friend announced on 25 April at column 248 that implementation of some of the provisions of the Second EC directive on driving licences, including changes to eyesight requirements for driving lorries and buses, would now take place on 1 January 1997.

Unused Rail Tickets (Refunds)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussion he has had with the Office of the Franchise Director regarding administrative charges by rail franchises for refunding unused rail tickets; what the outcome of those discussions were; what controls have been placed on rail franchisees with respect to administrative charges; and if he will make a statement. [29628]

Mr. Watts: None. Under condition 25 of the national conditions of carriage, train operators are allowed to make a reasonable administrative charge when refunding unused rail tickets.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what power the Rail Regulator has to control the administrative fees charged by rail franchisees when refunding unused rail tickets. [29629]

Mr. Watts: Refund on unused rail tickets are covered by the national conditions of carriage, approved by the Rail Regulator under condition 7 of each operator's passenger licence. The national conditions of carriage allow a reasonable administrative charge to be made. If a train operator was to charge an excessive amount, he could be in breach of his licence obligation and subject to the regulator's enforcement powers.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30065]

Mr. Watts: This Department's deregulation unit has a staff running cost budget of around £100,000 per year and a complement of six staff.

Five are civil servants with little direct experience of the private sector; they include a grade 5, a grade 7, an HEO and two clerical staff—the other is a private sector consultant, who is retained to advise on deregulation issues. The civil servants in the DDU have other responsibilities in addition to the Government's deregulation initiative and this has been taken into account in the budget figure.

Rail Privatisation

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 26 April, Official Report, column 328, how many of the bids for Network South Central offered new rolling stock. [30425]

Mr. Watts: This information is commercially confidential.

Road Building

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which of the network enhancement projects announced in the Highways Agency business plan for 1995–96 were started by 31 March. [29989]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question asking which network enhancement projects announced in the Highways Agency Business Plan 1995/96 were started by 31 March.

Of the network enhancement projects announced in the Highways Agency's 1995/96 Business Plan, 9 in the £1 million to £3 million category and 156 in the £50,000 to £1 million category were started by 31 March 1996. These projects are those ticked on the attached lists.

The Agency's 1996 Business Plan was amended to include 3 new network enhancement projects in the £50,000 to £1 million category. These were:—

Thames Leisure Craft Operators

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what training and qualifications are required of masters of passenger pleasure and leisure craft on the River Thames. [29541]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Marine Safety Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. M. Bradley to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about the training and qualifications required for masters of passenger, pleasure and leisure craft on the River Thames.

Masters of vessels on the River Thames which carry more than 12 passengers must be qualified in accordance with the Merchant Shipping (Local Passenger Vessels) (Masters' Licences and Hours, Manning and Training) Regulations 1993. The 1993 regulations require masters to hold a current Boatmaster's Licence which is appropriate to the waters in which their vessel is being navigated and the number of passengers being carried. The training requirements which must be satisfied before the licence is issued are described in Merchant Shipping Notice M. 1525. I enclose copies of the 1993 regulations and M.1525 with this letter.

Exemptions from the requirement to hold a Boatmaster's Licence can be granted where the master holds a qualification the standards for which are considered at least equivalent to the Department's standards for the relevant grade of Boatmaster's Licence. The Port of London Authority's (PLA) Waterman's Licence is recognised as equivalent to the MSA's Boatmaster's Licence for masters of vessels on the River Thames which carry more than 12 passengers. To obtain such a licence a master has to pass four independent professional examinations before achieving a full licence. Thereafter, they are required to maintain its validity by working on the river for 150 days every 3 years. Anyone failing to meet this experience criterion has to be re-examined.

Masters of vessels on the River Thames carrying 12 passengers or fewer are required by the PLA to hold the PLA Waterman's Licence.

Airport Development

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 542, what is the time scale of each of the detailed assessments listed. [29570]

Mr. Norris: Detailed assessments of Heathrow, Gatwick, Stansted and Luton were carried out by the RUCATSE working group as it judged only these airports offered worthwhile prospects of responding to forecast levels of demand. The group took the view that Southampton, Manston and Lydd did not merit detailed assessments. RUCATSE's report was published in July 1993.

King's Cross Railway Lands (Gasholders)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to relocate the gasholders on the King's cross railway lands. [30356]

Mr. Watts: Union Railways and London and Continental Railways, who will be responsible for designing and constructing the channel tunnel rail link, are consulting English Heritage about the priority which should be afforded to the gasholders among other St. Pancras heritage projects.

Driving Licences

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what opinion surveys were commissioned by his Department to test public support for plastic photocard driving licences; and what were the results. [29984]

Mr. Norris: A preliminary public consultation during 1991 showed strong support for including photographs on driving licences. Subsequent public consultation in 1994 confirmed the earlier support.

Mr. Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his Department's press notice of 10 April, Reference 110, how he measures the benefits in terms of establishing identity from the introduction of plastic photocard driving licences. [29982]

Mr. Norris: Introduction of plastic photocard licences will, among other benefits, reduce the possibility that lost or stolen licences may be used to support a false identity—for example, when taking a driving test or hiring a vehicle.

Mr. Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the impact on the levels of fraud of the introduction of plastic photocard driving licences. [29983]

Mr. Norris: We intend to introduce stringent checking procedures which will make it extremely difficult to obtain a photocard driving licence fraudulently. The card format will incorporate a number of security features designed to prevent counterfeiting.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are his plans to increase the reliability of identification procedures for the issuing of driving licences; whether these plans involve the taking of fingerprints or any other biometric measures; if access to personal data held by the Government Departments is involved; and what additional data items, not related to driving licences, are being considered to be included in space on the licence allocated to member states for their own purposes. [30048]

Mr. Norris: The checks on the identity of applicants for photocard driving licences are being considered in the light of the best practices of the Passport Agency. These do not include fingerprints or biometric measures.

Access to personal information will be regulated under the provision of the Data Protection Act.

EU legislation allows member states to include additional information on the driving licence and designates an area on the licence for that purpose. No decision has yet been made on what it will contain.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Colliery Areas Regeneration

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the total allocation of the RECHAR funds over the last three years (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in Wales. [29465]

Mr. Oppenheim: The United Kingdom allocation for 1990–93 was 179.0 mecu, in 1992 prices of which 31.2 mecu was for Wales. The UK allocation for 1994–97 is at present 163.24 mecu, in 1995 prices, of which 20.46 mecu was for Wales. These figures reflect the preponderantly earlier incidence of job losses in the Welsh coal industry.

Radiocommunications Agency

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the areas under consideration for contracting out in the Radiocommunications Agency indicating the number of staff involved and the proposed time-scale involved; and if he will make a statement. [29376]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Radiocommunications Agency and its predecessors has an excellent record for contracting out services. Licensing which does not involve frequency assignment has been contracted out; in other areas they have encouraged self management by industry groups wherever possible where this improves customer service. It is agency policy to review continuously all licensing activities to identify any potential candidates for future action. The support services of the agency were all contracted out on relocation to new headquarters in London's docklands last October.

The Radiocommunications Agency is also currently completing its prior options review, which is examining, among other things, the scope for any further contracting out across the agency. Ministers announced the outcome of the review of the customer services branch on 31 October 1995. It is anticipated that the review of the remainder of the agency will be completed within the next few months.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will list the terms of reference for the proposed strategic partnership between the Radiocommunications Agency information technology service and the private sector; how many staff are involved; and what are the estimated costs; [29378]

(2) if he will list (a) those parties which responded to the advertisement in the EC Journal with regard to the strategic partnership between the Radiocommunications Agency information technology service and the private sector, (b) the date for proposed tendering, (c) the mechanisms for union involvement in the consultation process and (d) the number of union representatives to sit on the bids evaluation panel; and if he will make a statement; [29380]

(3) when a new contractor will be selected to complete refurbishment of New Kings Beam house; if he will make a statement on the process for evaluating new bids and the criteria for selecting a new contractor; who will sit on the evaluation panel; if unions will be permitted to participate in the selection process; and if he will make a statement; [29382]

(4) how many consultants have been employed in the Radiocommunications Agency to date; at what cost; and if he will make a statement; [29377]

(5) if he will make a statement on the procedures employed by his Department to monitor outfitting and refurbishment work in New Kings Beam house prior to the contractor going into receivership; what is the cost of unfinished work; and if he will make a statement; [29381]

(6) if he will make a statement on the future location of staff in the Radiocommunications Agency. [29379]

Mr. Ian Taylor: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the chief executive of the Radiocommunications Agency. I have asked him to arrange for replies to be given.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Nick Harvey, dated 21 May 1996:

As promised in Mr Taylor's response to your Parliamentary Question No. 97/2277 I am writing to you to provide the information you requested about our procurement of an IT Strategic Partner.

(a) The Agency is using EC Services Directive negotiated procedures to recruit an IT Strategic Partner from the private sector. The detailed terms of reference for the partnership will be agreed later this year in negotiations with the short listed companies. It is the Agency's intention to acquire a partner who can work with the Agency to provide a broad range of information technology services which fully meet the Agency's business needs and provide value for money. It also sees opportunities for the partnership to exploit the Agency's expertise in spectrum management in international markets, benefiting the UK industrial and diplomatic interests, subject to ministerial approval.

(b) Some 45 Agency staff are currently directly involved in IT. We have made clear to all staff that, subject to discussion with line management, they will be able to apply for redeployment work in the Agency's Intelligent Customer Function, to apply for other work within the Agency or to transfer to the chosen 'Strategic Partner'.

(c) It is estimated that the external cost of setting up the Partnership will be some £300k, for the use of CCTA consultancy, and that the annual value of the contract will be some £2.5m to £3m over 7 to 10 years.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Nick Harvey, dated 21 May 1996:

As promised in Mr Taylor's response to your Parliamentary Question No. 95/2279 I am writing to you to provide the information you requested about our procurement of an IT Strategic Partner.

(a) The attached annex provides a list of the companies who responded to the advert in the Official Journal of the European Communities.

(b) It is expected that final tenders will invited from a short list of three or four companies during February 1997.

(c) The Agency Trade Union Side is being kept informed about progress at our regular Whitley Council meetings. Additionally the Agency is establishing an IT Staff Consultative Group which will be regularly consulted during the development of the Agency's partnership requirements and when negotiations with the short listed companies are progressing.

(d) Although the Agency's Management Board will take the final decision on the selection of the Partner , the Trade Union Side will be kept in touch with developments.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Nick Harvey, dated 21 May 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question about the employment of consultants in my Agency.

This Agency did not assume responsibility for letting its own contracts until 1994. During the financial year 1994/95 contracts for external consultancy were let to 6 organisations at a cost of £238,000. During 1995/96 8 consultancy firms were engaged at a cost of £256,000. Because of the nature of this work there is some overlap of contracts between the years and therefore some double counting of the numbers of firms engaged.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Nick Harvey, dated 21 May 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question concerning procedures for monitoring refurbishment work at New King's Beam House.

A project manager was employed to monitor the project. Formal weekly meetings were held on site and were attended by the RA's project sponsors. They also inspected the site and discussed all aspects of the project with the project managers and other professionals on a daily basis. Cost information is a commercial matter between the parties.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Nick Harvey, dated 21 May 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question about the selection of contractors for the refurbishment of New King's Beam House.

A new contractor has been selected. Departmental procurement procedures were followed throughout. Trade Union participation in the selection process is not part of those procedures and they were not invited to participate.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Nick Harvey, dated 21 May 1995:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question concerning the further location of staff in the Radiocommunications Agency.

The Headquarters staff of the Radiocommunications Agency are currently located at New King's Beam House and will remain there until South Quay 3 in Docklands is ready for reoccupation.

Trade Associations

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to encourage the merger of trade, industry and employer associations and federations into more representative bodies. [29658]

Mr. Page: My colleagues and I are continuing to meet with trade associations and other representative bodies to encourage them to become more fully representative of whole sectors, in line with the principles in my Department's best practice guide for the Model Trade Association.

Encryption Algorithms

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to restrict the use of encryption algorithms to protect the activities of the law enforcement agencies. [29696]

Mr. Ian Taylor: There are no plans to introduce measures which would restrict the use of encryption algorithms. As I have made clear in previous answers, however, discussions have been taking place between Government Departments on the type of arrangements that could be introduced to provide encryption services for business whilst preserving the effectiveness of the law enforcement agencies. No decisions have yet been taken.

We are watching closely developments in the USA and the impact they may have on commercial interests in the United Kingdom.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Watson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) how much has been spent on providing briefing material to members of industrial tribunals in each of the last five years; and what is his estimate of the amount likely to be spent during the current year; [29937]

(2) what change has been made in the amount of briefing material made available to industrial tribunal members; and if he will make a statement; [29936]

(3) what consultations he has had with industrial tribunal members about the type and quantity of briefing material they want to have provided by the Department. [29938]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Regular briefing is provided for members through the Incomes Data Services brief. The annual costs of this publication for the last five years and the current year is:

Year
1991: £71.8k
1992: £77.4k
1993: £100.1k
1994: £101.6k
1995: £102.1k
1996: £80.7k

These figures include the cost of providing this publication to tribunal chairmen as well as members. It is not possible to identify separately the cost for the lay members. Additional briefing material is provided to members as part of their initial and annual refresher training.

The instrument of appointment for lay members provides for up to three days initial induction training, plus up to two refresher days general training each year.

There has been no change to the range of briefing material made available to members, although in the interests of good financial management, there has been a reduction in the total number of copies of the IDS brief. This reduction in the number of copies was the subject of full consultation with the president of the tribunals and the regional chairmen.

Sun Alliance-Royal Insurance Merger

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade in what ways he proposes to ensure that the public interest, with particular reference to the consequences for public finances of the effects on employment, are taken into account during consideration of the proposed Sun Alliance-Royal Insurance merger. [29730]

Mr. John M. Taylor: This merger does not fall to be considered under the public interest test in the merger provisions of the Fair Trading Act, as it comes within the jurisdiction of the EC merger regulation. Under this legislation, the EC Commission is responsible for appraising the merger's impact on competition, taking into account the views of member states.

Bread Pricing

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will refer to the Office of Fair Trading the subject of predatory pricing of bread by supermarkets. [29760]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Director General of Fair Trading is currently considering the impact of the pricing policies that are pursued by supermarkets, including allegations of predatory pricing of bread, and is taking the opportunity to review a wide range of competition issues in relation to supermarkets. He will decide in due course whether there are any grounds for him to take action. If anyone has firm evidence that supermarkets may be breaching competition law they should bring it to the attention of the DGFT.

Council of Europe (Meetings)

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995 have been attended by Ministers or officials of his Department; and if he will make a statement. [29369]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 17 May 1996]: There have been 212 meetings of or organised by the Council of Europe since January 1995 attended by members of staff of the UK delegation to the Council of Europe in Strasbourg. DTI officials do not routinely attend.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list, for each of his Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30129]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Services within my Department's agencies which have been market tested with an in-house bid are as follows:

National Weights and Measures Laboratory:

Typing services: Awarded to in-house team

Patent Office:

Reprographic services: Awarded to in-house team

The Insolvency Service:

Central Accounting Unit: Awarded to in-house team

Crown Post Offices

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many Crown post offices in (a) Scotland and (b) throughout the United Kingdom have been converted to agency status in each financial year since the introduction of the policy. [29988]

Mr. Oppenheim: I understand from the Post Office that numbers of crown post offices converted to agency status in Scotland and throughout the United Kingdom in each financial year since 1989–90 are as follows:

Year	Scotland	United Kingdom
1989–90	32	153
1990–91	29	164
1991–92	40	147
1992–93	11	108
1993–94	13	117
1994–95	11	106
1995–96	2	45

Statutory Employment Rights

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will estimate the proportion of full-time workers qualifying for statutory employment rights in (a) 1978, (b) 1988, (c) 1992, (d) 1993 and (e) 1994 in the United Kingdom and in each standard region and nation. [30405]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The requested estimates cannot be provided, for a number of reasons. These include the fact that not all employment rights have the same qualifying conditions, and that the rights themselves have been amended over the years so that no direct comparisons can be made. Employees now qualify for a number of important rights regardless of their hours of work or length of service.

Advertising Standards Authority

Mr. Timms: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what measures he takes to ensure that the decisions of the Advertising Standards Authority reflect public concerns on matters of taste and decency; [30194]

(2) what monitoring he routinely undertakes of the Advertising Standards Authority. [30198]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Advertising Standards Authority is independent of Government. It supervises an agreed code of practice under which the advertising industry is self-regulated to ensure that the system works in the pubic interest and to publicly acceptable standards.

The authority assesses advertisements according to the standards of taste and decency generally accepted at present in the United Kingdom. The authority will be conducting research into current public attitudes on taste and decency during this year.

My Department maintains regular contact with the authority, raising with it matters of concern as considered necessary.

Employment Rights

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to extend the protection of employment rights for those at work. [30304.]

Mr. John M. Taylor: We have no plans at present.

Computerisation

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his Department's involvement in the development of a software package to allow PAYE/NICS/VAT/CSO requirements to be integrated. [29953]

Mr. Page: DTI is not involved directly. The feasibility of a computer based package is being considered jointly by the Inland Revenue and the Contributions Agency.

"Your Business Matters" Conference

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date he plans to publish the Government's responses to the "Your Business Matters" conference. [29956]

Mr. Page: A comprehensive response to the "Your Business Matters" conferences and subsequent report, will be published alongside the third "Competitiveness" White Paper in June.

Company Payment Practice

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) when he plans to publish the consultative document on reporting of payment practice in company accounts; [29947]

(2) what the deadline will be for responses to consultation on reporting of payment practice in company accounts. [29946]

Mr. Oppenheim: My Department intends to publish a consultative document on reporting of payment practice at the end of June. In accordance with standard practice, consultees will have three months to respond.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30059]

Mr. Oppenheim: The running costs for the departmental deregulation unit for 1996–97 are approximately £150,000. It has a core staff of three private civil servants—one G7 and two HEO grade—one of whom has experience of the private sector. In addition the DDU draws upon a variety of other departmental resources, including the expertise of business secondees to the Department.

Science, Engineering and Technology

Mr. Sumberg: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to publish the 1996 "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology". [30642]

Mr. Lang: The 1996 "Forward Look of Government-funded Science, Engineering and Technology", and its companion volume, "Science, Engineering and Technology Statistics 1996", were laid in the House this morning. This year, in response to a recommendation of the Science and Technology Committee, I have presented the documents as Command Papers. This will increase their accessibility to Members of both Houses.

This is the third such annual publication. The "Forward Look" reiterates the Government's commitment to the White Paper policies set out in "Realising Our Potential".

It describes the Government's strategy for publicly funded science, engineering and technology (SET) within a framework of five broad objectives:

- to develop publicly funded SET to meet the country's future needs, taking account of 'Technology Foresight', and fostering partnership between the science and engineering base, industry and Government.
- to maintain the excellence of UK science, engineering and technology, to advance knowledge, increase understanding and produce highly educated and trained people.
- to improve public awareness and understanding of SET
- to maximise the effectiveness of our EU and international collaboration in meeting UK objectives
- to promote collaboration between Government Departments and ensure that trans-departmental SET issues are handled effectively, while improving efficiency and value for money.

The "Forward Look" also presents future SET expenditure plans, includes statements by individual departments and research councils on their programmes, and reports progress on implementing the 1993 White Paper.

Asylum and Immigration Bill

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what research his Department has carried out into the ease with which small employers can identify the documents required under clause 8 of the Asylum and Immigration Bill. [29949]

Mr. Page: No research in this ares has been carried out by my Department. I understand that the Home Office asked respondents to its consultation document on the prevention of illegal working to comment on this matter.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many representations his Department has received from businesses about the cost and burden of implementing clause 8 of the Asylum and Immigration Bill; what percentage was in favour; and what percentage was against the clause. [29962]

Mr. Page [holding answer 17 May 1996]: This Department has received no such representations.

Research Councils

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on how many occasions the Minister for Science and Technology has met collectively (a) the chief executives of the research councils and (b) the chairmen of research councils, and on what dates. [29001]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 13 May 1996]: I met collectively the chief executives of the research councils on 13 December 1995 and the chairmen on 20 February 1996. In addition I have met individual research council chairmen or chief executives on several occasions before and since these meetings.

Company Collapses

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he intends to take following the collapse of Homepower Ltd. and Power Store Trading Ltd. [29258]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 14 May 1996]: None. The administrators are seeking to preserve as much of the business and jobs of these companies as possible. They are reviewing the financial and trading prospects of the business and the individual stores with a view to a sale as a going concern.

Company Annual Accounts

Mr. Morgan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what provisions he has made for extension for the filing of annual accounts by Firland's Training of Aylesbury; [29385]

(2) how many special provisions he has granted to companies to postpone filing their annual accounts beyond the penalty date; in what circumstances; and if he will make a statement. [29384]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answers 14 May 1996]: The registrar and chief executive of Companies House executive agency has delegated authority to deal with such matters on behalf of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The registrar has been asked to write to the hon. Gentleman direct.

Letter from John S. Holden to Mr. Rhodri Morgan, dated 21 May 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Questions regarding the number of special provisions granted to companies to postpone filing their annual accounts beyond the penalty date and in what circumstances, and the provisions made for extension of the filing of annual accounts by Firlands Training of Aylesbury.

Information on the number of extensions granted each year appear in the Department's Annual Report to Parliament. For your convenience, the numbers are as follows:

1993/94: 4,910

1995/96: 6,708

Extensions to the time allowed for delivering accounts are granted by Companies House on a discretionary basis on behalf of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. They are granted in exceptional circumstances where there are "special reasons" that are unforeseen by the company and which are beyond the control of its officers. There is no comprehensive or prescribed list of acceptable reasons, since each case is considered on its merits.

With regard to the matter of Firlands Training Limited, it is not our policy to disclose to third parties the reasons for individual discretionary decisions. These are matters between the Department and the company concerned.

However, I can confirm that as my officials have been satisfied as to the existence of "special circumstances", this company has been granted an extension of 3 months to the period allowed for delivering its 30 April 1995 accounts. The accounts are now due to be delivered no later than 31 May 1996; the company's public record has been noted accordingly.

Torture Equipment

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he intends to reply to the letter about the export of torture equipment by British companies about which the hon. Member for Stretford wrote to the Prime Minister on 20 March. [29177]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 14 May 1996]: This related to a matter which aroused public interest and which needed careful consideration, and inquiries made, before responding. I wrote to the hon. Member on 16 May 1996.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29425]

Mr. John. M. Taylor [holding answer 20 May 1996]: My Department follows the advice issued by the central unit on procurement in its guidance note No. 48 "Bonds and guarantees", copies of which are available in the Libraries of both Houses.

The guidance note makes clear that bonds are not always necessary and are not a substitute for considered judgments about the risks of a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources of the available contractor. These factors will vary for each contract independent of the size of the contractor.

The other information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29435]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29450]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Scottish and Newcastle Breweries

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, (1) pursuant to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, column 330, how many of the 23 separate letters or parliamentary questions relating to Scottish and Newcastle Breweries were in letter form; [30169]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, column 330, which hon. Members have written to him on matters relating to Scottish and Newcastle Breweries. [30170]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 20 May 1996]: Fifteen separate letters and eight separate parliamentary questions were answered. It is not the practice to release details of correspondence between hon. Members and Ministers.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many times BSE infection has been found in cattle being imported into the United Kingdom; and from which countries the infected cattle originated. [28852]

Mr. Ancram: I understand that 14 animals have been imported into the UK which have been subsequently confirmed as having BSE. Although exact dates of importation are not known, the animals are believed to have resided in the UK for a sufficient period to have been exposed to BSE infective material. It cannot be concluded that the animals were affected with BSE when imported.

The countries from which the animals were imported are as follows:

Belgium: 1

France: 4

Italy: 3

Netherlands: 1

Republic of Ireland: 5.

Environmental Improvement Schemes

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland at which location environmental improvement schemes have been completed; which schemes are presently under construction; what funds have been allocated for such schemes in each of the next three years; what proposals there are for an environmental improvement scheme at Killyleagh; and if he will make a statement. [29874]

Mr. Moss: The following lists set out the locations where environmental improvement schemes are under construction. For each of the next three financial years, £2.7 million has been programmed by the Department of the Environment for environmental improvement schemes.

A scheme has been identified at High street, Castle place, Killyleagh, to link with a roads scheme. At present, it is programmed for 1998–99 at a cost of £200,000 approximately.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30069]

Mr. Ancram: The annual budget for 1995–96 for the Department of Economic Development's deregulation unit, which co-ordinates the deregulatory activity of Northern Ireland Departments was £154,065. The budget provides for the following career civil servants, none of whom have private sector experience:

1 grade 5 (part-input)
1 grade 7 (part-input)
1 deputy principal
2 staff officers
1 administration officer
1 typist (part-input).

The unit does not have any secondees from business.

Teilifis na Gaeilge

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what meetings he has had with Teilifis na Gaeilge; and if he will make a statement. [29973]

Mr. Ancram: There have been no meetings between Northern Ireland Office Ministers and Teilifis na Gaeilge.

Departmental Employees

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list by grade the number of women employed in each Government Department of the Northern Ireland Office. [30495]

Ministerial Advisers

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the annual costs of the (a) salaries, (b) secretarial support and (c) accommodation and travelling expenses for his two advisers; and if he will make a statement. [25490]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 April 1996]: I refer the hon Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Brown) on 18 December 1995 Official Report, column 818. The salary levels have increased by 2.7 per cent. since that reply.

Secretarial support is provided by one secretary in London and one in Edinburgh. It is not our practice to divulge individual salaries, but the average cost of a personal secretary in the Scottish Office is £17,247—salary plus national insurance plus superannuation.

Accommodation costs are not separately identified as they form part of the overall Scottish Office charges.

The annual travel and subsistence charge for a special adviser is estimated at £9,000.

Health Care International

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the Scottish Office expenditure (a) in cash terms and (b) at current prices on (i) the Health Care International hospital in Clydebank and (ii) developing the land. [25421]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 16 April 1996]: The Scottish Office itself paid £18.6 million in regional selective assistance—of which £1 million was subsequently recovered—to Health Care International (Scotland) Ltd (HCI). The company also, however, received other support from public funds. In addition, the Scottish Development Agency and Scottish Enterprise incurred expenditure on physical works not specific to HCI to render the relevant site safe and capable of development as part of the Clydebank enterprise zone.

The financial support from pubic sources to HCI, and the expenditure on physical works not specific to HCI, were set out in cash terms in appendix 5 of the memorandum of the Comptroller and Auditor General annexed to the report of the Committee of Pubic Accounts on Health Care International (Scotland) Ltd (HMSO, House of Commons paper 32). The information is reproduced in the table, together with recalculations of the expenditure concerned to March 1996 prices. For a few items expenditure took place over a period of months and is not readily attributable to a single month: in these cases the recalculation to March 1996 prices has been based on the average price for the period concerned.

Employees' Rights

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provision is available to employees of his Department for (a) maternity leave, (b) maternity pay, (c) paternity leave, (d) parental leave, (e) flexible working hours, (f) part-time work, (g) job sharing, (h) leave to care for sick children, (i) home-working (j) term-time contracts, (k) annual hours contracts, (l) workplace nurseries, (m) child care allowances, (n) carers' leave and (o) career break schemes; and what criteria are used to judge eligibility in each case. [27574]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 May 1996]: The executive agencies under the control of my Department have available, for employees, all of the provisions listed with the exception of (d) parental leave and (m) childcare allowances. The criteria used to judge eligibility are as provided in the Scottish Office staff handbook, a copy of which will be placed in the House of Commons Library, and in Scottish Office management staff notices.

Employees in the Scottish Court Service have available all the provisions listed with the exception of (l) workplace nurseries and (o) career break schemes. The Scottish Prison Service has available all the provisions listed with the exception of (d) parental leave, (j) term-time contracts, (k) annual hours contracts, (l) workplace nurseries and (m) childcare allowances.

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what provision is available to employees of executive agencies under the control of his Department for (a) maternity leave, (b) maternity pay, (c) paternity leave, (d) parental leave, (e) flexible working hours, (f) part-time work, (g) job sharing, (h) leave to care for sick children, (i) home-working, (j) term-time contracts,

(k) annual hours' contracts, (l) workplace nurseries, (m) child care allowances, (n) carers' leave and (o) career break schemes; and what criteria are used to judge eligibility in each case. [27575]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 7 May 1996]: My Department has available, for employees, all of the provisions listed with the exception of (d) parental leave and (m) child care allowances. The criteria used to judge eligibility are as provided in the Scottish Office staff handbook, a copy of which will be placed in the House of Commons Library, and in Scottish Office management staff notices.

Improvement and Repair Grants

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was spent in each of the last five financial years by islands and former district councils in Scotland on (a) improvement and (b) repair grants. [28594]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is set out in the table.

Amount spent on improvement and repair grants, 1990–91 to 1994–95

Amount Spent (£000)

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes in the eligibility criteria resulted from the 1995 Fishing Vessels (Safety Improvements) (Grant) Scheme 1995; and if he will make a statement. [29176]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 13 May 1996]: Engines and other machinery for propelling the vessel and any items of a structural nature, including stability work, are now specifically excluded from grant under the Fishing Vessels (Safety Improvements) (Grants) Schemes 1995.

Scottish Homes

Mr. Galbraith: to ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will establish a statutory code of conduct for the transfer of Scottish Homes' housing stock to private landlords; and if he will make a statement. [29969]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Scottish Homes has published its procedures relating to the transfer of its stock to alternative landlords. The arrangements it has put in place include a code of conduct for staff to follow when they are involved in proposals to acquire stock.

Wee Bankie

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consideration he has given to the Wee Bankie in the Firth of Forth being designated an undisturbed area in accordance with the Esbjerg declaration. [29885]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 17 May 1996]: The Esbjerg declaration invited the European Commission and Norway to consider a proposal for experimental undisturbed areas for research purposes. We will be contributing to this work in advance of the intermediate ministerial meeting on the integration of fisheries and environmental issues, to be held in Norway in March 1997.

School Meals

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action has been taken to improve school meals, following the publication of the report on the Scottish diet by a working party under the chairmanship of Professor Philip James in December 1993. [29302]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The provision of school meals, including the standard and quality of the food provided, is a matter for each education authority to determine. Following the publication of Professor James' report, the Government established the Scottish diet action group in November 1994 to make recommendations on action to improve the diet of the Scottish population, including that of children. This group is led by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, and its membership includes Professor James and representatives of educational interests. The group has now completed its work and expects to publish its action plan this summer. The Government will consider how best to advise education authorities in the light of that plan.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29424]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The Scottish Office policy on the use of performance bonds is in line with the guidance set out in the central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48 "Bonds and guarantees", copies of which are available in the Libraries of both Houses. This guidance makes clear that bonds are not always necessary and are no substitute for considered judgments about the risks of a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources of the available contractors. These will vary for each contract independently of the size of the contractor. In practice the Scottish Office has used performance bonds only on rare occasions in some major road contracts where the risks were considered to merit it. Statistics are not held centrally on the cost of bonds or the size of contractors involved.

Meat Companies (Compensation)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will introduce additional compensation measures for meat companies which derived the majority of their sales revenue from beef exports prior to the imposition of the worldwide ban on British beef. [30011]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The Government have announced a number of changes to the beef stocks transfer scheme following consultation which will be of assistance to licensed abattoirs and cutting plants which previously exported beef. The scope of the scheme has been extended to stocks owned by these bodies which were in transit to or stored in export markets on 9 April, in certain circumstances, destroyed overseas by, or at the instruction of, foreign Governments as a result of the crisis. The higher chilled value will be allowed for boneless primals frozen in the seven days before 25 March, where it is clear that this action was taken in response to frustrated export orders.

Special export refund beef will all be purchased at the chilled valuation. For eligible exports stocks currently overseas or in transit, destruction overseas may be allowed where this is the most cost effective method of disposal.

ENVIRONMENT

Endangered Species

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking with his colleagues in the Council of Ministers to preserve endangered species in the European Union. [29144]

Mr. Clappison: The primary instruments of the European Union to protect endangered species and their habitats, are directives 79/409 EEC and 92/43/EEC. Member states are obliged to transpose the provisions of these directives into national law and to take practical measures to meet their obligations for the conservation of listed species and their habitats.

Uranium Swarf Dumping

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution to complete its inquiries into the dumping of drums of uranium swarf at Poplar farm, Chelveston; and if he will make a statement. [29581]

Mr. Clappison: HMIP has been incorporated in the new Environment Agency. I am informed by the agency that it has reviewed the evidence gathered during the investigation by HMIP, but that it has not yet taken a decision on whether to bring a prosecution under the Radioactive Substances Act 1993. I have asked the agency for a further report on progress by the end of June, following which I will write to the hon. Member.

Secure Accommodation

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of applications for secure accommodation by homeless households were rejected for each of the last five years for which information is available. [29817]

Mr. Clappison: The information requested is not available. Data are collected from English local authorities on applications/inquiries made but they reflect differing local administrative practices, and because they are not reported on a common basis they cannot be used to produce national or regional estimates of applications, nor of the proportion rejected.

Recycling

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures his Department has taken to monitor the level of research into recycling. [29851]

Mr. Clappison: Research into the many diverse forms of recycling is of interest to a wide range of policy areas in Government. Steps taken to monitor this research vary according to the needs of each policy area. The Enviroment Agency is under a duty to monitor research in the areas for which it is responsible, namely the regulation of solid waste, water and air quality.

As far as materials recycling is concerned, both my Department and the Environment Agency fund relevant research, including work on related economic and statistics issues. My Department also funds the Waste Management Information Bureau which collates information on waste research worldwide.

Passive Smoking

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what new steps he is taking to ensure that all public houses have sufficient areas which are free from the dangers of passive smoking. [29822]

Mr. Clappison: The Government are considering how best to target advice and publicity about its code of practice on smoking in public places in those areas, such as public houses, which lag behind in establishing effective smoking policies.

The implementation of smoking policies in public houses is a matter for the discretion of managers, in line with the Government's voluntary policy which encourages the implementation of suitable smoking policies in all enclosed public places. Guidance on implementing smoking policies is given in the Government's code of practice on smoking in public places published in 1991. The code makes it clear that the Government expect every effort to be made to cater for the interests of the non-smoker.

Environmental Policy

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those of the United Kingdom's environmental policy aims and commitments made at the earth summit in Rio de Janeiro in June 1992 which have not yet been implemented, indicating in each case when he expects their implementation. [30135]

Mr. Clappison: Following the earth summit, the Government set out an eight point plan, which we subsequently agreed with our EU and G7 partners, for taking forward commitments entered into at Rio. The plan covered the ratification of the climate change and biodiversity conventions; the publication of national strategies on sustainable development, climate change, biodiversity and forests; contributing to the restructuring and replenishment of the global environment facility and a continuing commitment to financial assistance to developing countries.

The Government also announced the establishment of the Darwin initiative to provide grants to developing countries for biodiversity projects; the technology partnership initiative; and the holding of an international conference bringing together NGO experience from around the world.

All these commitments have been met. The Government also publish a White Paper annually which provides detailed information about progress in meeting commitments to sustainable development and which sets out priorities ahead. The latest in the series, Cm 3188, was published in March this year.

Air Pollution (Greater London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department takes to monitor air pollution in the Greater London area; and if he will make a statement. [29978]

Mr. Clappison: There are currently 13 automatic real time air quality monitoring sites in Greater London within the Department of the Environment's national network, listed in the table. In addition, there are more than 100 non-automatic monitoring sites within Greater London as follows: 90 nitrogen dioxide sites, 16 sulphur dioxide and smoke sites, three lead and multi-element sites and one site measuring toxic organic micropollutants.

As part of the expansion of the national automatic network, the Department aims to establish another two sites and integrate 11 locally operated monitoring sites within London, resulting in a total of 26 real time national monitoring sites in Greater London by the end of 1996.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what analysis his Department has undertaken of the impact that market liberalisation has had upon industrial and commercial sector investments in energy efficiency. [30151]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Trends in energy efficiency are kept under review by the Department, but it is too early to say what the impact of market liberalisation has been on industrial and commercial sector investments in energy efficiency.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each of her Department's agencies what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30116]

Sir Paul Beresford: Since April 1992 the Department's remaining agencies market tested the following services:

Agency	Outcome
Building Research Establishment
Engineering workshop	Test replaced by efficiency review resulting in savings.
Staff catering	Won by private sector
Audio visual services	In-house win
Office and printing services	In-house win
The Planning Inspectorate
Secretarial support	In-house win

Two agencies, the Security Facilities Executive and the Buying Agency, previously the responsibility of this Department, have now moved to the Office of Public Service. In addition, the Department has itself tested the services provided by its agencies as follows:

management of the Queen Elizabeth II Conference Centre, which was won in-house;

21 separate research projects, which would previously have been undertaken by the Building Research establishment, with the result that 15 have been won by the private sector.

Out-of-town Shopping Developments

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many out-of-town shopping developments he gave approval for in England and Wales, during 1995. [29985]

Sir Paul Beresford: Statistics on appeal decisions in England, for which the Secretary of State is responsible, are not classified by location. Consequently, the information could be assembled only at disproportionate cost.

Homelessness (Greater London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent surveys have been undertaken by his Department as to the extent of homelessness among young, single people, in the Greater London area; and if he will make a statement. [29993]

Mr. Clappison: In November 1990, my Department commissioned a survey to collect comprehensive and up to date information about single homeless people in England. The results, based on interviews and field work in 10 local authority areas in England, including five London boroughs were published by HMSO in 1993 in the report, "Single Homeless People", ISBN 0 11 752800 5. This provided information on the characteristics of single homeless people, the reasons why they were homeless and their accommodation needs and preferences.

Monitoring arrangements for the Government's rough sleepers initiative include counts of people sleeping rough, undertaken twice a year by voluntary sector agencies. The latest count, in November 1995, found 270 people sleeping rough in central London—down from estimates of over 1,000 in 1990 before the initiative began. Of the 270 people found, only three were recorded as being under 18 years of age.

In October 1995, my Department issued a consultation paper, "Rough Sleepers Initiative, Future Plans", which invited all local authorities in England to assess the extent of rough sleeping in their areas. On the basis of responses to this consultation exercise, we have proposed further evaluation of the extent of rough sleeping in the London boroughs of Barnet, Ealing, Hammersmith and Fulham, Kensington and Chelsea, Richmond upon Thames, Tower Hamlets and Waltham Forest and 16 areas outside London. I expect the information from this further evaluation to be available in September.

Factory and Agriculture Inspectors

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many (a) factory and (b) agricultural inspectors were in post during the period 1987 to 1995. [30303]

Sir Paul Beresford: The following table shows the number of (a) factory and (b) agricultural inspectors employed by the Health and Safety Executive from 1987 to 1995. All figures are full-time equivalent staff in post.

1 April	Factory	Agricultural
1987	621.5	166
1988	592.5	158
1989	604	165
1990	634.5	171
1991	651	177
1992	698.5	183
1993	707.5	182.5
1994	702.5	187
1995	664.55	169

Parliamentary Constituencies

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authorities which will cover all or part of each of the parliamentary constituencies which will come into existence at the end of the present Parliament. [30354]

Sir Paul Beresford: This information is contained in the Parliamentary Constituencies (England) Order 1995, S.I. 1995/1626.

Council Tax (City of Nottingham)

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was (a) the total sum, (b) the amount paid to the City of Nottingham, (c) the percentage of the total paid to the City of Nottingham and (d) the amount paid per dwelling in the City of Nottingham, in transitional relief in respect of council tax in each year from 1993–94 to 1995–96. [29270]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information requested is as follows:

(a) Total amount of transitional relief

1993–94: £378,652,826

1994–95: £111,283,108

1995–96: £27,178,179[1]

(b) Amount of transitional relief paid to Nottingham city council

1993–94: £692,040

1994–95: £173,218

1995–96: £40,605[1]

(c) Percentage of total amount of transitional relief paid to Nottingham city council

1993–94: 1.8 per cent.

1994–95: 1.5 per cent.

1995–96: 0.15 per cent.[1]

(d) Amount paid per chargeable dwelling in Nottingham

1993–94: £6.18

1995–96: £0.4[1].

These figures are averages. The actual amount of transitional relief varied according to a household's council tax banding, its composition and its previous liability for community charge.

[1] Information for 1995–96 is provisional and is subject to final grant claims to be made during 1996–97.

Wildlife Habitat

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking to ensure that wildlife which is dependent on the mudflats and grazing marsh of the Thames upstream of Gravesend and Tilbury is fully protected; and if he will make a statement. [29864]

Mr. Clappison: The most important areas for wildlife, West Thurrock lagoon and marshes and the inner Thames marshes, are notified as sites of special scientific interest. All areas of inter-tidal mud are acknowledged as being important for wildlife in the Thurrock borough local plan, deposit draft, and in the respective London boroughs' unitary development plans to varying degrees and are so annotated. A partnership of the main managers of the Thames has worked together to produce a Thames estuary management plan which will be launched for public consultation shortly. This inter-disciplinary plan is in line with recommendations in the UK biodiversity action plan to which the Government responded on 15 May, Cm. 3260.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30060]

Sir Paul Beresford: The deregulation initiative in the Department of the Environment is co-ordinated by two career civil servants, at grade 7 and higher executive officer level. Since it does not account for the whole of their workload, and all policy divisions devote resources to implementation of the initiative, it is not possible to define an overall annual budget. The deregulation unit in the Health and Safety Executive comprises one part-time and four full-time career civil servants, at grade 7, senior executive officer, higher executive officer, executive officer and administrative assistant level, who work solely on deregulation matters. It does not have a separate budget.

Regeneration Spending

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total sum spent by Government Departments on regeneration in the last year for which figures are available. [30125]

Sir Paul Beresford: Economic, social and physical regeneration is supported through main programme expenditure by a number of Government Departments—including on housing, training and education, business support and other programmes. This main programme expenditure is supplemented by targeted programmes which have been brought together into the single regeneration budget. The provisional out-turn figure for SRB expenditure in 1995–96 is £1,358 million. Details about SRB expenditure is contained in the Department's 1996 annual report presented to Parliament on 20 March.

Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981

Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for changes to the existing system for registering the bird species listed in schedule 4 to the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981; and if he will make a statement. [30585]

Mr. Clappison: My Department has been reviewing the scheme of fees for registration of certain bird species under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 and the Wildlife and Countryside (Registration and Ringing of Certain Captive Birds) Regulations 1982, Statutory Instrument No. 1221.

In the light of this review uncertainty has arisen concerning the power to charge for registration of certain bird species under regulation 3. We have concluded that certain changes are required.

Accordingly, I propose to introduce a Bill, at the earliest possible opportunity, to clarify the powers to charge such fees. The Bill will, if Parliament agrees:

- provide a clear statutory basis for the charges levied in the past under the 1982 regulations;
- enable the Department to seek to recover fees in respect of registrations made between today's date and the date when the Bill's provisions come into force; and enable the Department to continue to levy charges in the future in respect of these registrations.

As from today, therefore, I shall not be requiring the payment of any fee in respect of registrations under the 1982 regulations, pending the commencement of the proposed new statutory provisions. However, if and when this legislation comes into effect, my Department will be seeking to recover fees in respect of registrations made from today until the new statutory provisions come into force.

This announcement and the proposal to legislate does not affect the requirement in section 7 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 for keepers of specimens of bird species listed in schedule 4 to that Act to ring such birds and register them with the Department. It relates solely to the power to charge for such registrations.

The proposed legislation will also cover fees previously collected by the Department under Statutory Instrument No. 1219/1982, the Wildlife and Countryside (registration to sell etc. certain dead birds) Regulations 1982. The scheme was discontinued on 1 January 1995

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes he proposes to the existing framework for compulsory competitive tendering from local authority housing management and professional services. [30643]

Sir Paul Beresford: Yes. Compulsory competitive tendering is improving the standards of local government services and delivering greater efficiency. However, the implementation of CCT for professional services and housing management has given rise to significant criticism from private sector bidders and professionals about the approach which many authorities have taken. They consider that many authorities are frustrating competition by any means at their disposal. Equally, local authorities have said that the competition is too weak to justify the start-up costs of competition. Against this background, the Secretary of State has reviewed progress on implementation to date and the preparations which local authorities are making for future CCT. This has confirmed the need for changes.

A consultation paper has been published today which sets out the details on the changes which the Secretary of State is minded to make. The proposals involve selective increases in the competition requirements, most notably a new 65 per cent. competition requirement on finance services, tightening-up the rules on the credits and allowances which local authorities can offset against the competition requirement, and changes to the values below which authorities do not need to go out to competition, most notably on housing management services. These changes will complement the new guidance on competition which was issued earlier this year and the robust line being taken with cases of anti-competitive behaviour by particular authorities.

A copy of the consultation paper, which invites comments by Tuesday 2 July, has been placed in the Library.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further steps he is taking to encourage private finance initiatives in local government. [30644]

Mr. Curry: Since launching the local government private finance initiative in October 1994, we have encouraged links with the private sector by making important changes to the capital finance rules. These have been welcomed by authorities, but we promised to go even further.

I am today announcing radical measures to help local authorities harness private-sector finance and management expertise. In many cases these will remove genuine private finance projects from local authority capital spending limits and provide revenue support for such projects. My aim is to encourage the provision of privately-financed and serviced facilities such as schools, leisure centres, transport schemes and police stations. I hope local authorities will take maximum advantage of these new opportunities.

Provided that schemes meet certain risk transfer tests in the regulations, and subject to the usual requirement for value-for-money appraisal, local authorities will in future be able to provide their services using facilities delivered under private-sector contracts, without any cost whatsoever to their capital resources.

The new regulations will define the circumstances in which such contracts need make no charge on authorities' capital resources. In summary eligible contracts will be those where:

the contractor is providing a service to a defined standard, responsibility for designing, building, financing, and operating any physical assets rests with the contractor, the authority's payments are directly related to performance or usage, or both, and vary according to the availability and quality of the service. If the service falls significantly below expectations the level of payments should be no more than 70 per cent. of that anticipated. This will mean the acceptance of real risk by the private sector.

We envisage that these regulations will cover the bulk of worthwhile PFI cases, and will give a clear target for authorities and prospective contractors to aim at. However, where the project is not strictly eligible under the regulations but nevertheless involves significant risk for the private-sector partner, we will allow authorities a second chance to protect their capital resources. Government Departments will be able to issue additional supplementary credit approvals on a case by case basis for PFI schemes meeting more flexible criteria than those in the regulations.

We recognise that these measures, while eliminating the capital impact of qualifying projects, could leave pressures on the revenue account. To combat this, we will ensure that authorities undertaking projects will be eligible for revenue support. This will be arranged by adapting the existing system of standard spending assessments and revenue support grant.

My Department will be consulting local authority associations and other interested bodies on these proposal. It is hoped to publish draft capital finance regulations for consultation within a few weeks, and to lay them before the House in time for them to come into effect in the autumn.

Construction Industry (West Midlands)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people in the west midlands were employed in the construction industry in each year since 1990; and for each year what was the percentage change on the previous year. [30155]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The information is as follows:

Construction employment in west midlands

	Employees		Employees and self-employed
	Number	Percentage change	Number	Percentage change
Spring 1990	101,100	—	174,100	—
Spring 1991	97,000	–4	158,000	–9
Spring 1992	88,300	–9	153,300	–3
Spring 1993	78,800	–11	139,800	–9
Spring 1994	72,100	–8	141,100	+1
Spring 1995	76,000	+5	145,000	+3

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many (a) private and (b) social houses, have been built in the west midlands in each year since 1990; and for each year what was the percentage change on the previous year. [30157]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The figures requested are as follows:

Housebuilding completions: West Midlands region

	Private enterprise		Housing association		Local authority		Total
	Numbers of dwellings	Change from previous year (per cent.)	Numbers of dwellings	Change from previous year (per cent.)	Numbers of dwellings	Change from previous year (per cent.)	Numbers of dwellings	Change from previous years (per cent.)
1990	13,200	+3.9	2,100	+70.9	1,100	+4.3	16,400	+9.5
1991	13,600	+3.1	1,531	+27.7	1,100	–13.2	16,100	–2.0
1992	12,200	–9.9	2,300	+53.2	400	–60.9	15,000	–6.6
1993	13,200	+7.5	2,900	+23.8	200	–49.3	16,300	+8.3
1994	12,700	–3.4	3,100	+5.4	200	–4.1	16,000	–1.9
1995	12,500	–1.9	2,700	–13.2	100	–43.0	15,200	–4.6

Figures individually rounded, so the total may not be the exact sum of the component series. Percentage changes calculated on the unrounded figures.

These figures are based on reports to the Department by local authorities and the National House Building Council, and include estimates for those local authorities that have not provided statistical returns for their districts.

While these figures cover newly built accommodation, housing associations also provide additional social lettings by the rehabilitation of existing properties and through the various home ownership incentive schemes. Local authorities also provide a significant number of additional new lettings through cash incentive schemes. The relative importance of incentive schemes has been growing with the greater emphasis being placed on making more effective use of existing stock.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many construction industry companies in the west midlands closed in each year since 1990; and for each year what was the percentage change on the previous year. [30156]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 20 May 1996]: Information in the form requested is not available. The following is the available information:

VAT Deregistrations in the construction industry: West Midlands

	Number deregistered	Percentage change on previous year
1992	3,396	n/a
1993	3,051	–10
1994	2,275	–25

VAT deregistrations are not synonymous with business closures and estimates for 1993 and 1994 include adjustments for the effect of the VAT threshold increase in November 1993.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many social houses were built in the west midlands in 1979. [30158]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 20 May 1996]: Figures reported to the Department by local authorities show that there were some 2,000 housing association dwellings and 8,900 local authority and new town new dwellings completed in the West Midlands region during 1979.

Oil Spills, River Mersey

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the detergents used in the clean up operations following oil spills in the River Mersey from 1980 up to the latest spill; and if he will list each detergent's constituent chemical elements. [29716]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 20 May 1996]: I understand that neither North West Water Authority nor the National Rivers Authority used detergents as a dispersant in incidents of this kind. It is possible that other bodies may have made limited use of detergents. If this is the case, I shall write to the hon. Member with the relevant information.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agriculture Policy

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what financial contribution to the European Union common agricultural policy was paid by each of the member states in 1995. [29722]

Mr. Baldry: Member states contribute to the European Community budget as a whole, and not to parts of it. A breakdown of member states' gross contributions to the European Community budget in the 1995 Supplementary and Amending Budget No. 1, Official Report L276 of 20 November 1995, page 39, a copy of which has been placed in the House Library.

Animal Feed

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the animal feed products currently on sale to UK farmers which (a) include and (b) do not include a clear list of contents on the packaging. [29579]

Mrs. Browning: All compound feeds are required by the Feeding Stuffs Regulations to carry lists of ingredients either by their specific name or by category.

Meat Hygiene Service

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent reports he has received about prohibited parts of cattle finding their way into the food chain; in how many cases such material had been certified fit for human consumption by the Meat Hygiene Service; what inquiry has been undertaken as to how these errors occurred; how many officials have been disciplined; what was the average length of time to identify such material; and if he will make a statement. [28459]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to the hon. Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry) on 30 April, Official Report, columns 483-84.

Civil Servants

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the companies which have civil servants from his Departments as directors, and for each company, the occasions on which it has been found guilty of improper trading or misrepresentation of company financial status in the last five years. [29252]

Mr. Boswell: The following companies currently have civil servants from my Department as non executive directors under the "Guide to Non-Executive Directorships for Civil Servants":

H. R. Wallingford
The Albert Fisher Group PLC
Cadbury Ltd.

As to "improper trading or misrepresentation of company financial status", there are no such offences in law.

Goosanders

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications he has received in each of the last five years for licences to kill goosanders; how many of these were granted; and how many birds were killed. [29840]

Mrs. Browning: The information requested is as follows:

	Number of applications received	Number of licences granted	Actual number shot
January–December 1992	0	0	0
January 1993–April 1994	11	7	39
May 1994–April 1995	28	0	0
May 1995–March 1996[1]	25	5	[2]2

Statistics on licences are now collated for the period 1 May to 30 April., Prior to 1994, figures were collated on a calendar year basis.

[1] Latest information available.

[2] Provisional figures.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the assessment of damage to fisheries underlying each licence to kill goosanders issued in 1996; what other methods were evaluated to tackle the problem; and if he will make a statement. [29842]

Mrs. Browning: Where licences were granted to shoot a limited number of goosanders as an aid to scaring, the Ministry was satisfied that serious damage was being caused to the fisheries. A wide range of alternative non-lethal scaring methods had been tried, for example, gas and rope bangers, rockets, horns, shooting blanks, human presence, but were found to be ineffective.

Fishing Vessels (Decommissioning)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what has been the total cost to public funds of all registered fishing vessels decommissioned over each of the last five years; [30366]

(2) what plans he has to promote further decommissioning of the United Kingdom's registered fishing vessels. [30367]

Mr. Baldry: There were no UK decommissioning schemes in 1991 and 1992. The 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96 schemes have cost £7.8 million, £8.8 million and £9.6 million respectively.

In the light of experience with these schemes, a consultation paper was issued seeking views on possible improvements to the arrangements. These are reflected in the details of the 1996–97 scheme announced on 9 May, for which some £13 million is available. There is currently provision of up to £12 million for a further scheme in 1997–98.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number of United Kingdom registered vessels fishing for demersal species in the North sea over the past five years together with the total size of the demersal catch, the total value of the demersal catch and the number of demersal vessels decommissioned during each of the last five years for which figures are available. [30365]

Mr. Baldry: Figures showing the landed quantity and value of demersal fish, including nephrops, caught in the North sea, ICES area IV, for the years 1991–1994 inclusive are given in table 1.

These include species for which there is no mandatory reporting requirement in respect of fishing activity. Moreover, fishing activity is generally recorded in terms of total effort deployed by stocks and area. Extracting the information requested about numbers of vessels would involve disproportionate cost and fail to give a complete picture of activity in relation to all demersal species in the North sea.

Table 2 gives details of the number of vessels decommissioned in each round of the current programme by broad demersal segment.

Table 1: Landings of demersal species, including nephrops, by the UK fleet of catches in the North Sea: quantity and value

	1991	1992	1993	1994

Fishing (Irish Box)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many fishing vessels from other EU member states have fished in the Irish box since 1 January; which EU flags they were flying; what is the estimate of the tonnage caught by these vessels; and what were the principal ports where they landed their catches. [30368]

Mr. Baldry: The Irish box comprises waters which fall within both British and Irish fishery limits. Information about the total number of fishing vessels from other member states which have fished in the Irish box since 1 January 1996, the tonnage of fish caught by these vessels and the principal ports at which that catch was landed is not available on a systematic basis.

New regulations to monitor fishing effort in western waters including the Irish box came into operation on 1 January this year. They apply to vessels over 18m in overall length, 15m between perpendiculars, with effort ceilings being set for the over 18m fleet of each member state by the principal types of fishery other than those for pelagic fish. Vessels over 18m from Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Ireland, Netherlands, Spain and the United Kingdom are permitted to fish in the Irish box within the effort ceilings which have been set. The number of Spanish vessels permitted to fish in the Irish box is limited to a maximum of 40 at any one time.

Fishing (Spanish and Dutch Ships)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the amount of fish caught by (a) Spanish (b) Dutch flagged ships which is eventually marketed in the United Kingdom. [30370]

Mr. Baldry: Information on the amount of fish which is caught by such ships and which is eventually marketed in the United Kingdom is not available. In 1994 we estimate that Spanish and Dutch flagged ships landed about 2,150 and 2,200 tonnes of fish into the UK respectively. Some of this fish may subsequently have been exported.

UK-registered Fishing Vessels

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate how many vessels previously registered in other EU member states are now registered as United Kingdom fishing vessels; and what estimate he has made of the annual tonnage of fish caught by vessels so registered for each of the last three years for which figures are available. [30369]

Mr. Baldry: Information on the number of current UK fishing vessels previously registered in other member states and the tonnage of fish which they have caught over the last three years is not available.

Under the UK merchant shipping regulations it is possible for vessels previously registered in other member states or third countries to be registered as fishing vessels in the UK. But such vessels would not be permitted to fish for profit without acquiring a licence from UK Fisheries Departments. Under our present restrictive licensing arrangements no new licences are granted and an owner wishing to fish with a vessel new to the UK fleet would need to obtain a licence from a previously licensed vessel.

Common Fisheries Policy

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the benefits assessed by his Department as accruing to the United Kingdom fishing fleet from the common fisheries policy. [30363]

Mr. Baldry: The benefits to the United Kingdom fishing industry flowing from the common fisheries policy include:

- tighter restrictions than applied before we joined the Community on access by foreign vessels within our 12 mile fishery limits;
- restrictions on access to areas such as the Shetland box and the Irish box;
- a larger share of fish quotas in Community waters than was justified by our historic catch record in the 1973 to 1978 reference period used when quota shares were decided;
- fishing opportunities in the waters of non-member states secured through the Community's bilateral agreements with those countries;
- access to European Community grant schemes;
- a co-ordinated policy to reduce the size of fleets of all member states;
- a common policy on conservation rules enabling us to influence the rules applied in the waters of other member states to the benefit of our industry;
- monitoring of enforcement standards in all member states by the European Commission.

Fishing (200-mile Limit)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps would be required to regain control of the fishing effort within 200 miles of the United Kingdom coast. [30364]

Mr. Baldry: The United Kingdom has never exercised exclusive control over fishing effort within 200 miles of its coast. We would have to leave the common fisheries policy in order to do so; I explained to the House on 22 November 1995 at column 591 the steps necessary for that to happen.

Fish Stocks

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what assessment he has made of the impact of the enlargement of the EU on the viability of fish stocks in the North sea; [30372]

(2) if he will make a statement on the measures under consideration to conserve pressure fish stocks in EU waters during the current negotiations leading to enlargement of the EU. [30371]

Mr. Baldry: Negotiations for the further enlargement of the European Union are not scheduled to start until after the conclusion of the intergovernmental conference. Any impact on fish stocks will depend on a number of factors including the terms and timing of accession by the countries concerned, developments in the industry and developments in fisheries policy within the European Union where measures currently under consideration to conserve stocks include further reduction in fishing effort, new technical conservation rules and improved enforcement measures.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies) of 24 April, Official Report, column 209, on what date each animal was confirmed to have been suffering from BSE. [29410]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 15 May 1996]: The following table gives the dates of birth of the 10 youngest cattle, including estimated ages, and the date at which BSE was confirmed:

Date of birth	Date of BSE confirmation
Autumn 1986	31 January 1989
January 1987	24 July 1989
November 1987	28 November 1989

November 1988	26 March 1991
June 1989	20 January 1992
October 1990	20 May 1993

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many, and what percentage, of the maternal transmission test group study by the veterinary laboratory at Weybridge have been diagnosed as suffering from BSE. [29345]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 15 May 1996]: Forty-seven or 7 per cent. of the 630 study animals have so far developed BSE.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what preliminary assessment he has made as to the most likely cause of BSE in those animals in the maternal transmission test group study by the veterinary laboratory at Weybridge that have been diagnosed as suffering from BSE. [29346]

Mr. Browning [holding answer 15 May 1996]: The detailed cohort study into the possibility of maternal transmission of BSE will not be complete until early 1997. Some information about this experiment has been published in the progress report on BSE laid in the Library of the House in November 1995, but the result cannot be interpreted until it is complete. As the study is being carried out blind we do not know whether the 47 animals which have succumbed to BSE in the trial are offspring of BSE cases or whether they are control animals. The details of these animals are given in the table.

In all cases the farms of origin for the animals in this study have had cases of BSE, notably in the experimental animals dams, which indicates that some exposure to contaminated feed did occur on the farms. To take account of this a control animal was purchased from the same farm as the offspring of a confirmed case.

Until the experiment is completed and the results unblinded and analysed, it will not be possible to say whether maternal transmission of BSE can account for any of the cases, or whether all should be attributed to contaminated feed.

Distribution of confirmed cases in the offspring study by month of birth and period at 1 May 1996

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the means of disposal for the remains of cattle aged 30 months or over following processing of carcasses at rendering plants as part of the scheme to eradicate bovine spongiform encephalopathy from British herds. [29654]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 16 May 1996]: My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced in the House on 16 April, Official Report, col. 513 that, following the process of rendering, the resultant material would be disposed of by the best practicable environmental option. The Government are actively pursuing the ways and means of achieving this objective and a further statement will be made when conclusions have been reached.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cattle were slaughtered in the United Kingdom under the 30–month scheme in the week beginning Monday 29 April. [28919]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 20 May 1996]: One hundred cattle were slaughtered in the United Kingdom under the scheme in the week beginning 29 April.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with under (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29415]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The Ministry's policy is to review the need for performance bonds in the light of the value and complexity of the contract to be let. The Ministry has occasionally used performance bonds which would allow it to call in financial guarantees should a contractor fail to meet specified standards. These would be used to compensate the Ministry should a contractor fail to complete a contract because of, say, liquidation or default. The Ministry regards "on demand" performance bonds as unjust and undesirable. The Ministry believes that bonds are not always necessary and are no substitute for considered judgments about the risks of a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources of the chosen contractor. These factors will vary for each contract independent of the size of the contractor.

From records held centrally no performance bonds have been called in during the last five years.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29462]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 20 May 1996]: Data extracted from its financial management system reveals that the Ministry, including its six next steps agencies, paid the sum of £262.98 million to the private sector for goods and services in the financial year 1995–96.

Food Labelling Regulations

Mr. Key: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to publish the consolidated food labelling regulations; when they will come into force; and if they will be accompanied by guidance notes published on the same day. [29921]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The Government expect to lay regulations before Parliament by 7 June. These will come into force on 1 July and the accompanying guidelines will be published on the same day.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

20. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to appoint the independent complaints adjudicator for the Child Support Agency. [28824]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: An independent complaints examiner will be recruited for the Child Support Agency later this year following a pilot study to assess how best to support the examiner's operations.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the alleged child maintenance arrears and background calculations for CSA Ref. 1003420826; and for what reasons he has received documentation requiring payments in the year 2001, when his youngest child will be 24 years of age. [29867]

Mr. Mitchell: The Child Support Agency is charged with collecting legally due maintenance. Any arrears agreement negotiated is based on the amount of debt and the absent parent's ability to pay. The payment of arrears may, therefore, continue after the child has reached the age where regular maintenance is no longer due. The chief executive of the Child Support Agency, Miss Ann Chant, will write to the hon. Member separately detailing the circumstances of the case referred to.

Child Support

24. Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what number of parents in one-parent families are entitled to child support; and of these, what proportion are receiving it. [28828]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: It is not known how many parents in one-parent families could obtain child support from the other parent if they applied for it. However, 341,500 parents with care, including 29,100 in two-parent families, had a full maintenance assessment from the Child Support Agency in November 1995. This includes 96,000 cases where the absent parent is assessed to pay nothing. In 60 per cent. of the remaining cases, maintenance is being paid in full or in part.

Benefit Fraud

14. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he is taking to tackle housing benefit fraud. [28818]

Mr. Heald: On 5 March my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced a series of measures including an £8 million challenge fund to develop local authority innovation against fraud and a data-matching service to detect fraudulent benefit claims. These will not only step up the fight against housing benefit fraud, but also move towards preventing fraud from getting into the system in the first place.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many staff in his Department have been employed full time in tackling social security fraud for each year since 1979. [30419]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the list:

1991–92: 3,344

1992–93: 3,344

1993–94: 3,328

1994–95: 3,363

1995–96: 3,793.5

1996–97: 5,046.

Notes

1. The numbers relate to staff employed in the benefit fraud investigation service (formerly sector fraud), organised fraud teams and staff employed on instrument of payment anti-fraud initiatives.

2. Prior to the creation of the Benefits Agency in April 1991, staff employed on fraud investigation duties were part of the local and regional office complement and information relating to numbers employed are not available.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the savings accruing to public funds from campaigns against benefit fraud in each since 1979. [30416]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Year	Savings £ million
1986–87	144
1987–88	196
1988–89	262
1989–90	309
1990–91	341
1991–92	446
1992–93	558
1993–94	654
1994–95	717

Notes:

1. Savings from the Department's anti-fraud measures have only been routinely collected from 1986–87.

2. Finalised figures for 1995–96 are not yet available.

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what estimate he has made of the annual amount of money lost through fraud in child benefit payments; [30311]

(2) how many successful prosecutions there have been in the last year relating to child benefit fraud. [30312]

Mr. Heald: The information requested is not available.

The Benefits Agency is undertaking a series of benefit reviews which determine the amount of incorrectness, including fraud, in each benefit reviewed. Over the five-year period of the security strategy launched by the Secretary of State in July 1995, all the major benefits, including child benefit, will be reviewed.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much is being spent on the publicity campaign to tackle benefit fraud, set out by parliamentary constituency. [30421]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available in the format requested as costings specific to parliamentary constituencies are not kept. However, to date the estimated total publicity costs for the first seven areas of the anti-fraud campaign are £407,710.

This figure covers radio and printed advertising, leaflet and poster production and distribution and press support material production.

Pensions

16. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the level of pension contributions in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) other EU countries. [28820]

Mr. Heald: In 1994, employers and employees contributed almost £30 billion to occupational and personal pension schemes in the United Kingdom. It is this level of commitment that has generated pension funds of nearly £600 billion—substantially more than is invested in all the other countries in the European Union put together.

18. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement concerning the level of funds currently held in the United Kingdom for private pension provision; and what assessment he has made of the level of funding relative to that in other European Union countries. [28822]

Mr. Heald: In 1993, the total value of funds in private pension schemes in the United Kingdom was nearly £600 billion. This is substantially more than the latest estimate of the level of funds in all the other countries in the European Union put together.

25. Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of the retired population will have occupational pensions by 2006. [28829]

Mr. Heald: The information is not available in the form requested. The Department's pensioner incomes simulation model projects that in 2010 more than 75 per cent. of pensioner units will be in receipt of payments from an occupational pension.

Details of the methodology and assumptions used in the model, and a brief overview of basic results, will appear in a technical paper to be released shortly.

Notes:

For the purposes of PENSIM, a pensioner unit is defined as a single pensioner over state pension age in 2010, or a couple with at least one partner over state pension age.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of pensioners over the age of 80 years, who receive the extra 25p per week on their state retirement pension. [29992]

Mr. Heald: At 30 September 1995, there were 2.4 million people over age 80 who received the 25p age addition to their state retirement pension.

Source:

5 per cent. sample of the pension strategy computer system.

Notes:

1. All people in receipt of the state retirement pension aged 80 or over, including people who qualify for a non-contributory retirement pension, receive the 25p addition.
2. The figure is rounded to the nearest 0.1 million.

Child Benefit

15. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the number of parents with children aged 16 to 19 years who receive child benefit; and what representations he has received about the payment of child benefit to them. [28819]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The latest figures available indicate that at 31 December 1995 there were 1.09 million families receiving child benefit in respect of children aged over 16 and under 19 in full-time non-advanced education. I have received only one letter questioning the payment of child benefit in respect of those over 16.

23. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people between 16 and 19 years in full-time education are currently in receipt of child benefit. [28827]

Mr. Mitchell: At the end of last year child benefit was payable in respect of 1.16 million people aged over 16 and under 19, in full-time non-advanced education. Entitlement to child benefit will continue until they leave that education or reach age 19, whichever is sooner.

27. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the cost of child benefit for 16 to 18-year-olds in 1995–96; and if he will make a statement. [28831]

Mr. Mitchell: The estimate of child benefit expenditure for 1995–96 in respect of 16 to 18-year-olds is around £640 million.

I believe that all families with dependent children should receive some help from either the tax or benefit system, a principle recognised throughout Europe and beyond.

The Government have a manifesto pledge to continue to pay child benefit to all families in respect of all children, including 16 to 18-year-olds in full-time non-advanced education, and to uprate it in line with prices. We have honoured that pledge.

Lone Parents

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the average age of the income support claims withdrawn by parents with care following action by the Child Support Agency or liable relatives section in (a) 1995 and (b) 1992. [29673]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information requested is not available.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parents were on income support in each year since 1989. [29674]

Mr. Roger Evans: The information available is set out in the table.

Lone parents receiving income support

Year	Number of claimants
1989	756,000
1990	793,000
1991	871,000
1992	957,000
1993	1,013,000
1994	1,039,000
1995	1,056,000

1. Numbers have been rounded to the nearest thousand.
2. Lone parents are defined as claimants receiving the lone parent premium.
3. Sample size 1 in 20.

Income Support

17. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what number and proportion of children under 10 years old are in families receiving income support. [28821]

Mr. Roger Evans: The number of children under 10 years old in families on income support in May 1995 was just over 2 million. This is approximately 27 per cent. of the total number of children under 10 years old in Great Britain.

Notes:

1. May 1995 is the latest available data in Income Support recipients.
2. Latest available estimates for the GB population relate to mid-94, the proportion is therefore based upon mid-94 population estimates.
3. Source: Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiry—May 1995. Population Estimates Unit, ONS.

19. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families with children have been dependent on income support for five or more years; and what proportion this is of the total. [28823]

Mr. Evans: Information is not available in the form requested. However, in May 1995 there were 685,000 families with children—nearly 44 per cent. of the total—who had been on income support for three years or more.

Notes:

1. Numbers have been rounded to the nearest thousand.
2. May 1995 is the latest date for which data are available.

Reduced Earnings Allowance

21. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations he has received about reduced earnings allowance; and if he will make a statement. [28825]

Mr. Roger Evans: Reduced earnings allowance continues to be paid as before to anyone who is under pensionable age or continuing in regular employment. A number of hon. Members have written to Ministers about the amendments to regulations from 24 March which brought in fairer rules for the transfer of people on reduced earnings allowance to retirement allowance when they reach pensionable age and give up regular employment.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the operation of the reduced earnings allowance. [28909]

Mr. Evans: Parliament agreed, in passing the 1988 Social Security Act, that compensation for loss of earnings through reduced earnings allowance should continue to past pension age only for those men and women who continued in regular employment. Otherwise it should cease and be replaced by retirement allowance, payable at no more than 25 per cent. of the rate of reduced earnings allowance.

Amendment regulations which came into force on 24 March ensure this principle is applied fairly and consistently. These regulations were debated in Standing Committee on 8 May 1996.

Habitual Residence Test

22. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current cost of administering the habitual residence test; and what savings in benefits have been made in the current calendar year following the introduction of the test. [28826]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) on 23 April, Official Report, column 131.

Pensioners Poverty

26. Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for Social security what action he proposes to take to tackle poverty among pensioners. [28830]

Mr. Heald: Our policy has been to increase the basic retirement pension in line with the annual rise in prices, encourage personal provision through occupational and private pensions and to target additional resources on poorer pensioners through income-related benefits. Between 1979 and 1993 pensioners' average income increased by more than 50 per cent.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the percentage success rate for applications for incapacity benefit at each Benefits Agency office in Scotland for each month up to the most recent available; what was the number of appeals against refusal; and what percentage were successful in each case. [29280]

Mr. Burt: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. George Foulkes, dated 20 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what was the percentage success rate for applications for Incapacity Benefit (IB) at each Benefit Agency (BA) office in Scotland for each month up to the most recent available; what was the number of appeals against refusal; and what percentage were successful in each case.

The attached tables give details of the percentage success rate for applications for IB at each BA office in Scotland. The information requested for the number of appeals against refusal on application and the percentage that are successful is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

The following table shows the percentage of successful (applications) claims to incapacity benefit for 1995–96. These decisions are made prior to the application of the IB all work test.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30061]

Mr. Heald: The information is in the table.

DSS Deregulation Unit

Budget 1996–97	Staff Civil servants Grade	Number	Staff Seconded from business
	UG7	0.75[1]
£88,000	HEO	2.00[1]	None
	AA	0.25
	Total (wte)[2]	3.00

[1] Have experience of the private sector.
[2] Whole-time equivalent.

Bronchitis and Emphysema

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he has received a report on the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council's review of the prescription for industrial injuries disablement benefit purposes of chronic bronchitis and emphysema in underground coal workers; and if he will make a statement. [30645]

Mr. Roger Evans: My right hon. Friend the Secretary for State has today laid a copy of the council's report before Parliament, Cm 3240. As with all Industrial Injuries Advisory Council reports, it will be given careful consideration. We will respond to the council's recommendations once the medical, administrative and financial issues raised by the report have been fully examined.

Claimant Statistics

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate (a) the number of people claiming means-tested in-work benefits, (b) the number of claimants' adult dependants and (c) the number of their children in (i) 1979 and (ii) 1995. [27830]

Mr. Burt [holding answer 2 May 1996]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Figures for 1994 are given as this is the last year for which complete information is available.

Persons claiming means–tested in–work benefits[1]

Notes:
[1] Means tested in-work benefits are defined as family income supplement/family credit, disability working allowance and housing benefit and council tax benefit paid direct to people with earnings who are not on income support. The same individual may be claiming more than one benefit.
[2] Numbers are rounded to the nearest thousand except for disability working allowance where exact figures are quoted.
[3] Comparable data on housing benefit and council tax benefit is not available for 1979.
[4] Data for housing benefit and council tax benefit is not available for 1995.
[5] The figures include estimates due to the data collection procedure in Scotland.
[6] Adult dependants are defined as the partner of the claimant.
[7] Family credit replaced family income supplement in April 1988.
[8] Disability working allowance was introduced in April 1992.
[9] Approximate figure based on number of families with varying multiples of children.

Departmental Property (Newcastle)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects the tender board for the rationalisation of his Department's land and buildings in Newcastle upon Tyne to reach a recommendation on choice of tenders; when he expects to make a decision; and if he will communicate his decision to the hon. Members for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central and for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown). [30427]

Mr. Heald: A recommendation as to the choice of the preferred supplier for the DSS Newcastle estate development project is due to be made early in June. My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State will make a decision following careful consideration of the recommendation. A copy of the announcement will be placed in the Library.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Central Office of Information

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if staff from the Central Office of Information will be allowed to put in a bid for work earmarked for market testing which they currently carry out for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office; and if he will make a statement. [29981]

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 23 November 1995, Official Report, column 235. I have decided that COI's activities should become more closely focused and it would not be compatible with this aim for COI to compete in market tests carried out by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Andersen Consulting

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on how many public sector computer projects Andersen Consulting has advised since 1985; how many of these and which have (a) been substantially delayed and (b) failed; and how many claims for compensation against Andersen are now in progress. [29996]

Mr. Freeman: The information requested is not held centrally and it would be disproportionately expensive to obtain it. From the information that I have, which may not be complete, I can say that since 1993 the following contracts have been awarded to Andersen Consulting:

Department of Social Services/War Pensions Agency—War Pensions Project, 1993;

MOD/Procurement Executive—ASPECT study and report, 1993;

MOD/Navy—WRAM project, 1993;

Department of Employment—Image Processing, 1993;

MOD/Navy—ACCESS project, 1995;

Department of Social Services/Contributions Agency—National Insurance Recording System 2, 1995;

Employment Service; Department of Social Services/Benefits Agency jobseeker's allowance review and implementation, 1995.

None of these projects has been substantially delayed and none has failed. So far as I am aware from the information available to me, there are no claims for compensation against Andersen in progress, but this information is not held centrally and it would cost a disproportionate amount to collect it.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list for each of his Department's agencies what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide; and what were the results. [30047]

Mr. Willetts: The market testing of services provided by this Department's agencies is a matter for their chief executives and for their customers. I have asked the chief executives to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from N. E. Borrett to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 May 1996:

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has asked me to reply to your Question about the market testing of our services.

Property Advisers to the Civil Estate (PACE) was set up on 1 April this year following Ministers' decision to implement the findings of an Efficiency Scrutiny Report on the Management of the Government's Civil Estate. The roles of PACE set out in the Scrutiny recommendations which by their nature have to be performed in the public sector aim to ensure that the benefits of a centrally managed estate are retained following the transfer to departments of full responsibility for the properties they occupy.

The Agency has a key role to promote co-operation between departments to enable them to obtain best value for money in the management of their properties. This may either be in relation to departments' or agencies' activity in the property market or promoting opportunities for inter-departmental rationalisation.

PACE also provides a single central point for the provision of general property advice. The Central Advice Unit (CAU) was set up a year in advance of the Agency to assist departments taking on their new responsibilities.

Where departments decide that it will not be economic to retain skills in-house, PACE provides intelligent client support on repayment terms. By charging for this particular service PACE are, in effect, being market tested by departments because the work would otherwise be carried out by their own staff.

The Agency has been reconstituted out of Property Holdings (PH), which ceased to exist at the end of March. Since 1990, PH had managed the Government's Common User Estate (CUE), comprising mainly general purpose office property. PACE has therefore as a result inherited considerable experience in procuring and managing private sector services. Though maintenance responsibilities for some buildings on the CUE had been passed to departments, PH remained largely responsible for estates and most works services. In its last year (1995/96) PH had funding of £550 million for rents and £127 million for maintenance and new works. All estates and works services were undertaken by consultants and contractors in the private sector. During the early years of PH's existence services previously handled within Government by the Property Services Agency (PSA) had all been market tested. Consultants analysed Property Holdings savings from market testing. The level of fees paid under market tested commissions in 1992–93 were estimated to be some 40% less than the rates charged in the previous year under supply and service arrangements with the PSA.

Letter from Mike Devereau to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 20 May 1996:

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has asked me to reply, in respect of the Central Office of Information, to your question about the market testing of services.

COI has not market tested any of the services it provides for clients in the last year. Its activities are subject to constant market testing by customers who are under no obligation to use its services.

Letter from R. N. Edwards to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has asked me to reply to your question about market testing in his department's Agencies.

The Chessington Computer Centre has not carried out any market testing since April 1995. This is because Chessington has been working to prepare itself for privatisation in 1996.

The sale of Chessington is on target for late July.

There has however, been a steady programme of market tests carried out since April 95 by customers on the services we provide for them.

I hope this provides the information that you need. If it does not please do not hesitate to get in touch.

Letter from Robin Guenier to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 20 May 1996:

As Chief Executive of the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA), I am responding on behalf of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to your recent question raised about market testing of services provided by CCTA.

I am able to inform you that no services provided by CCTA have been market tested.

Letter from S. H. F. Hickey to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 20 May 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary has asked me to reply to your Question on the Market Testing that has been carried out into the services that the Civil Service College provides.

The College provides training and consultancy services to the Civil Service and also the wider public sector and internationally. We have no tied customers and thus are operating in a competitive market with other providers of these services. About three quarters of our income in 1995/96 came from open courses run mainly at Sunningdale Park and our London centre. The remainder of our work is single-client training and consultancy and is normally won following some form of competitive tendering which may well form part of our customers' market testing programmes.

The College carries out its own training and consultancy and we have not market tested any of this provision. We do however use a considerable amount of input from outside sources. Over 50% of teaching input is from non-Civil Service College Staff. This is a strategic decision to ensure quality, relevance and flexibility and ranges from associate lecturers doing individual sessions on a course to partnership with Price Waterhouse to jointly deliver courses on the Private Finance Initiative.

Ancillary services which include services which are provided by us to our customers, such as hotel and catering services, have been subject to market testing.

Letter from John King to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 21 May 1996:

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has asked me to write to you directly, with information about SAFE's market testing. This is in response to your recent PQ addressed to him.

SAFE is an Executive Agency with a remit to provide a range of security services to Government. It has no tied customers and as a result it is for our customers to choose to use the Agency and most do this through market testing or other forms of competitive bidding. The Agency undertakes a great variety work to a value of £40M to £45M per annum and I regret that it is impractical to list all the individual items.

Recently, the Agency did, however, initiate a major market test of one of its four operational units—the Inter Despatch Services (IDS). The IDS has a turnover of about £2½M per annum and the in-house team won against stiff competition from the private sector. The outcome has been significant price reductions for IDS customers.

Letter from Chris Penn to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 21 May 1996:

In the temporary absence of our Chief Executive, I have been asked to reply, so far as HMSO is concerned, to your Parliamentary question about the market-testing of the services provided by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster's agencies.

The cost-effectiveness of the services that HMSO offers is frequently tested in the market-place by our customers. There have been some losses but a significant and growing proportion of our business has been won in open competition.

In terms of our own programme of market-testing, HMSO has tested a number of key service areas over the years, and our Annual Reports have regularly recorded the results. In the last year or so, we have announced the outcome of two market tests covering important elements of our Publications distribution business. A test of the order and enquiry services was awarded jointly to the in-house team and a commercial telesales company, EWA Ltd of Chelmsford. The new service began at the start of the year and is already demonstrating improvements in service standards. These include much reduced telephone call waiting times, increases in the numbers of order lines processed and a more proactive response to customers' needs. More recently, the test of receipt, storage and distribution arrangements was awarded to the in-house team with the prospect of both service and cost improvements.

I hope this is helpful.

Letter from Dr. E. C. McCloy to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 20 May 1996:

Mr. Willetts, Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service, has asked me to reply to your question to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster asking him to list, for each of his department's agencies, the results of market testing of the services they provide.

In the period since 1 April 1995 no market testing was carried out of the services provided by the Occupational Health and Safety Agency (OHSA). As part of the privatisation process of the Agency some government departments have indicated that they may wish to market test the provision of occupational health services but no formal announcements have been made.

In the past (1994–95) the OHSA market tested the provision of laboratory services which resulted in an aggregate net value of efficiency gains of £7,000 in each of the three future financial years.

Letter from Craig Muir to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 21 May 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question concerning market testing into the services provided by Recruitment and Assessment Services (RAS).

As you are no doubt already aware, RAS was established as an Executive Agency on 1 April 1991. We provide recruitment, consultancy and related services to government departments, executive agencies and other public service bodies.

As a result of government departments and executive agencies being given responsibility to carry out their own recruitment above Executive Officer level in 1991 (with the exception of the most senior appointments and fast stream entrants), RAS was faced with the challenge of competing against private sector recruitment companies for public sector business

The great majority of RAS potential customers now subject recruitment agencies to market testing by competitive tendering on the range and quality of services they are able to provide before appointing the successful bidder. RAS is not immune from this process and our reaction from this increased competition was to continue to develop and expand the range of services and recruitment products we are able to offer, both to those who had decided to carry out their own recruitment (sometimes with our assistance) and to those who had selected RAS to run the recruitment campaign for them.

Despite a general decline in the number of appointments on offer, the wider range of services and products we are able to provide led to 1994–95 being our most successful year since our inception.

We had a marked increase in market penetration. Our share of Civil Service recruitment rose to 11% in 1994–95 (compared to 7% in 1993–94), and from a deficit of £333,000 in 1993–94 to a surplus of over £415,000 in 1994–95. There was also a significant increase in consultancy and other recruitment related services. In total, 1,173 consultancy days were provided in 1994–95, an increase of 146% over the previous year.

I hope that you will see from the above that the services of RAS are in the continuous process of marketing testing; it is only by remaining competitive and high on quality that we will maintain our position as the leading provider of recruitment and related services to a wider market as we head for privatisation later this year.

Letter from S. P. Sage to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 20 May 1996:

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has asked me to reply on behalf of the Buying Agency to your recent parliamentary question concerning the market testing of the services provided by the agencies for which his department is responsible.

You may find the following background useful. TBA is a government trading fund with a sales turnover this year projected at around £250m, an expenditure budget of £5m and 125 staff. The agency offers a full range of procurement services to its public sector customers.

TBA has no tied customers or business. It operates on a fully commercial basis and must continue to minimise costs in order for its services to remain competitively priced and attractive to customers. All TBA's services are market-tested regularly by customers, either as a result of winning business through competitive tenders or through customers' own price comparison exercises.

Her Majesty's Stationery Office

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has reached a decision on the short-list of bidders for HMSO. [30789]

Mr. Freeman: HMSO was advertised for sale in March, and a large number of organisations expressed interest in the sale. We subsequently received 14 indicative bids, and I am pleased to announce that the following parties have been short-listed:

an independent consortium backed by Mercury Asset Management, 3i and Capita;

a Hambros consortium;

National Publishing Group, a consortium led by Electra Fleming;

Westminster Information System, led by NatWest Ventures.

Each of these will now prepare final bids based on detailed information about HMSO and discussions with its management and staff.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Her Majesty's Stationery Office

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the House of Commons Commission, what progress has been made in drawing up a contract for the provision of printing and publishing services to the House after the privatisation of Her Majesty's Stationery Office. [30990]

Mr. Beith: A draft contract has been prepared by the House's legal advisers, and has been approved by the Commission for release to the short-listed organisations bidding for HMSO. A copy of the draft—excluding certain financial provisions which are commercially confidential—will be placed in the Library on Tuesday 4 June when the House returns from the spring adjournment. The Commission considers that the draft contract provides the safeguards stipulated in the Speaker's letter of 28 November 1995 to the Lord President of the Council, Official Report, 11 December 1995, columns 455–57.

The provisions of the draft contract are not subject to negotiation with the short-listed bidders.

TREASURY

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each of his agencies what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30045]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the chief executives of the Royal Mint, the Office for National Statistics, the Valuation Office and Paymaster agencies. I have asked each of them to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Longford to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 May 1996:

In your question to the Chancellor (ref: 30045) you ask what market testing has been carried out into the services provided by the Agency and what were the results.

The Valuation Office is an Executive Agency within the Inland Revenue and carries out valuations of land and buildings for a wide range of clients in the public sector throughout England, Wales and Scotland, including an estate surveying and valuation service for other government departments, public bodies and local authorities.

The main functions of the Valuation Office are to:

undertake rating and council tax valuation work in England and Wales; provide valuation services to the Inland Revenue in England, Wales and Scotland mainly in connection with inheritance tax and capital gains tax; provide various other statutory and non-statutory valuation services to Government Departments and the wider public sector in England, Wales and Scotland;

assess, make and recover contributions in lieu of rates in respect of Crown occupation of properties within the United Kingdom, Isle of Man and Gibraltar and make payments of rates in respect of properties in the United Kingdom occupied by overseas Governments;

Provide policy advice to Government Departments and Ministers on property valuation matters.

The initiative to undertake market testing for non-statutory work rests with other government departments, public bodies and local authorities and the Valuation Office responds by tendering on a regular basis for estate surveying and valuation services in competition with the private sector.

Please let me know if I can assist further.

Letter from Roger Holmes to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 May 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply to your Question about market testing.

The Royal Mint has operated as a trading fund since 1 April 1975 and already runs on a commercial basis with normal private sector disciplines rigorously applied. As a leading player in export markets with two-thirds of our sales overseas, all our sourcing decisions must be commercial. In these circumstances the Royal Mint does not operate a formal market testing programme, but managers review regularly whether goods and services should be provided internally or outsourced and, as a result, sub-contract or outsource a wide range of items.

I trust my reply is helpful.

Letter from Keith Sullens to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 May 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply to your Question asking if he will list for each of his agencies what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results.

The following tables show what services PAYMASTER has had market tested and what the results were:

Banking business

Service Market Tested	Result
56 NHS Trusts and Health Authorities	Either retained existing level of business or gained additional business in some cases
Teachers' Pensions Agency	Lost the banking transaction business but retained the vote funding element
NHS Pensions Agency	Retained
Countryside Council for Wales	Retained
Further Education Funding Council	Retained
Funding Agency for Schools	Won
English Nature	Part retained
BBSRC	Part retained

Pension services

Service Market Tested	Result
Teachers' Pensions Agency
Database and Payroll Services	Retained
Customer Services	Lost to in house bidder
NHS Pensions Agency
Pensioner Payroll and Administration	Retained via subcontract with MDIS
Pensioner Administration Computer System	Lost

Letter from Tim Hold to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 May 1996:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply to your Question of 17 May about market testing of services provided by the Office for National Statistics (ONS).

The ONS was created as a new government department and executive agency on 1 April 1996. It brought together the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys (OPCS) and the Central Statistical Office (CSO). This response provides information covering market tests completed by March 1995. Competing for Quality figures for the period between April 1995 and March 1996 are being compiled for the ONS Efficiency Plan. It is anticipated that this information will be published in the 1996 Next Steps Review.

CSO Market Testing Activities up to March 1995:

Activities included in the 1995 Next Steps Review

Catering Services

Retail Price Index (local price collection)

Statistical Methodology

Training

Other activities, not published in the 1995 Next Steps Review

Internal Audit

Graphic Design Services

Producer Price Index (computer development)

Four of these were awarded externally, three retained in-house.

OPCS Market Testing Activities up to March 1995:

Activities included in the 1995 Next Steps Review

Reprographics

London Housekeeping

Registration Bindery

Redevelopment of NHSCR IT system

Other activities not published in the 1995 Next Steps Review

Voice and Data Communications

One of these was awarded to the private sector, four were retained in-house.

Community Transit Procedures

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evidence the Government has submitted to the European Parliament committee of inquiry into community transit procedures. [30167]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: At a preliminary stage of its work, the European Parliament committee of inquiry into community transit procedures invited Governments to respond to the areas of investigation outlined under its terms of reference. A response by HM Customs and Excise was sent to the committee on 19 March 1996. I have arranged for a copy to be placed in the Members' Library.

Income Level Research

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will arrange for the Inland Revenue to increase the sample size of information collected from its files to enable a more accurate assessment of income levels by local authority area. [30398]

Mr. Jack: The size of the sample for the survey of personal incomes is set with a view to meeting efficiently its primary purpose of providing information relevant to the costing of income tax proposals affecting the United Kingdom as a whole. As such, a plan to increase its size is not required.

Some information from the survey of personal incomes on income levels by local authority areas is already published in "Inland Revenue Statistics 1995". Like all information derived from sample surveys, the figures are subject to statistical variation and the published tables indicate which estimates are particularly uncertain.

Film, Recording and Publishing Industries

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the levels of (a) the invisible and (b) the visible imports and exports of (i) the record industry and (ii) the publishing industry over the past three years. [30350]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Estimates are not available in the format requested. For visible trade, the estimates to the nearest definition available are given in the following table:

£ million

	Publishing of recorded media[1]		Of which: sound recordings
CDID	Exports WIQC	Imports WLJD	Exports QAED	Imports QDYH
1992	1,292	877	231	148

[2] Includes publishing of gramophone records, compact discs and tapes with music or other sound recordings. Excludes related areas such as reproduction from master copies of gramophone records, compact discs and tapes.

[3] Includes publishing of postcards, timetables, forms and posters. Excludes related areas such as printing.

[4] Less 22.14

Information about employment in related areas is available from "Census of Employment Statistics 1993" which is available in the Library.

Employment Levels

Mr. Byers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the changes in employment levels for (a) employees and (b) the self-employed for (i) full-time males, (ii) part-time males, (iii) full-time females and (iv) part-time females between spring 1995 and 1996. [30162]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Information is not available for spring 1996 until 14 August 1996 when provisional results will be published in the labour force survey first release. The latest information from the LFS showing the change in employment levels between winter 1994–95 and winter 1995–96 are shown in the table.

EU (UK Contribution)

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the United Kingdom gross contribution to the EU in 1996; and if he will express this total as a sum per person per week. [30216]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government's latest estimate of the United Kingdom's gross contribution to the European Community budget for 1996–97 is £7,733 million, after account is taken of the UK's abatement. Assuming a population for the UK of 58.3 million, the estimate translates arithmetically to £2.54 per person per week.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the net contribution to the EU in 1996; and if he will list the principal areas in which revenue is returned from the EU. [30217]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Government's latest estimate of the United Kingdom's net contribution to the European Community budget for 1996–97 is £2,899 million. Included within the estimate is a total of £4,834 million for public sector receipts. The great bulk of these receipts come from the three major Community funds, as follows:

Fund	1996–97 £ million
European Agricultural and Guarantee Fund	2,999
European Social Fund	1,068
European Regional Development Fund	744

Value Added Tax

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest available figures for (a) under-declarations and (b) over-declarations of VAT voluntarily disclosed; and what assessment he has made of the preventive effects of assurance visits on these figures. [30053]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 21 May 1996]: Customs' latest audited figures for VAT voluntarily disclosed in the year ended 31 March 1995 are as follows:

(a) under-declarations—£366 million

(b) over-declarations—£568 million.

It is not possible to quantify the preventive effect of assurance visits on these figures.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what research has been (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated by Customs and Excise into the link between VAT compliance and assurance visits; if the results are published; and what plans he has for additional research in this area. [30054]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 21 May 1996]: Customs tells me that it has an on-going programme of research into the link between VAT compliance and assurance visits. It asks academics to carry out research to evaluate the effect of the assurance programme on trade sectors. None of the material produced so far is of sufficient general interest to warrant publication, although it has been made available to interested parties inside the Department.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what amount of VAT arrears have been written off in each of the last 10 years. [30055]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 21 May 1996]: Write-off figures for 1995 have not yet been finalised. The value of VAT remitted or written off in the previous 10 years was as follows:

1994: £550,464,000

1993: £742,376,000

1992: £745,773,000

1991: £515,335,000

1990: £212,715,000

1989: £176,478,000

1988: £225,780,000

1987: £216,354,000

1986: £178,601,000

1985–86: £238,999,000.

From 1 April 1986, schedules of these amounts have been prepared on a calendar year basis. Figures for 1986 cover the period 1 April to 31 December.

Insolvency accounts for approximately 90 per cent. of all VAT write-offs or remissions.

Council of Europe Meetings

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995 have been attended by Ministers or officials of his Department; and if he will make a statement. [29364]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke [holding answer 17 May 1996]: No Ministers or officials from my Department have attended meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995.

Personal Pensions

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the number of people who have been mis-sold personal pensions since 1986. [28813]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 21 May 1996]: There is no reliable estimate available of the number of people who have been mis-sold personal pensions.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Jammu and Kashmir

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received in respect of the general election in India concerning the percentage of electors in Jammu and Kashmir who cast votes; and if he will make a statement. [30441]

Mr. Hanley: Elections in Jammu and Kashmir are being spread over three days: 7, 23 and 30 May. Turnout in the constituencies of Jammu and Ladakh, where polling took place on 7 May, but where the count has not yet begun, is estimated to have been around 55 per cent. and 80 per cent. respectively.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the names of those United Kingdom nationals who observed on behalf of the United Kingdom recent elections in Jammu and Kashmir; if he will place their reports in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [30443]

Mr. Hanley: A member of our high commission staff in New Delhi visited the constituency of Jammu during the elections on 7 Mary. The overall atmosphere was peaceful. The high commission's report on that visit is an internal document and will not be placed in the Library.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received to date, concerning those taken hostage in Kashmir; and if he will make a statement. [30440]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We are aware of recent reports that the hostages may be dead and, together with the Indian and other Governments, are working to assess whether or not they are true. We continue at present to work on the basis that the hostages are alive and to work hard for their early and safe release.

We keep in close touch with the families and give appropriate briefing to the constituency Members of Parliament involved.

Immigration

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) when a decision is to be taken by the post in Islamabad on an application by Mrs. Tazeem Akhtar and her children (ref. IMM/C7358) to enter the United Kingdom; when the results of DNA tests in relation to this application were received; and if he will make a statement; [30235]

(2) when a decision is to be made on the application made to the post in Islamabad by Mrs. Muzamal Jan and her two children (ref. IMM/C7226) to enter the United Kingdom; when the applicant was interviewed at the post; and if he will make a statement. [30234]

Mr. Hanley: I have asked the high commission at Islamabad for details and will arrange for the hon. Member to receive a substantive reply form the migration and visa correspondence unit as soon as possible.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to visit the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement. [30258]

Mr. Nicholas Bonsor: My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary has no plans at present to visit the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia.

Angola

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what UN sanctions are currently being enforced against UNITA. [30331]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: UN Security Council resolution 864 of 15 September 1993 imposed a ban on the sale or supply to UNITA of arms and related materials and military assistance, as well as petroleum and petroleum products.

UN Peacekeeping

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact on peacekeeping operations of the United Nations' borrowing of funds from its peacekeeping budgets. [30500]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Funds borrowed from peacekeeping budgets to meet cash shortfalls on the UN regular budget have had no appreciable impact on UN peacekeeping operations.

Conventional Forces in Europe Review Conference

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's position with respect to the CFE review conference; and what the British delegation will seek to achieve at the conference. [30501]

Mr. David Davis: The CFE review conference is the forum for an operational review of the treaty and for resolving outstanding treaty implementation issues. To this end the UK delegation's aim will be to:

- conduct a review of the treaty's operation;
- support efforts to resolve the flank problem and other outstanding implementation issues;
- consider any proposals for discussions on the future of the treaty.

WPC Fletcher

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the oral statement of the Minister of State, Home Office, of 8 May, Official Report, column 213, what representations have been made to the Government of Libya about two people in the Libyan bureau in London in 1984, possessing diplomatic immunity, suspected of the murder of WPC Fletcher. [29297]

Mr. Hanley [holding answer 20 May 1996]: We asked the Libyan Government to co-operate with the police investigation into the murder of WPC Fletcher at the time. They refused. In the absence of such co-operation it was not possible to bring charges against any individual. There were therefore no grounds for making further representations.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for each of his Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30120]

Sir John Wheeler: This is a matter for the chief executives of each agency. They will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Jan Walters to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me, as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency, to reply to your question about market testing the Agency's services.

The Agency already outsources the delivery of programmes and services which account for 80% of the Agency's annual budget. Since 1992 the Agency has undertaken a vigorous competing for Quality programme and has continued to scrutinise its programmes and services. Scoping studies have been carried out in the following areas:-

1992/93: Training Centre Network

1993/94: Business Support: Jobclubs

1994/95: Disablement Advisory Service

1995/96: Careers Service (Including Jobskills pre-entry)

These studies have not led to further contracting out of services or programmes but have resulted in substantial savings being identified and realised.

Most notable so far, the examination in 1992/93 of the potential for market testing the Agency's network of Training Centres prompted a major reorganisation of the network, involving running costs of £10.6m and 626 staff (approximately 40% of Agency staff). This re-organisation resulted in total annual running cost savings which rise to approximately £2m by the end of 1995/96, as well as total annual programme cost savings rising to approximately £2m over the same period. The Business Support study resulted in cash savings of £134k per annum.

The Agency's revised Framework document includes a commitment to continue to examine the scope for and, if appropriate, implement proposals for market testing with a view to ensuring best value for money.

Furthermore, a comprehensive study due for completion shortly is examining the current and future potential roles of the private sector in delivering the Agency's services.

Letter from F. G. McConnell to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me as Chief Executive of the Industrial Research and Technology Unit (IRTU) to reply to your question about market testing within Executive Agencies.

An independent study of the scope for market testing of IRTU's activities has recently been completed. The study involved a detailed examination of the Agency's activities and recommended that none of these is appropriate for market testing. This recommendation is being considered.

I hope you find this reply useful.

Letter from D. J. Bell to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply to your Question about what market testing has been carried out into the services provided by the Valuation & Lands Agency for Northern Ireland.

Since its launch as a Next Steps Agency on 1 April 1993, only once has market testing been fully carried out on a service provided by the Agency.

In that instance, market testing was carried out by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive (NIHE) and as a result, the valuation service previously provided by the Agency to the NIHE throughout Northern Ireland, was restricted to that part of Northern Ireland covered by the NIHE's Western Region.

I trust this information is sufficient for your purposes but if you think I can be of any further assistance, please do not hesitate to let me know.

Letter from F. Jardine to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question on market testing on behalf of the Northern Ireland Statistics and Research Agency (NISRA).

NISRA was established as a Next Steps Agency within the Department of Finance and Personnel on 1 April 1998. Its role is to provide statistics, social research and civil registration services and to undertake the Census of Population. The Agency thus shares a number of functions in common with the Office for National Statistics (ONS). In the short period since it was established NISRA has not market tested any of its services but is committed in the Framework Document to examining the scope for future market testing.

The collection and processing of much regional statistical data in Northern Ireland is closely linked to analogous GB activities and the market testing of such work is normally undertaken in association with the ONS. Prior to Agentisation Northern Ireland with GB to market test the collection of prices information which contribute to the Retail Prices Index (RPI). The collection of RPI data was transferred subsequently to the private sector.

Letter from D. Court to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 16 May 1996:

You recently tabled a Parliamentary Question asking the Secretary of State to list for each of his Department's Agencies what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results.

As Chief Executive of the Government Purchasing Agency, I am replying on his behalf.

The Government Purchasing Agency was launched on 1 April 1996 and is responsible for the provision of a professional procurement service for Northern Ireland Departments, their agencies and the Northern Ireland Office. It also manages the procurement process and advises Ministers on all issues relating to procurement policy.

Each year Departments will review their Service Level Agreements with the Agency and are free to obtain their services from elsewhere, if they so wish. Therefore the Agency, while unable to market test itself, is subject to a continuous market test by its customers.

The Agency does contract out some of its work and it is intended to continue to examine opportunities for this in the future.

I hope this is helpful.

Letter from Alec Wylie to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on market testing.

The Social Security Agency has not market tested any of its services since its establishment in July 1991.

I hope this explains the position for you but I would be happy to provide any further information you require.

Letter from P. Devlin to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply to your question about market testing carried out into the services provided by his Department's agencies and the results.

I should like to explain that there has been no market testing of child support maintenance services.

I hope you find this information useful.

Letter from Ronnie Brown to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question on market testing in agencies.

On 1 November 1992 Health Estates commenced the market testing of design, consultancy and site supervision services in respect of clients' healthcare buildings.

In each of the three reporting periods since then the in-house team has demonstrated its ability to offer competitive bids for these services and to win sufficient work to ensure the full utilization of the current staff resources.

Letter from D. A. Stanley to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply, on behalf of the Compensation Agency, to your recent Question regarding market testing.

As part of the Agency's Prior Options review in 1994 an entry was placed in Market Testing Bulletin inviting those with an interest in the Agency's work to respond. In addition, the Northern Ireland Office, the Agency's parent department, wrote to a number of organisations who were viewed as having an interest, these included the Law Society of Northern Ireland, the Chartered Institute of Loss Adjusters, the Association of British Insurers, the Northern Ireland Bankers Association, the Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland and the Northern Ireland Bar Library. Letters were also written to the Chairman of the Northern Ireland Select Committee and to the 17 Northern Ireland MPs.

There were responses only from the Law Society, the Chartered Institute of Loss Adjusters and one MP. In each case the view was that administration of the compensation schemes in Northern Ireland should be carried out by a public body, such as the Agency, accountable to Parliament and Ministers and that it would be inappropriate for the private sector to handle such sensitive material.

Letter from Alan Shannon to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about market testing undertaken by Government agencies.

The Northern Ireland Prison Service became an executive agency on 1 April 1995. None of its functions have been subject to direct market testing in the intervening period. However, a prior options review of its payroll services, which was completed in 1995/96, resulted in a number of recommendations for a more efficient organisation of the service, including a reduction in the number of posts required. In addition, prior options reviews of the works department, pharmacy services and fire prevention arrangements were started in 1995/96 and will be completed during the current year.

Letter from R. A. Hall to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 16 May 1996:

You recently raised a Question to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland asking if he would list for each of his Department's Agencies, what market testing had been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results.

I have been asked to reply to you directly. My Agency was launched on 1 September 1995 after a prior options study had been conducted on the provision fo the service. That study concluded that the service should be established as an Executive Agency of the Northern Ireland Office. No market testing of the service was carried out.

Letter from D. W. Gallagher to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary Question about market testing of our services.

No market testing has yet been carried out though there are plans to market test our services in toto after 1 April 1997.

Letter from J. F. Codd to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked the Chief Executive to reply to your question about market testing by Ordnance Survey of Northern Ireland. In the absence of the Chief Executive I am replying on his behalf.

We had two core activities in the market testing programme for 1993–94:

(i) resurvey at basic scales for preparation of master survey documents; and

(ii) data conversion of large scales topographical archive to digital information.

A judgement was made that their small size meant that the cost of preparing for formal market testing would have exceeded potential savings. Consequently we kept the work in-house on condition that we achieved at least 10 per cent. cost reduction in 1993–94 and succeeding years.

Letter from J. B. Watson to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

I refer to the question which you recently put to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, asking for Information on market testing in each of his Department's Agencies. This matter has been referred to Chief Executives for reply and this response covers the Driver & Vehicle Testing Agency.

The Agency was set up with effect from 1 April 1992, following a complete review of the activities. This review considered all options for the future provision of Driver and Vehicle Testing and concluded that a Next Steps Agency represented the optimum means of delivery. In 1993 privatisation of the private car vehicle testing operation was examined. This review also concluded that the existing arrangements were the most efficient. A full review of the Agency is planned to commence next year.

Letter from Brendan Hagee to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 16 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked the Chief Executive to reply to your question in relation to Market Testing which has been carried out into services provided by the Department's Agencies and the results.

DVLNI invited tenders in relation to a market test on Local Vehicle Licensing Offices during 1994. The bid was won in-house and a new contract commenced 1 July 1995.

Letter from A. P. W. Malcomson to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply to your Question as to what market testing has been carried out for the services provided by this Executive Agency and what were the results.

The following Public Record Office areas have been subject to market testing (ie, Competing for Quality): cleaning, catering, wordprocessing, reprographics and information technology. The first two functions were contracted out centrally; the third was reduced in scale but retained in-house; and the fourth and fifth were retained in-house. Another area, namely Repository, was also retained in-house subject to the achievement of 10% efficiency saving.

Letter from C. E. Ronaldson to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about Market Testing of the services provided by his Department's Agencies.

A Prior Options Study was carried out on Works Service (Construction Service's predecessor) prior to the launch of the Agency on 1 April 1996.

Since 1 April 1996 none of the services provided by Construction Service have been Market Tested.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Letter from Robert C. Martin to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

Mr. Moss has asked me to reply on behalf of the Environment and Heritage Service, to your parliamentary question about what market testing has been carried out into services provided by his Department's agencies and the results.

Grounds maintenance at the 2 largest of the 7 Country Parks, managed by this Service, was market tested in 1991. In both instances the work was won by the in-house bid, which proved to be the cheapest.

Grass cutting operations at 42 of the 181 State Care Monument sites managed by us in the eastern half of Northern Ireland were market tested in 1994.

This area was chosen as it contained the greatest concentration of monuments in commercially viable groups. In all, 4 groups were market-tested and the work was won by the in-house bid in each case.

Letter from Arthur H. Moir to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

A Prior Options Review of the activities of the Land Registry. Registry of Deeds and Statutory Charges Register which was completed in 1995 recommended Agency Status and was accepted by the Office of Public Service on the basis that the new Agency would consider the market testing of non-core functions.

None of the Agencies activities have yet been Market Tested. All of the Agencies activities are being fundamentally examined, as part of the current efficiency plan, in a Business Process Re engineering Project. This will be completed by the Autumn. The Agency is also attempting to secure a private sector partner under the Private Finance Initiative to computerise the Land Registration process. Market Testing will be considered further when these projects are completed.

Letter from H. R. F. Flester to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

You recently tabled a written question on the issue of market testing for answer by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. As the Water Service has been a Next Steps Agency within the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland since 1 April 1996 this has been forwarded to me, as Chief Executive, for reply in respect of the Agency.

The Water Service has been engaged in a market testing and efficiency review programme since the late 1980s and will, within 2 years, have market tested or carried out efficiency reviews of 50% of all its activities.

The activities covered in the most recent part of this programme, between October 1994 and March 1996, are:

1. Collection and transportation of water quality samples

2. Sludge tankering

   Septic tank emptying

   Minor to major sewage treatment works, and major sewage treatment works to disposal points.

3. Sewer maintenance

   Clearing of blockages and desilting.

   Sewer and manhole repairs and construction.

Of these recent market tests 64% were won by the in-house teams.

Letter from V. Crawford to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked the Chief Executive to reply to your question about market testing which has been carried out by Roads Service. In his absence I am replying on behalf of the Chief Executive.

Prior to becoming an Executive Agency within the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland on 1 April 1996, Roads Service market tested a number of road maintenance and inspection/testing functions. In addition, street lighting maintenance, car park management, the Strangford Ferry Service, Roadman Training Centre, Castlenavan Quarry and the materials testing maintenance contracts were lost to the private sector, but the remainder, representing approximately 90% of the work tested, was won by in-house teams.

The agency has not completed any market tests since it was created. It does, however, intend to test approximately three quarters of its work during the next 3 years.

Letter from T. W. Stewart to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 17 May 1996:

Mr. Moss has asked me to reply to your question about what market testing has been carried out in the services provided by The Planning Service and what were the results.

The Planning Service since it became an Agency, within the Department of the Environment, on 1 April 1996, has not carried out any market testing. In 1993 The Planning Service market tested the "Area Plans Research and Analysis process" which is the first stage in the preparation of Area Development Plans. The work market tested was for 6 Area Plans extending over a period of 18 months and was awarded to the In-House team.

A second market test to revisit the market is scheduled for completion by 31 March 1997 and is included in the Agency's Business Plan.

Sinn Fein Candidates

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Upper Bann for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30514]

(2) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for North Down for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30515]

(3) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for South Down for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30516]

(4) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Newry and Armagh for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30517]

(5) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Strangford for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30518]

(6) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Fermanagh and South Tyrone for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offence with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30519]

(7) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for West Tyrone for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30520]

(8) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for South Antrim for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30529]

(9) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Foyle for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30531]

(10) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Mid-Ulster for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30521]

(11) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Belfast, North for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30522]

(12) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Belfast, South for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30523]

(13) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Belfast, East for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30524]

(14) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Belfast, West for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30525]

(15) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for Lagan Valley for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30526]

(16) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for East Londonderry for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30527]

(17) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for the East Antrim for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date or release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30528]

(18) if he will list the Sinn Fein candidates for North Antrim for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which they have been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him; [30530]

(19) if he will publish the regional list of Sinn Fein candidates for the elections on 30 May and indicate any terrorist offences with which each candidate has been (a) charged and (b) convicted and the sentences given and served, the date of the offences and the date of release or as much of such information as is readily available to him. [30532]

Sir John Wheeler: It is not possible to indicate terrorist offences with which any of the candidates nominated by Sinn Fein to stand for election on 30 May, and listed in full in the Belfast Gazette, may have been charged or convicted, or details relating to sentences any may have served. To enable the Royal Ulster Constabulary's criminal records office to begin a search of its records it would be necessary to provide the office with the full name, date of birth and address of each person. As this, however, would not guarantee that the correct person had been identified, the RUC would further require a set of fingerprints to compare with those held on record.

European Fund for Peace and Reconciliation

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the maximum sum of money per head of population in each district council in Northern Ireland which can be obtained from the European fund for peace and reconciliation. [30322]

Mr. Moss: Under sub-programme 6 of the EU special support programme for peace and reconciliation in Northern Ireland and the border counties of Ireland 1995 to 1999, a proposed sum of £35 million will be allocated among Northern Ireland's 26 district council areas to take account of both population and levels of relative deprivation. The maximum sum of money per head of population in each district council area in Northern Ireland under sub-programme 6 is as follows:

District council	Allocation per capita (£)
Antrim	12
Ards	13
Armagh	16
Ballymena	13
Ballymoney	14

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many staff were employed by his Department on BSE-related research during (a) 1991, (b) 1992, (c) 1993, (d) 1994 and (e) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [26004]

Mr. Boswell: The following numbers of MAFF staff have been employed on BSE-related research:

Year	Staff years
1991–92	n/a
1992–93	116.8
1993–94	104.1

Year	Staff years
1994–95	103.8
1995–96	102.8

n/a = not available.

These figures do not reflect the totality of MAFF's BSE research programme as MAFF also funds BSE-related research at non-MAFF establishments. MAFF staff are also employed on work related to the diagnoses and monitoring of the disease.

Directorate of Fisheries Research

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has for the future organisation of the directorate of fisheries research. [30671]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The directorate of fisheries research was recently the subject of a prior options review. This looked at the need for its services, and how they could be provided most effectively. Following this review, the Government have decided that the directorate of fisheries research should become a next steps executive agency of MAFF. This will give it greater management freedom to improve performance within a framework of targets set by Ministers while retaining it within the public sector. My intention is that this change should take place on 1 April 1997 if this can be achieved, and in any event as soon as practicable.

Horticulture Research International

Mr. Atkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what representations he has received about the proposed privatisation of Horticulture Research International; [30013]

(2) what steps he has taken to protect the interests of small to medium-sized horticultural enterprises following privatisation of Horticulture Research International; [30015]

(3) what guarantees of future funding for Horticulture Research International he will give following privatisation; [30016]

(4) if he will make a statement on the planned time scale for the privatisation of Horticulture Research International. [30020]

Mr. Boswell: No decisions have been taken on privatisation of Horticulture Research International.

Mr. Atkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the meetings and consultations which he has had with representatives of the horticultural industry to discuss the future of Horticulture Research International in the last six months. [30014]

Mr. Boswell: Horticulture Research International is the subject of a prior options review which is looking at a variety of options, including whether it should remain in the public sector. The review team has met the following representatives of the horticultural industry:

The Apple and Pear Research Council
East Malling Trustees
Horticultural Development Council
National Farmers' Union

Written comments were received from the following additional horticulture associations:

East Malling Research Association
Horticultural Research Association
Horticultural Trades Association
Mushroom Growers Association
National Hop Association
Potato Marketing Board
Processors and Growers Research Organisation

Mr. Atkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are his plans for the future of Horticulture Research International; and if he will make a statement. [30018]

Mr. Boswell: As part of the prior options review, the future status of HRI is now to be considered by the Prime Minister's adviser on efficiency, Sir Peter Levene. Decisions on the outcome will be announced as soon as possible.

Mr. Atkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the benefits to small to medium-sized horticultural enterprises which will accrue from privatisation of Horticulture Research International. [30019]

Mr. Boswell: In reaching a decision on Horticulture Research International's future status, the Government will take into account the responses received from the horticulture industry in the course of the prior options review.

Departmental Staff (Directorships)

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those MAFF employees who currently hold directorships with companies engaged in the sourcing, processing, distribution or retailing of food, the dates of their appointment and the income or secondment received by his Department for their service. [30392]

Mr. Boswell: Under the guide to non-executive directorships for civil servants, Mr. A. R. Burne and Mr. B. J. Harding currently hold directorships in companies engaged in the sourcing, processing, distribution or retailing of food. The dates of their appointments are October 1994 and March 1996 respectively. The Department does not receive any income or secondment from these appointments.

Lindane

Mr. Thomason: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to publish the results of the Advisory Committee on Pesticides' review of the agricultural uses of the pesticide substance lindane. [30786]

Mrs. Browning: The committee completed this review at its meeting on 15 February. The Government have accepted the committee's recommendation that all present agricultural uses of lindane should continue without unacceptable risks to people or the environment.

Full details of the review are given in the committee's evaluation document which was published on 2 May. Copies of the document have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

Live Animal Transport

Mr. Forman: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress he has made on the implementation of the new EU rules on the welfare of animals in transport; and if he will make a statement. [30962]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In October last year, we circulated our proposals for implementing the new EU rules on the welfare of animals in transport to over 600 interested organisations and individuals. That initial consultation ended in December and we have been considering the comments received. There are some issues on which it is now possible to give a clearer indication of the shape of future legislation. There are other issues where we shall need to consult interested parties further on how we should take practicalities into account while providing improved welfare conditions.

It is now clear that there is nothing to be gained by bringing forward early legislation on particular aspects of the directive. We shall, instead, develop practical and workable measures, which we shall implement in a single statutory instrument later in the year.

One of the central issues to emerge from consultation has been how livestock markets will fit in with the new rules. Consultation has clearly underlined the difficulties in requiring a "paper trail" to follow individual animals from farm of origin through markets and beyond and we will not now be pursuing this. We shall be consulting further on alternative approaches to markets to ensure that the continuity of protection required by the EU rules is provided.

We have also been considering the requirement for transporters to be competent. It had been our intention to require such transporters to undergo a formal assessment of their competence. However, we have decided, in the light of the consultation exercise, that this would impose an unnecessary burden on the majority of transporters and that, in common with approaches in other sectors, the onus should instead be on transporters to show that their staff have the necessary competence. In order to help both transporters and enforcers, it is our intention to provide a framework of the competences required.

We want to take the time available to us to make sure that all the detail of our implementing measures is sound and practical. We have therefore asked officials to continue discussions with all interested parties. When we have firmer proposals, we shall set these out in a further consultation document before finally deciding what approaches to adopt.

Collection Centres

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a list of collection centres approved in accordance with EU legislation on animal health. [28626]

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30066]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The 1995–96 annual budget for the MAFF deregulation unit covering pay and non-pay costs was approximately £96,000. The unit consists of four permanent members of staff, one at each of the following grades: grade 7, higher executive officer, executive officer and administrative assistant. In addition, there is involvement at more senior grades including the grade 5 head of division to whom the deregulation unit reports. All members of staff are career civil servants, none of whom has been seconded from the business sector. The grade 5 has some experience of the private sector through a non-executive directorship.

PRIME MINISTER

Council of Europe and Western European Union

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place in the Library a copy of the information bulletin on the activities of the United Kingdom delegation to the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe and the Assembly of the Western European Union covering the period October 1995 to April 1996. [30790]

The Prime Minister: I have done so today.

India

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what representations he has made to the Indian Government since the general election; and if he will make a statement; [30442]

(2) if he will invite the next Prime Minister of India to visit the United Kingdom to discuss the resolution of the Kashmir dispute; and if he will make a statement. [30439]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to him on 23 April, Official Report, columns 191–92. Our policy on Kashmir remains unchanged. I look forward to an early opportunity to discuss bilateral and other issues, including Kashmir, with the new Indian Prime Minister.

Ministers (Overseas Travel)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list all those occasions on which Ministers from Welsh, Scottish and Northern Ireland Offices have participated in overseas trade or goodwill missions on official business during (a) 1994–95, (b) 1995–96 and (c) in the programme for 1996–97. [29941]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 16 May 1996]: Ministers promote British business and British jobs at every available opportunity. The information requested is as follows:

Minister	Country
Welsh Office

HEALTH

GP Fundholders

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the Comptroller and Auditor General's report on the NHS summarised accounts, 1994–95, in respect of how many cases the use of general practitioners' fundholder savings has been (a) outside the scope of the regulations since the inception of the fundholding scheme and (b) outside the scope of the regulations, in (i) 1993–94 and (ii) 1994–95. [23062]

Mr. Malone: Two such cases have been formally identified, one by the Audit Commission and the other by a regional health authority.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much general practitioner fundholders in each health authority area, by region, have spent on health care from outside the NHS, in each of the last four years. [29664]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 16 May 1996]: The information will be placed in the Library.

Health Authorities

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the spending on pay and administrative costs of health authorities in each region in each year since 1991–92. [29400]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 8 November 1995 at column 974, for spending on pay and administration costs of health authorities in each region for the years 1991–92 to 1993–94. The comparable information for 1994–95 will be placed in the Library.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff that are women, in his Department on 1 April. [30557]

Mr. Horam: The information is shown in the table. The grades of staff in the national health service regional offices which became part of the Department of Health on 1 April are not comparable with civil service grades. A separate entry has been made for these.

Renal Services Review

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) of 4 March, Official Report, column 68, if he will make a statement on the outcome of his meeting in April 1996 with the National Kidney Federation about the national review of renal services; and when his Department's renal services review will be published. [30688]

Mr. Horam: I had a constructive meeting with the National Kidney Federation on 2 April at which its concerns about the provision of renal services were discussed. I was able to inform it that the national renal review, and purchasing guidelines for health authorities based on the review, would be published soon. The review and purchasing guidelines were published on 7 May.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans his Department has to consult patients in the contracting process in the implementation of the renal services review; [30219]

(2) if he will publish a timetable for the implementation of the renal services review; [30220]

(3) what steps he is taking to ensure the recommendations outlined in the renal services review are fully implemented. [30221]

Mr. Horam: The renal review, which we published on 7 May, makes several recommendations about the development of services for patients with renal failure. On the same day the national health service executive published guidelines, EL(96)35, for health authorities drawing attention to the important issues raised in the review and advising how these might best be tackled. The majority of recommendations are being taken forward locally by purchasing authorities and national health service trusts in accordance with local needs and priorities which take account of the views of patients locally. Copies of the review will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provisions he has made for extra funding for renal services in the United Kingdom. [30222]

Mr. Horam: In England health authorities are given general allocations for hospital and community health services to purchase health care services for their resident population. It is for individual health authorities in consultation with the providers of services to decide the level and type of services purchased, taking account of local circumstances and national policies and priorities. Questions relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Staff out on secondment or on loan to other Government Departments, on maternity leave more than three months, or on unpaid career breaks/study leave are excluded.

Pressure Sores

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 15 May, Official Report, column 479, if he will make it his policy (a) to collate statistics and (b) to establish estimated costs in respect of statistics in relation to the incidence of pressure sores among NHS hospital patients. [30212]

Mr. Bowis: The Department of Health is seeking to reduce the burden of data collection by the national health service and rationalise data flows within the NHS and between the NHS and the centre. The collection of additional information on pressure sores would not be in line with this policy.

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; which agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30568]

Mr. Horam: None.

Pharmacists

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the improvements in productivity of pharmacists in each of the last 10 years, together with the change in NHS payments to pharmacists for each of those years. [29577]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The table shows that amount of national health service payments to pharmacists in cash terms for the years 1985–86 to 1994–95. There is no overall measure of pharmacists' productivity. The number of prescriptions dispensed over the period is shown as one indicator of their NHS activity.

[1] Amount includes net ingredient costs of drugs (i.e., excluding discount and including container allowance) and pharmacists' remuneration. Adjusted to account for payback and clawback of under/overpayment of pharmacists' remuneration in previous years.

Breast Screening Programme

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what amount the national health service breast screening programme spends on screening women aged 65 years or over; and what percentage of the total budget this is. [29676]

Mr. Horam: In 1994–95—the latest year for which figures are available—the national health service breast screening programme spent approximately £840,000 on screening women aged 65 years and over. This represents approximately 3.1 per cent. of the total expenditure of the NHS breast screening programme.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will publish how many women were tested or screened under the national health service breast screening programme as a result of self or GP referral for each year since 1992–93 broken down by age bands (a) 50 to 54, (b) 55 to 59, (c) 60 to 64, (d) 65 to 69, (e) 70 to 74 and (f) 75 years and over; [29677]

(2) how many women were tested or screened under the national health service breast screening programme as a result of first invitation or routine recall broken down by age bands (a) 50 to 54, (b) 55 to 59, (c) 60 to 64, (d) 65 to 69, (e) 70 to 74 and (f) 75 years and over in the last year for which figures are available. [29678]

Mr. Horam: The available information is shown in the table. Data for 1994–95 are provisional.

Breast screening programme: number of women screened by age and type of invitation.

[1] Information not available by separate age bands for women over 65 for 1994–95.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost per woman screened on the national health service breast screening programme. [29679]

Mr. Horam: In 1994–95, the latest year for which figures are available, the approximate cost per woman screened on the national health service breast screening programme was £27.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list (a) those non-unitary local authorities in England with populations over 90,000 and (b) those unitary authority local authorities with populations under 120,000 (i) at present and (ii) following completion of the local government reorganisation. [30000]

Sir Paul Beresford: All county councils have a population over 90,000. The following district councils which are currently non-unitary, have populations over 90,000—using Office of Population Censuses and Surveys figures as at mid-1994. For those districts marked with an asterisk, either orders establishing unitary authorities have been made or draft orders have been consulted upon.

Energy Efficiency Voucher Scheme

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many households received voucher booklets offering discounts on energy efficiency products and services; [30497]

(2) what assessment he has made of the likely take-up of 25 per cent. grants under the home energy efficiency scheme from the results of energy efficiency voucher scheme; [30498]

(3) what estimate he has made of the number of households taking up one or more of the discounted offers under the energy efficiency voucher scheme. [30499]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The home energy efficiency scheme is the Government's major domestic energy efficiency programme and almost 2 million grants have been paid since it began in 1991. We expect a significant number of householders aged over 60 who qualify for HEES only on age grounds to take advantage of the 25 per cent. grant. This discount is a substantial incentive to adopt the energy efficiency measures under this scheme with its good reputation for quality. There is, however, no specific link between HEES and the voucher book scheme which was a separate promotion to encourage energy saving under the "Wasting Energy Costs the Earth" campaign.

For information about distribution and take-up of the voucher book I refer the hon. Member to answers given to the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Hanson) on 22 November 1995, column 111, and 23 April, column 63.

Capital Receipts

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the current level of capital receipts now held by each local authority as a result of the sale of council houses; and in what form such assets are currently held. [30447]

Sir Paul Beresford: A list of the amounts of accumulated usable capital receipts for each English local authority at 31 March 1995 was placed in the Library of the House in response to the question of Monday 22 January 1996, Official Report, column 85, from the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith). About 90 per cent. of these receipts are held by authorities whose responsibilities include housing, but it is not possible to say how much of the total derives from the sale of houses.

Figures for the amounts of set-aside capital receipts are not available. These form part of the provision for credit liabilities, which is reported to the Department, but which also includes amounts set aside from revenue.

Information on the way these assets are held is not available, but they are likely to be mainly invested in bank and building society accounts. Some may have been used temporarily to finance expenditure.

Bankside Power Station, London

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the expected date for completion of the demolition works at Bankside power station in London. [30469]

Sir Paul Beresford: Demolition works are taking place in two stages. I understand that minor works are being carried out at the moment to allow for the removal of the redundant boilers and electrical equipment. This work should be completed by the end of the summer. There will then be further demolition to remove extensions and additions to the original building to turn the power station into the Tate gallery of modern art. These works are likely to continue until April 1997.

Building Projects

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking to ensure that Britain retains a leading position in the design and construction of innovative building projects. [30467]

Mr. Clappison: The Department is producing, jointly with the Department of National Heritage, new guidelines on architectural competitions which will help to promote high-quality building and design. It also has a research budget which provides funding towards an extensive programme of research into the built environment, including projects carried out on a collaborative basis with the construction industry. This programme covers the design, planning and carrying out of the construction process, as well as the products and materials used in it.

Rented Housing Starts

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new rented homes housing associations will be able to start in 1996; and what were the figures for each of the past three years. [29901]

Mr. Curry: The Housing Corporation has granted approvals for 27,000 new rented homes to be provided by housing associations using funding from the approved development programme during the financial year 1996–97. In addition, local authorities may also provide new rented homes using local authority housing association grant. Current indications are that an additional 11,000 social lettings will arise from LAHAG funding during 1996–97. Most of these approved schemes will be started during 1996–97.

These approvals will contribute significantly to the 61,100 new social lettings expected to become available during 1996–97 from housing association and local authority activities under the rental and home ownership programmes.

Figures for rental provision for the past three years are:

	ADP funded (approvals)	LAHAG funded (completions)
1993–94	45,781	7,159
1994–95	44,422	9,018
1995–96	26,516	11,394

Packaging Waste Regulations

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the areas where the proposed packaging waste regulations will be more extensive than the requirements set by the European Union directive on packaging waste regulations; and what are the reasons for such a policy. [29923]

Mr. Clappison: The EC directive on packaging and packaging waste (92/62/EC) is a framework directive which requires member states to put in place systems which they determine and which are intended to implement its provisions. The directive provides a single market framework for the free circulation throughout the European Community of packaging which meets certain essential requirements reflecting environmental and other considerations. It also contains environmental objectives, including the need to achieve an overall recovery rate of 50 to 65 per cent. by the year 2001, with a minimum of 15 per cent. materials recycling per material.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment set out in his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) on 7 May 1996, Official Report, columns 73–75, the Government have accepted industry's view that we should provide for the directive to be implemented by business-led schemes. The regulations which we hope to publish shortly for consultation will reflect that as well as the industry agreement achieved on 15 December 1995 on how the burdens might be shared between the sectors of the packaging chain.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate his Department has made of the cost for the packaging waste industry of complying with the proposed new packaging waste regulations; and what was the outcome of this assessment. [29924]

Mr. Clappison: A preliminary cost compliance assessment for implementation of this directive was set out in "Producer Responsibility for Packaging Waste—A Consultation Paper"—published in May 1995, a copy of which is in the Library. That assessment is currently being revised. I hope to publish it shortly for consultation alongside the draft regulations on implementation of the directive on the basis set out in the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Eastbourne on 7 May 1996, Official Report, columns 73–75.

Pollution

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many days in the last year for which figures are available pollution levels in British cities have exceeded limits set by his Department. [30474]

Mr. Clappison: A summary of exceedences of national and international guidelines and standards for pollution levels in air, water and soil across the United Kingdom is included in the Department of the Environment's "Digest of Environmental Statistics No. 17, 1995", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House of Commons. The 18th volume of this report will be published in mid-June.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. Allason: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many fraudulent claims for legal aid were pursued in 1995–96 and how much was recovered from claimants in the same year. [29927]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: Following investigations carried out by the Benefits Agency into applicants' financial eligibility for civil legal aid, 29 cases were referred to the police in 1995–96. In the same period, the Legal Aid Board assisted police in their investigations into five assisted persons in receipt of criminal legal aid.

Amounts recovered in respect of these cases are not recorded separately from amounts recovered by the board from all assisted persons whose legal aid has been withdrawn for various reasons. The total amount recovered in 1995–96 from all assisted persons was over £1.4 million.

In 1995–96, the board also referred to the police seven cases of suspected fraudulent claims by solicitors. During the same period, £1,174,000 was recovered from solicitors in respect of costs which were either wrongly or fraudulently claimed.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list for each of his Department' agencies what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide; and what were the results. [30046]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The Lord Chancellor has responsibility for four agencies: the Court Service, HM Land Registry, the Public Record Office and the Public Trust Office. As the question concerns a specific operational matter, the chief executives of the agencies have been asked to reply direct.

Letter from Michael Huebner to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 May 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about market testing.

Since April 1995, the date on which the Court Service was established, no market testing has been carried out.

Letter from Julia C. Lomas to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 May 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary has asked me to reply to you as part of the Lord Chancellor's Department's response to your Parliamentary Question, listed on 16 May 1996, regarding market testing carried out, the services provided and the results.

The Public Trust Office market tested the typing service in 1993. The proposal made by the in-house team was successful.

Letter from Sarah Tyacke to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 May 1996:

I have been asked by the Lord Chancellor's Parliamentary Secretary to reply for the Public Record Office to your question about the market testing of services provided by the agencies for which he is responsible.

The Public Record Office has market tested the following:

1. Security services

The contract was awarded to the in-house bid team. Savings have amounted to £275,000 p.a. on pre-test costs of £1.14m p.a.

2. General office copying

It was decided, as part of the market testing process, that this service should be contracted out. The tender process did not produce a bid from the private sector which would have provided running-cost savings. The service remains in-house but is likely to be considered again within a proposed facilities management market test.

Additional services costing £1.79m p.a. have been subject to other efficiency techniques under the Public Record Office's Competing for Quality programmes, producing savings estimated at £174,500 p.a. for 1996–97.

Letter from John Manthorpe to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 22 May 1996:

I have been asked by the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, to reply to your recent question concerning the results of market testing within HM Land Registry. I can supply the following information:

Probate Offices

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations he has received from trade unions, members of the public and public bodies concerning the proposed closure of probate offices. [30361]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from Michael Huebner to Mr. Gordon Prentice, dated 22 May 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about representations received on the proposed restructuring of the Probate Service.

Written responses were received from the Lord Chancellor's Department Whitley Council Trade Union Side, the Public Services, Tax and Commerce Union (PTC), and the National Union of Civil and Public Servants (NUCPS). 99 individual members of the public wrote in to make representations against the closure of specific Probate Sub-Registries and Probate Offices, of whom three lodged petitions bearing the signatures of a combined total of 696 people.

Nationally, replies were received from the Law Society and the National Federation of Post Office and BT Pensioners. Locally, representations about the proposed closure of specific Sub-Registries and Offices were received from local authorities, local Citizens Advice Bureaux, local Law Society offices, solicitors, local branches of banks and other financial institutions, Family History Societies and local branches of Age Concern.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Rwanda

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received in respect of deaths caused by suffocation of inmates in Rwandan prisons; and what representations he has made to the Rwandan Government about conditions in Rwandan jails. [30334]

Mr. Hanley: The human rights field operation in Rwanda reports that five detainees died from suffocation during April. A further 37 died as a result of various illnesses. Our ambassador has made representations to the Rwandan Government about prison conditions, including these latest incidents.

Zaire

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the current security situation in Zaire, with particular reference to the recent ethnic clashes in eastern Zaire. [30218]

Mr. Hanley: We are extremely concerned about the ethnic conflict in eastern Zaire and the recent reports of further killings. We make regular representations to all the Governments in the region to encourage a return to peace and stability.

Angola

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of breaches of the peace plan in Angola. [30330]

Mr. Hanley: As the UN Secretary-General noted in his report of 30 April to the Security Council, the level of ceasefire violations has diminished. However, the implementation of the Lusaka protocol has been delayed considerably, particularly in the key areas of quartering of UNITA troops and reaching agreement on the incorporation of UNITA personnel into the joint armed forces. The overall achievements still fall well short of what we and other members of the Security Council expected. We have made our dissatisfaction clear to both sides, and continue to use every opportunity to encourage progress.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of the peace process in Angola. [30332]

Mr. Hanley: Implementation of the Lusaka protocol remains behind schedule. We have urged both sides to honour their commitments without delay. Dr. Savimbi's recent undertaking to quarter 50,000 UNITA troops by 15 June is a welcome step forward.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the sale of diamonds in international markets on behalf of UNITA. [30333]

Mr. Hanley: The sale of diamonds from Angola is a matter for the Angolan authorities, but we look forward to a time when Angola's natural resources are used for the benefit of the Angolan people as a whole.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list, for his Department's agency, what market testing has been carried out into the services it provides and what were the results. [30113]

The Attorney-General: The two agencies for which I am responsible have participated in the following market tests in the year 1995–96. Contracts were won by the agencies in the cases shown.

The Treasury Solicitor's Department (TSD)	Whether bid successful

Public Order Offences and Assaults

Mr. Luff: To ask the Attorney-General if the Director of Public Prosecutions proposes to issue further guidance on charging standards relating to public order offences and assaults. [31053]

The Attorney-General: The Director of Public Prosecutions has agreed with the Association of Chief Police Officers guidance to assist police and prosecutors select the right charge for people alleged to have committed public order offences. The charging standard will be implemented with effect from Monday 3 June 1996.

The main offences covered by the standard are those contained in part I and part III of the Public Order Act 1986. Those provisions penalise individuals or groups who use violence and/or intimidating behaviour. Special guidance is given in dealing with racially motivated conduct. Violent and/or intimidating behaviour which is directed at particular individuals or groups of individuals as the result of racial motive is liable to be dealt with under part I of the Act or other provisions of the general law with the motive being drawn to the attention of the court as an aggravating feature. On the other hand, conduct intended or likely to incite racial hatred is liable to be dealt with under part III of the Act.

The previous charging standard relating to offences against the person has been revised and will also be implemented with effect from Monday 3 June 1996. The revised standard contains guidance on the handling of cases of assault where the allegation is made by a person who was, at the material time, himself engaged in criminal activity, such as a burglar alleged to have been assaulted by the occupier of the premises concerned. Police and prosecutors must examine such cases by reference to all the surrounding circumstances including the suspect's state of mind and the common law and statutory provisions which permit the use of reasonable force in self-defence, the defence of another, the defence of property, the prevention of crime and the effecting of a lawful arrest. The difficulties facing someone confronted by an intruder or defending himself against attack must always be taken carefully into account but excessive force may not be used.

Copies of the charging standard relating to public order offences and the revised charging standard relating to offences against the person have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament.

TRANSPORT

Airport Development

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 19 March, Official Report, column 103, what are the time scale and programme for the BAA investigation into less environmentally damaging options for runway development. [29569]

Mr. Norris: The study of options for a close parallel runway at Gatwick, initiated by BAA in April 1995, is expected to take two to three years to complete. The study is being conducted in three phases, examining in turn the technical feasibility of a close parallel runway, the supporting airport infrastructure that would be required, and finally the impacts of any options which have survived the first two stages.

Aircraft Movements

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 27 March, Official Report, column 594, on whom the responsibility falls to collate statistics on information concerning aircraft taking off or landing without an allocated runway slot. [30006]

Mr. Norris: The co-ordinator for the major UK airports, Airport Co-ordination Ltd., is required under the EC legislation to monitor the use of slots at the airports for which it is responsible. The ACL therefore maintains records of aircraft landing or taking off without a slot, by comparing slots it has allocated with data supplied by the airport operator on actual aircraft movements operated.

British Rail (Political Donations)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list, for each of the last five years, the amount paid by British Rail's Sapphire accounts system in respect of political donations, under its G/L code 686200. [30044]

Mr. Watts: Sapphire is a proprietary accountancy system used by all the British Railways Board-owned train operating companies, together with those in the private sector. The G/L code 686200 is a specific accounting code relating to donations to political parties. It was part of the original package bought from the manufacturer.

As a nationalised industry, British Rail is prevented by statute from making donations to political parties.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list, for each of his Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30130]

Mr. Norris: Between October 1992 and January 1996, the following services of the Department's agencies have been market tested, with the following results:

Bristol–Plymouth–Penzance Line

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made on the trans-European networks feasibility funding application for the Bristol-Plymouth-Penzance line; and if he will make a statement. [30400]

Mr. Watts: A bid for TENs funding support for a study into options for enhancing the main lines from Paddington to the west country was included in the UK's bid for 1996 TENs funding. The European Commission is currently considering the bids made by the UK and other member states, to draw up a proposed allocation for member states' consideration at the next meeting of the TENs financial committee, currently planned for 10 July.

Funds cannot be disbursed, however, until guidelines for the development of transport TENs have been adopted by the Council and the European Parliament. The draft guidelines are presently at the conciliation stage and an agreed text is expected to be available in mid-June and will then require separate approval by the Council and Parliament.

Traffic Area Offices

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to make an announcement on the proposed closure of traffic area offices; and if he will make a statement. [30464]

Mr. Norris: I expect to make an announcement shortly on the future structure of the traffic area network.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the redundancy costs involved in closing the traffic area office in (a) Leeds, (b) Manchester, (c) Birmingham and (d) Cardiff. [30466]

Mr. Norris: It is not possible to give reliable estimates, as it would depend on how many and which staff were located.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those organisations or individuals who have made representations following the publication of the Curtis review, indicating those that were in favour of closing one or more traffic area offices. [30488]

Mr. Norris: Representations were received from those listed in the following table, following the publication of the Curtis efficiency scrutiny of the traffic area network. Of those who commented on proposals to restructure the traffic area network, no organisation specifically supported the closure of one or more offices. However, some supported moves towards a more centralised administrative system.

Representations received from
Association of Chief Police Officers	Passenger Transport Executive Group
Association of Chief Police Officers (Scotland)	Road Haulage Association
Association of District Councils	Mr. Peter Snape MP
Association of Transport Co-ordinating Officers	Trade Union Side
Association of Transport COs (Scotland)	Transport 2000
BRAKE	Transport Tribunal
Cabinet Office	Traffic Commissioners
Confederation of Passenger Transport UK	Welsh Office
Council on Tribunals
Freight Transport Association
Lancashire County Council
Local Authorities Co-ordinating Body on Food and Trading Standards

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of his Department's overall budget is allocated to the traffic area office network. [30491]

Mr. Norris: Some 3.98 per cent. of the Central Transport Group's running cost budget net of VAT receipts.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by traffic area office (a) the current number of staff in post, (b) the total running costs, (c) the accommodation costs, (d) the unit costs, (e) the service standard achievements, (f) the expiry date for the building lease and (g) the number of goods and public service vehicle operator licences held in that area. [30465]

Mr. Norris: The figures requested, for the financial year 1995–96, are in the tables:

TAO	Staff	Total running costs £	Accommodation costs £	Lease expiry date[1]	Goods licences	PSV licences

Heavy Vehicle Licensing

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of checks undertaken (a) on a weekend and (b) outside normal office hours in order to collate the statistics for the recently published report into the illegal operation of heavy goods vehicles. [30472]

Mr. Norris: There were 114 check sites used during the survey altogether. During the survey, 3,927 vehicles were checked. Six sites were used at weekends, where 210 checks were undertaken. On Monday to Friday, four sites were used entirely outside office hours and a further 80 were used partly outside office hours. In total, 880 checks were conducted outside office hours—between 0900 and 1700—on Monday to Friday. Therefore, in total, 1,090 checks were undertaken outside office hours.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of the goods and public service vehicle operator licensing fees is transferred to Treasury funds. [30463]

Mr. Norris: All fee revenue is paid into the Consolidated Fund.

A2

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to improve the A2 trunk road to accommodate the proposed Ebbsfleet station contained in the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill. [30831]

Mr. Watts: I have today announced that a scheme to widen the A2 between Cobham and Bean has been added to the national roads programme. The scheme will proceed in two phases. The first will complement work already in hand in association with the Blue Water park development and will result in additional capacity on the A2 in both directions between Bean and the A227 at Tollgate junction. The second will add a fourth lane in both directions between Tollgate and Cobham.

The first phase will be contained within the existing highway boundary. The other requires additional land.

Fares (London)

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce a capping formula for London Transport fares. [30338]

Mr. Norris: None; I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave her on 9 May 1996, Official Report, columns 195–6.

Rail Contracts

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list (i) all contracts awarded by his Department to (a) Eurorail Ltd. and (b) Eurorail CTRL Ltd. (ii) the date those contracts were awarded, (iii) the length of those contracts, (iv) the purpose of those contracts and (v) the total value of those contracts. [30339]

Mr. Watts: My Department has not entered into any contracts with either of these firms.

Ms Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list (i) all contracts awarded by Union Railways to (a) Eurorail Ltd. and (b) Eurorail CTRL Ltd. (ii) the date those contracts were awarded, (iii) the length of those contracts, (iv) the purpose of those contracts and (v) the total value of those contracts. [30342]

Mr. Watts: Union Railways has not let any contracts to these firms since it was formed as a separate company from the BR Board, but it did take over two contracts with Eurorail Ltd. from the British Railways Board rail link project group in connection with the channel tunnel rail link project. These are (a) for the provision of personnel on secondment, awarded in December 1990 and (b) for the provision of engineering design services, awarded in April 1992. Both contracts are still in force as at 21 May 1996. The commercial terms and value of the contracts are commercially confidential.

"Transport: The Way Forward"

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) which recommendations made by the royal commission on environmental pollution in its 18th report have been specifically addressed in the Government's report "Transport: The Way Forward"; [29282]

(2) which recommendations made by the royal commission on environmental pollution in its 18th report have not been specifically addressed in the Government's report "Transport: The Way Forward". [29283]

Sir George Young: The Green Paper "Transport: The Way Forward" is a response to the national debate on transport, and as such it picks up most of the major points made by the royal commission in its call for sustainable transport policies. It did not include a point by point response to the royal commission report.

I recently met the chairman of the royal commission to discuss how to take forward the debate, including further consideration of the commission's recommendations and its views on the Green Paper.

Central Railway

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent submissions he has received from Central Railway plc. [30678]

Mr. Watts: On Monday 20 May, an application was received from Central Railway plc for an order under the Transport and Works Act 1992. I have decided that Parliament should have an opportunity to debate the principle of the proposals before a public local inquiry is held. A notice to this effect will appear in the London Gazette on Friday 24 May and in local newspapers along the route of the proposed railway as soon as practicable.

DEFENCE

Married Quarters

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many married quarters in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland will remain in his ownership following the sale of the married quarters estate; and how many of these require upgrading to bring them to a satisfactory condition. [30002]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The sale of the married quarters estate does not involve properties in Scotland or Northern Ireland, where my Department owned 6,707 and 3,130 married quarters respectively at 31 March 1996. Of these totals, 159 in Scotland and 120 in Northern Ireland require work in order to bring them back into use.

The sale of the married quarters estate in England and Wales is being progressed as an integrated package and separating the two for the purpose of this reply would incur disproportionate costs. Figures for the sale have yet to be finalised, but I am able to advise that, after the sale, my Department will continue to own some 3,000 married quarters in England and Wales not included in the sale, and will continue to own the freehold on the properties in the sale which we will then take back for service use through underleases. Out of all the properties involved, some 1,700 require work to bring them back into use.

Low Flying

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many low-level sorties were flown in the Borders tactical training area in each of the last five years. [30320]

Mr. Soames: The numbers of operational low flying movements authorised into the Borders tactical training area—TTA—in each of the last five years are as follows:

1991: 1,256
1992: 2,067
1993: 2,389
1994: 1,127
1995: 1,545

From July 1988 to September 1993, the Borders TTA was divided into east and west sectors. Movements for the two sectors were counted separately so that sorties that crossed the border between the two sectors generated additional movements. The figures for 1991 to 1993 therefore overstate the amount of activity in comparison with later years.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many representations he has received on the subject of low flying in the Borders tactical training area in each of the last five years. [30321]

Mr. Soames: Since July 1988, when the Borders tactical training area—TTA—was extended to include what was at the time referred to as the western sector, complaints from that sector have continued to be counted in the totals for low flying area 16 within which the TTA lies, rather than being recorded as coming from the TTA. Accurate records of the number of complaints received from the Borders TTA as a whole are therefore not available and could not be provided without incurring disproportionate cost. Action is being taken to ensure that complaints from the TTA are identified as such in future.

Service Personnel (Cyprus)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total financial cost to date in providing legal aid for the three British military personnel who were charged and convicted of the manslaughter of a Danish tour guide in Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [30206]

Mr. Soames: The total cost of defending the three soldiers convicted of the abduction and manslaughter of Miss Louise Jensen is, so far, about £260,000.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the terms of the Army legal aid scheme under which the legal expenses of the three British service men convicted of the manslaughter of a Danish tour guide are paid until all legal processes have been exhausted. [30201]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 20 May 1996, Official Report, column 52.

Search and Rescue Helicopters

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many search and rescue helicopters are currently based in the United Kingdom. [30204]

Mr. Soames: There are currently 19 RAF Sea King and seven RAF Wessex search and rescue helicopters in the UK. There are also four RN Sea Kings available for search and rescue duties, although search and rescue is not their primary role.

Retention Bonus

Mr. Chris Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to extend the loyalty bonus scheme to the Royal Logistics Corps; and if he will make a statement. [30486]

Mr. Soames: The bonus referred to is, in fact, known as the retention bonus. The scheme is open to soldiers in the Royal Armoured Corps, Royal Artillery and Infantry, where the most serious manpower shortages currently exist. There are no plans at present to extend the retention bonus scheme to any other corps, although the possibility of doing so in future is being examined. The retention bonus is one of a number of measures which have been taken to improve recruitment and retention.

Mr. Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the amounts paid out in loyalty bonuses to soldiers since the introduction of the new bonus scheme on 1 October 1995. [30487]

Mr. Soames: The total amount of retention bonuses paid to soldiers between 1 October 1995, when the scheme was introduced, and 31 March 1996 was £2,248,000.

Former Yugoslavia

Mr. Legg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to call out any more Army reserve and Territorial Army personnel in support of the operations in the former Yugoslavia. [30819]

Mr. Soames: Approval has been given to call out up to 240 members of the Army reserve and Territorial Army to provide support to operations in the former Yugoslavia. They will report from 12 June 1996 to mobilisation centres for selection and a short period of training before deployment. All are volunteers.

Fixed Telecommunications System

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the factors underlying the delay in the announcement on the Defence fixed telecommunications system. [30318]

Mr. Soames: An invitation to tender for the defence fixed telecommunications system was issued on 27 March 1995 and bids were received from four companies on 29 June 1995. Following evaluation of the companies' proposals, on 21 December 1995 two companies were invited to submit best-and-final offers—BAFOs. The BAFOs were received on 21 February 1996, and initial analysis showed that neither bid provided a basis for the MOD to proceed to contract. Discussions with both the companies have since taken place and they are due to submit updated proposal on 30 May 1996. The evaluation of the bids is a complex process, but it is hoped that the preferred contractor can be announced in the autumn. Subject to a satisfactory outcome of the final negotiations, a contract will be awarded early in the new year.

Nimrod Maritime Aircraft

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Nimrod maritime aircraft are currently out of operational use at RAF Kinloss; what are the causes of the technical difficulties affecting the aircraft; what will be the total cost to public funds to repair these aircraft; and if he will make a statement. [30317]

Mr. Soames: As at 20 May 1996 there were no Nimrod maritime aircraft out of operational use at RAF Kinloss, nor were there any technical difficulties to give cause for serious concern. The estimated cost of the current support contract for maintaining the Nimrod maritime force is some £15 million for a five-year period.

Small Firms

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by his Department in each of the last five years. [29431]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The Ministry of Defence does not classify the thousands of contractors with which contracts are placed each year by the size of the contractor. Researching the answer to this question could be undertaken only at disproportionate cost.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much his Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29461]

Mr. Arbuthnot [holding answer 20 May 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to her of 19 December 1995, Official Report, columns 1108-109. The 1996 edition of "UK Defence Statistics" will be published on 18 July and will provide details for 1994–95. Figures for 1995–96 will appear in the 1997 edition.

Larkhill Garrison (Electricity Supply)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost per unit of electricity purchased from Southern Electric plc to supply Larkhill garrisson in Wiltshire; what costs are attributed to the budget of consuming units who are nominated account holders; and what is the charge per unit levied on domestic occupants at Larkhill married quarters. [29868]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 21 May 1996]: Electricity is supplied to Larkhill garrison by PowerGen under the terms of a contract awarded after a competitive tender process, the details of which are commercial in confidence. Costs are attributed to consuming units at the rate provided for in the contract. Current policy is, however, to charge other customers of publicly negotiated contracts of this kind a rate consistent with the published tariff of the local utility company. Domestic occupants of Larkhill married quarters are therefore charged the Southern Electric rate of 7.1p per unit.

Military Equipment Expenditure

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the outturn expenditure on military equipment during 1995–96. [30200]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The 1995–96 provisional outturn figures will be available in the public expenditure outturn White Paper to be published in July.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Ministers (Overseas Visits)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all the overseas visits made by Ministers in his Department since 1992 indicating the places visited, the reasons for the visit, the cost to public funds and whether the Ministers concerned were accompanied by members of their family. [29958]

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Hall) on 1 April at column 62. Since then, there has been one ministerial overseas visit. This was made by the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville), to The Hague on 1 and 2 April to discuss British and Dutch co-operation on drugs matters. He was not accompanied by any member of his family. The cost of the visit, including that of accompanying officials, was £1,093.

Mixed Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many mixed prisons there are currently in England and Wales. [29718]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 22 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of mixed prisons there are currently in England and Wales.

There are currently five prisons that hold both male and female prisoners on the same site. These are Brockhill prison, Durham prison, Low Newton remand centre, Risley prison and Winchester prison.

London Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which London prisons overspent their allocated budget in 1995. [29719]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 22 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about which London prisons overspent their allocated budget in 1995.

Budgets are allocated for a financial year and adjusted periodically during the year. Provisional outturn figures for 1995/96 show that Belmarsh, Brixton, Holloway, Wandsworth and Wormwood Scrubs prisons exceeded their revised budget allocations for that year.

Young Offenders (Secure Units)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many secure units for young offenders there were within the Greater London area on 30 March. [29725]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 22 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of secure units in London for young offenders.

On 30 March 1996 there were two local authority secure units in the Greater London area approved by the Secretary of State for Health for the purpose of restricting the liberty of children.

One is at Stamford House in Hammersmith; the other one is at Orchard Lodge, Annerley.

Prisoners (Drugs)

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has commissioned into the supply of illegal drugs to prison inmates by prison staff; and what plans he has to make a further evaluation of the extent of such smuggling and to adopt policies to reduce its occurrence. [29680]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 22 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about research which has been commissioned into the supply of illegal drugs to prisoners by prison staff; for further evaluation of the extent of such smuggling; and the policies which have been adopted to reduce its occurrence.

Centrally-held records show that no members of staff have been disciplined for trafficking in drugs since the introduction of the new Prison Service Code of Conduct and Discipline in July 1993. No research has been commissioned into the smuggling of drugs by staff and there are no plans to undertake any. Governors have the discretion to search staff on entry to the prison. Staff searches should also be a part of local searching strategies.

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) on 10 May, Official Report, column 306, (i) how many prisoners were tested for drugs in each month since February 1995; [29873]

(2) how many prisoners have tested positive for each type of drug, in each month since February 1995. [29879]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 2 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the number of prisoners tested for drugs and the numbers tested positive for each drug in each month since February 1995.

Tables setting out the number of tests conducted each month (Table A) and the numbers tested positive for each drug (Table B) under the random testing programme are attached. Results for other forms of mandatory drug testing are not yet centrally collated.

Table A: Mandatory drug testing random testing programme: numbers tested February 1995 to February 1996

Month	Number tested
1995
February	207
March	319
April	324
May	239
June	342
July	317
August	191
September	521
October	717
November	1,254
December	1,698
1996
January	2,316
February	3,304
Total	11,749

Checking of statistical returns for January and February 1996 has revealed a number of errors. Error checking continues and this data must be regarded as provisional.

Table B: Mandatory drug testing random programme: prisoners tested positive for each type of drug February 1995 to February 1996

Month	Cannabis	Opiates	Cocaine	Amphetamines	Benzodiazepines	Methadone	Barbiturates	LSD
1995
February	70	5	0	0	3	0	0	0
March	111	5	1	0	5	0	0	0
April	106	14	1	0	12	1	1	0

December	273	74	6	1	30	3	0	0
1996
January	618	148	5	0	60	5	0	0
February	791	178	6	5	82	2	2	0
Total	2,922	616	33	7	278	12	3	0

Because prisoners may test positive for more than one drug, the total number of drug positive is greater than the number of prisoners found positive. Checking of statistical returns for January and February 1996 has revealed a number of errors. Error checking continues and this data must be regarded as provisional.

Preston Prison

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what maintenance and modernisation work is to be deferred at Her Majesty's prison, Preston as a result of the reduction in the prison maintenance budget. [29758]

Miss Widdecome: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. Richard Tilt to Mr. Gordon Prentice, dated 22 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about deferred work at Preston prison.

The maintenance fund for routine work at Preston prison has increased by 91 per cent this year from £91,266 in 1995/6 to £175,000 in the current financial year.

The only work to be deferred at this stage is the planned refurbishment of C wing which will now probably take place in 1997 instead of 1996 as originally planned.

Mr. Patrick Kelly

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when Mr. Patrick Kelly was transferred from the United Kingdom to a prison in the Republic of Ireland; how many years of his original 25-year sentence remains; what assessment he has made of the financial implications for the United Kingdom of Mr. Kelly's detention in an Irish prison; and if he will make a statement. [29904]

Miss Widdecombe: Patrick Kelly was repatriated to the Republic of Ireland on Tuesday 14 May. Including time spent on remand before sentence, Mr. Kelly has completed three years and six months of his 25-year sentence. No assessment has been made of the financial implications for the United Kingdom of Mr. Kelly's detention in an Irish prison since these costs fall to the Irish authorities.

Prisons (Assaults)

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of assaults, (a) by prisoners on prison officers, and (b) by prisoners on prisoners at Her Majesty's prison, Doncaster during the financial year 1995–96; and what were the average rates for its public sector equivalent comparator group. [29820]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 22 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking for the number of assaults at Doncaster prison during the financial year 1995–96 and the average rates for its public sector equivalent comparator group.

As I stated in my reply of 23 April (col. 90), a report has been commissioned from consultants Coopers and Lybrand to assess the relative costs and performance of contractually managed prisons against comparable establishments in the public sector during 1994/5. This report will be published soon and I will write to you, following publication, with information on the periods mentioned in your Questions.

Durham Prison

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons the governor of Her Majesty's prison, Durham is debarred from tendering for the courts and escorts service for the area covered by Durham prison in July 1997. [29855]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Gerry Steinberg, dated 22 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking why the governor at Durham prison has not been allowed to tender for the provision of the court and escort services for the area covered by Durham prison in July 1997.

Invitations to tender for the work—which covers the north of England rather than just the Durham area—were issued at the end of April. It is intended to award the contract in October or November this year and for phased implementation to commence in April 1997.

The contract will cover work currently undertaken both by the police and the Prison Service. It involves taking prisoners to and from court and their custody while at court. It does not constitute a part of the core duties and responsibilities of either police or prison officers, however, and has in the past often either been under resourced or has drawn valuable and highly trained personnel away from their core tasks. Contracting-out the work has led to higher standards of service to the courts and to lower costs.

In-house bids are time consuming and costly to mount, and would therefore only be undertaken if there was a reasonable prospect of achieving better value for money than contracting-out. This would be difficult to achieve in the case of court escorts. The geographic make-up of the contract area is intended both to stimulate and maintain private sector interest and offer the potential for economies of scale. Durham prison could therefore neither bid solely for its own catchment area nor the work that it currently performs. Any proposal would also need to incorporate police input to the activity.

In view of all these considerations, the decision was taken at the outset to exclude in-house bids and to contract out the work.

Advertising Standards

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what recent representations he has received about offensive or disturbing advertising on billboards; [30195]

(2) what monitoring he routinely undertakes of the Advertising Standards Authority. [30196]

Mr. Sackville: This year my right hon. and learned Friend has received four letters from Members of Parliament and one letter from a member of the public about offensive advertisements.

Government contracts with the Advertising Standards Authority are conducted principally through the Department of Trade and Industry, but my right hon. and learned Friend would not hesitate to approach the authority directly if there were grounds for concern over particular advertising material.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, for each of his Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30122]

Mr. Howard: Services provided by Home Office agencies which has been market tested since their creation are as follows:

Prison Service

Operation of Manchester prison—won by the in-house bid team.

Operation of Buckley Hall prison—contract awarded to Group 4.

Warehousing and distribution, Prison Service stores at Branston—won by the in-house bid team.

Prison Service College, Newbold Revel, administration and maintenance—won by the in-house bid team.

The value of Prison Service business conducted under contract or service level agreement after a market test, exceeds £27 million per annum at 1994–95 prices. Estimated savings are £9.26 million per annum.

No market tests have been completed by the Forensic Science Service, Fire Service College or United Kingdom Passport Agency of the services that they provide to external customers.

British Citizenship

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons resident in the United Kingdom for over 20 years have been refused British citizenship in each year since 1979. [30399]

Mr. Kirkhope: This information is not available.

Maidstone Prison

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many applications were made to undertake rehabilitation courses at Her Majesty's prison, Maidstone per month since April 1993; [30209]

(2) what has been the number of available places on rehabilitation courses at Her Majesty's prison, Maidstone per month since April 1993. [30210]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. George Howarth, dated 22 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about (i) the number of available places and (ii) the number of applications to undertake rehabilitation courses at Her Majesty's Prison Maidstone per month since April 1993.

This information is not available in the form requested.

Sixteen places are provided monthly for prisoners on the sex offender treatment core programme. Records are not kept of how many applications have been received for the sex offender treatment core programme. Since April 1993, 60 prisoners have attended the core programme and 81 have attended the extended programme. There are currently 38 prisoners waiting for a place on the core programme and 113 for the extended programme.

Records are not kept of how many applications have been received for the social skills course. This course lasts for two weeks and has 12 prisoners. In 1993 there were two courses; one in 1994; four in 1995; and so far in 1996 there has been one course, with three more planned.

The group work programme, which is run by the probation department in the prison, started in September 1995. There are an average of two groups running per month, which offer 8–10 places per group. There have been 912 applications for places on these groups. Since September 1995, 12 groups have run involving 108 prisoners.

One-to-one counselling sessions are run by the probation and psychology departments in the prison and by outside drug counsellors. Occasional courses on problem drinking, anger management and on relationships are also run. No record is kept of the number of applications for these sessions.

Mr. Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) parole applications and (b) successful parole applications were made at Her Majesty's prison, Maidstone in each month since April 1993. [30208]

Miss Widdecombe: The information requested is not available centrally.

British Board of Film Classification

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice his Department has given the British Board of Film Classification regarding its powers to review its certification of films for video release at the request of the film maker. [30243]

Mr. Sackville: Under the provisions of the Video Recordings (Review of Determinations) Order 1995, the British Board of Film Classification may, if it thinks fit, review any classification certificate issued before 3 November 1994. It is for the board to decide which video works should be reviewed in this way. There is no power for the board to review any classification certificate issued on or after that date.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions his Department has had with the British Board of Film Classification regarding the application of section 4(a) of the Video Recordings Act 1984 in respect of harm to potential viewers to the certification of films containing gratuitous violence for video release. [30244]

Mr. Sackville: It is for the British Board of Film Classification to apply the classification criteria in section 4A of the Video Recordings Act 1984 to individual video works.

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure that independent scientific expertise is included in the membership of the Criminal Cases Review Commission. [30247]

Mr. Kirkhope: The Criminal Cases Review Commission will have access to independent scientific expertise and will be able to request independent scientific tests and reports. It is important that the commission's members should reflect as wide a range of relevant skills and experience as possible, however, and we therefore have no plans to specify that scientific expertise must be included among the membership.

Forensic Science Advisory Board

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the establishment of an independent forensic science advisory board; and if he will make a statement. [30246]

Mr. Maclean: According to our records, representations from three organisations or individuals have been received about the establishment of a forensic science advisory board since the publication of the report of the royal commission on criminal justice.

Women (Protection Against Violence)

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase the protection available to women against violence and the threat of violence. [30257]

Mr. Maclean: The response to violence against women involves a number of Government Departments, whose work is co-ordinated at ministerial level. Effective action also requires the commitment and involvement of local agencies, working together to develop local preventive strategies, and to provide help and support to women who are victims of violent or sexual crimes. In order to encourage an effective co-ordinated response by local agencies, the Government published an inter-agency circular on domestic violence in August 1995. In addition, wide-ranging advice on personal safety is contained in the Home Office booklet "Your Practical Guide to Crime Prevention", a copy of which is in the Library. The booklet also contains information on what men can do to help women feel more secure.

We will continue to take measures to ensure that perpetrators are brought to justice; that victims receive the necessary emotional and practical support; and that steps are taken, through education and community initiatives, towards prevention in the long term.

Dr. Bayo Omoyiola

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons a re-entry visa was not granted to Dr. Bayo Omoyiola following a visit to the British Crown colony of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement. [30452]

Mr. Kirkhope: I have written to the hon. Member.

Merseyside Police

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effects on operations of the Merseyside police of the police grant report (England and Wales) 1996–97. [30504]

Mr. Maclean: None. It is for the police authority and the chief constable to determine spending and operational priorities on the basis of the resources made available to them.

Under-age Prostitutes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the number of police prosecutions, during 1995, against adults in England and Wales for having sexual relationships with prostitutes under the legal age of consent. [29995]

Mr. Maclean: The information requested is not available centrally.

John Mathews

Mr. Stott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review exclusion orders that are currently in force in respect of the case of John Mathews; and if he will review the forensic evidence in the case. [30253]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The order excluding Mr. Mathews from Great Britain is due to expire shortly and is therefore already under review. All relevant considerations will be taken into account.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30057]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The annual staff budget of my Department's deregulation unit, which co-ordinates the deregulation activities of the Department, is £62,870. The unit has one full-time and one part-time member of staff dedicated to deregulation: one higher executive officer and one senior executive officer, respectively, who report to a head of unit. All three members of staff are career civil servants. None has been seconded from business or has had any direct experience of the private sector. Many other officials in the Department contribute to taking the deregulation initiative forward.

Asylum and Immigration Bill

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the documents which an employer will have to recognise, other than national insurance documents, under clause 8 of the Asylum and Immigration Bill. [29951]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 21 May 1996]: In cases where no documented national insurance number was available it is currently envisaged that any one of the following documents would provide an employer with a defence:

- birth certificates issued in the United Kingdom;
- passports describing the holder as a British citizen or as having the right of abode in the United Kingdom;
- certificates of registration or naturalisation as a British citizen;
- passports issued by a state which is a party, to the European Economic Area agreement;
- identity cards issued by a state which is a party to the EEA agreement and which describes the holder as a national of a state which is party to that agreement;
- passports or other travel documents endorsed to show that the holder has indefinite leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom;
- passports or other documents endorsed to show that the holder has current leave to enter or remain in the United Kingdom and is not precluded from taking the employment in question; and
- certain letters issued by the Home Office or Department for Education and Employment indicating that the person named in the letter has permission to take any or specified employment.

Appropriate guidance about these documents will be made available to employers in due course. A telephone helpline facility will also be made available.

Repatriation (Irish Republic)

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to decide on the application of Michael O'Brien to be repatriated to prison in the Irish Republic; when he received the latest response from the Irish authorities concerning Mr. O'Brien's sentence; and if he will make a statement. [29746]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The repatriation of prisoners between the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland is governed by the Council of Europe convention on the transfer for sentenced persons. The convention requires the consent of both states involved as well as that of the prisoner concerned before repatriation can take place. Under the terms of the convention the receiving state must provide, among other things, details of how they intend to continue to enforce the sentence. In the case of Mr. O'Brien, information on this was provided by the Irish authorities on 14 February. The Government's long-established policy is not to agreed to prisoners transferring to other jurisdictions, save in exceptional circumstances, if, as a consequence, a prisoner is likely to receive a substantial reduction in time to serve. The information provided by the Republic of Ireland is currently under consideration and Mr. O'Brien's request will be determined as soon as possible.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date he announced that Patrick Kelly was to be repatriated to prison in the Irish Republic; on what date Mr. Kelly was transferred from Northern Ireland to the Republic; and if he will make a statement. [29747]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 20 May 1996]: Patrick Kelly was advised on Thursday 9 May of the decision to grant his request for repatriation to the Republic of Ireland. He was transferred there on Tuesday 14 May.

Prison Service (Education Programmes)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all education programmes in the Prison Service which have been dropped, in the last year for which the information is available; and if he will make a statement. [29295]

Miss Widdecombe [holding answer 20 May 1996]: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Alex Carlile, dated 22 May 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about Prison Service education programmes which have dropped in the last year.

Courses which are provided in prisons vary constantly in response to local needs and priorities. Details of programmes which begin and end are not collated centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The guidance on cost reductions which the Prisons Board has issued to governors makes it clear that emphasis should be on securing greater efficiency and that reductions in regime activities such as education should come as a last resort.

Where reductions do take place, governors have been advised to look at courses which have few prisoners and are costly to run and also those which do not offer worthwhile qualifications or are not of any clear use to prisoners in helping them lead law-abiding and useful lives after release.

Some prisons are likely to reduce expenditure on non-essential education courses, others will be maintaining their existing provision and some are planning to expand education provision.

Sentencing Statistics (Wales)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish for the last 10 available years the number of people (a) sentenced to terms in prison, (b) on remand and (c) the total of (a) and (b) for each the present boroughs of Ynys Môn, Gwynedd, Conwy, Sir Dinbych, Sir Fflint and Wrexham. [28657]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 10 May 1996]: The available information on persons sentenced to immediate custody is given in the table. Information for 1985 to 1988 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Comprehensive data about remands by petty sessional division are not available.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Educational Selection

16. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received regarding educational selection. [29109]

Mrs. Gillan: My right hon. Friend receives frequent representations on this subject.

Employment (West Midlands)

17. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to increase employment in the west midlands. [29110]

Mr. Forth: The Department's aim is to continue to promote a free and flexible labour market to encourage employment in the west midlands region as elsewhere—a market that during the last three months has supported 20 overseas companies investing in the west midlands, bringing with them £188 million of investment and creating almost 1,300 new jobs.

Performance and Spending

18. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on the relationship between performance standards and spending in schools. [29111]

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The most important factors in school performance are leadership and the quality of teaching. There is no close correlation between performance and spending on education.

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the correlation between performance and spending on education. [29090]

Mr. Robin Squire: The most important factors in school performance are leadership and the quality of teaching. There is no close correlation between performance and spending on education.

Unemployment

19. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the United Kingdom's record on reducing unemployment in relation to that of other major EU countries. [29112]

Mr. Forth: The UK, free of the burden of unnecessary regulation, has the lowest unemployment rate of any major European country—at 8.4 per cent., well below the 11 per cent. average throughout Europe.

30. Sir Michael Neubert: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she next expects to meet her European counterparts to discuss current levels of unemployment in EU countries. [29124]

Mr. Forth: I expect to meet European Union Employment Ministers at the next meeting of the Social Affairs Council on 3 June at which we will be discussing a draft report to the Florence European Council on employment issues. We will also discuss the employment situation with Economic and Finance Ministers.

Departmental Amalgamation

20. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment she has made of the benefits to date accruing from the amalgamation of the former Departments for Education and of Employment. [29113]

Mr. Robin Squire: The amalgamation has given us the opportunity to develop more coherent policies in critical areas such as lifetime learning and the framework of qualifications. We are beginning to see the first fruits of the new approach.

Higher Education Funding

21. Mr. Waller: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent representations she has received from universities about higher education funding. [29114]

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend has received a substantial volume of correspondence about higher education funding from the universities in recent months.

Failing Schools (Inner London)

22. Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proposals she has to assist failing schools in inner London. [29115]

Mr. Robin Squire: The primary responsibility for the improvement of failing schools lies with governing bodies and local education authorities. LEAs can provide financial assistance and advice; but, where necessary, the Government will transfer failing schools to the conduct of an education association.

Primary Education (Standards)

23. Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what comparisons she has made between different local education authorities with regard to standards in primary education. [29116]

Mr. Robin Squire: The national measure of standards of achievement in primary education is performance in national curriculum assessments. The Government have announced their intention to publish next spring school level performance tables of achievement at key stage 2. It will be possible from these tables to derive a measure of the relative achievement of schools in different local education authorities.

Primary Schools (Class Sizes)

24. Mr. Mudie: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she intends to take to reduce class sizes in primary schools. [29117]

Mr. Robin Squire: Decisions about class sizes are a matter for local education authorities and schools taking account of local circumstances and priorities.

Jobseekers Act 1995

25. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on progress in respect of the implementation of the Jobseekers Act 1995. [29118]

Mr. Forth: The jobseeker's allowance, as set out in the Jobseekers Act, is on course for implementation on 7 October 1996.

Nursery Voucher Scheme

26. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much has been spent on publicity in phase 1 of the nursery voucher scheme. [29120]

33. Mr. Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much has been spent to date on publicity in phase 1 of the nursery voucher scheme. [29127]

Mr. Robin Squire: To date, some £1.1 million has been spent on providing information to parents and providers nationwide. It is not possible to break down expenditure between the phase 1 areas and the rest of the country.

Technology Grants

27. Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of the technology grants already awarded have gone to estate schools which are neither opted out, nor voluntary aided nor city technology colleges. [29121]

Mrs. Gillan: Since the specialist schools initiative was launched in November 1993, a total of £37.9 million has been allocated to the initiative up to the end of 1996–97. Of this total, £3.4 million has been allocated in capital grant and £5.3 million in recurrent grant to participating state schools which are neither grant maintained, nor voluntary aided nor CTC.

Secondary Modern Schools

28. Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations she has received urging the reintroduction of secondary modern schools. [29122]

Mrs. Gillan: Secondary modern schools continue to contribute to the diversity of educational provision in England. Some 160 schools are classified as secondary modern in the secondary school performance tables.

Information Technology

29. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps she is taking to improve the competence of United Kingdom children in respect of information technology. [29123]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department has given a central lead to the development of IT in schools since the early 1980s. Following Sir Ron Dearing's review of the national curriculum in 1993, we took the opportunity to make information technology a separate subject within the national curriculum. It is a mandatory area of study from five to 16.

Since 1990, financial support for IT in schools totalling over £132 million has been provided under grants for education support and training.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she expects to publish the results of her Department's statistical survey into the provision of IT equipment in schools. [30225]

Mr. Squire: The Department plans to publish the 1996 survey of information technology in schools in November. A press notice listing a schedule for the publication of statistics, including the IT survey, was issued on 28 March 1996.

Teaching Standards

31. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures she intends to take to improve teaching standards in schools. [29125]

Mr. Robin Squire: Following the Office for Standards in Education report on the teaching of reading in three London boroughs, my right hon. Friend has announced a number of additional measures designed to expose and tackle poor teaching standards—and to monitor the performance of local authorities and teacher trainers.

Full-time Employment

32. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans her Department has to increase full-time employment in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement. [29126]

Mr. Forth: We shall continue with the policies that have enabled businesses to create more than 350,000 full-time jobs since autumn 1993.

Part-time and Temporary Jobs

34. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what research she has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the number of employees who are in part-time and temporary jobs because they can not find permanent work and as to trends in the number; and if she will make a statement. [29128]

Mr. Forth: The labour force survey provides routine information on part-time and temporary work, and shows that the vast majority of part-timers are in permanent employment.

Pupil Exclusions

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many pupils, and for what period of time, have been excluded from schools in the Easington constituency in each year since 1992. [30214]

Mr. Robin Squire: This information is not available centrally.

The Department has this year started collecting figures on permanent exclusions through the annual census returns sent to all schools in January. Data on exclusions in the school year 1994–95 should be available by the early autumn.

Truancy

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what were the recorded rates of truancy in schools in England and Wales (a) at the latest available date and (b) in 1980. [30202]

Mr. Robin Squire: Rates of unauthorised absence for maintained primary and secondary schools in England for the 1994–95 school year were as follows:

Primary Schools

Percentage of half days missed: 0.5 per cent.

Average number of half days missed per absent pupil: 10

Secondary Schools

Percentage of half days missed: 1.0 per cent.

Average number of half days missed per absent pupil: 22

Equivalent information was not collected centrally in 1980.

Information on pupil absence rates in Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Head Teachers

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to reform procedures for the appointment of head teachers; and if she will make a statement. [29107]

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked the Teacher Training Agency to establish a national professional qualification for headship—NPQH. The Government anticipate that, in time, those being appointed as head teachers will be expected to have gained the NPQH.

Teacher Training Agency

Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are the expenditure plans for teacher recruitment by the Teacher Training Agency for (a) 1995–96, (b) 1996–97 and (c) 1997–98. [30453]

Mr. Robin Squire: This is a matter for the Teacher Training Agency. I will ask the chairman of the agency, Geoffrey Parker, to write to the hon. Member direct.

National Council for Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she received a report of the quinquennial review of the National Council for Vocational Qualifications; and if she will make a statement. [30788]

Mr. Paice: The report is being published today and copies are being placed in the Library. The review has informed our recent consultation document, "Building the Framework", on the future of NCVQ and School Curriculum Assessment Authority, in the light of Sir Ron Dearing's recommendations.

EU Trade Talks

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when she plans next to meet European Community Ministers to discuss trade; and if he will make a statement. [30306]

Mr. Lang: I have been asked to reply.

My colleagues and I meet our European Union counterparts regularly to discuss a wide range of trade issues particularly those arising in preparation for the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in Singapore in December.

SCOTLAND

Drug Users (Tayside)

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the level of funding allocation by the national services division to Tayside health board for services for drug users in the current year; and what was the figure in each of the three previous years. [29756]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The level of funding allocated by the national services division to Tayside health board for drug misuse services in the four financial years from 1993–94 to 1996–97 is set out in the table.

1993–94: £265,000[1]

1994–95: £850,000

1995–96: £1,091,000

1996–97: £1,090,302

[1] The figure for 1993–94 does not include allocations for HIV drugs-related services which, since 1994–95, have been included in the general drug misuse allocations.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the level of funding allocated by Tayside health board in the current year and for last year to (a) Dundee drugs and AIDS project, (b) Wishart centre, (c) Body Positive and (d) Scottish drugs forum. [29757]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information, which has been provided by Tayside health board, is set out in the table.

	1995–96 Actual £	1996–97 Intended allocations £
Dundee drugs and AIDS project	[1]220,000	[3]158,500
Wishart centre	[2]42,000	20,000
Body Positive	—	15,000
Scottish drugs forum	60,000	42,000

[1] This amount includes non-recurrent funding of £82,000.
[2] This amount includes non-recurrent funding of £22,000.
[3] This amount includes non-recurrent funding of £20,500.

Scottish Drugs Forum

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the level of core funding provided by the Scottish Office to the Scottish drugs forum in the current year and in 1995–96. [29731]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The core funding provided by the Scottish Office to the Scottish drugs forum for the two years in question is as follows:

Financial year	Total core grant £
1995–96	88,000
1996–97	150,000

Betaferon

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the arrangements adopted in each health board area in Scotland for the prescription of the drug betaferon to patients suffering from multiple sclerosis; and what estimate he has made of the number of patients in each health board area potentially able to benefit from this drug. [29732]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to ensure that his Department's guidance on the use of the drug betaferon for patients suffering from multiple sclerosis is being consistently applied in each health board area in Scotland. [29733]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: NHS circular MEL (1995) 73 issued on 16 November 1995 to all health boards and NHS trusts offering guidance in the context of their responsibilities to develop and plan local arrangements to manage the entry of beta interferon into the NHS.

The use of the drug for the treatment of patients suffering from multiple sclerosis is, in each case, a matter for the clinical judgment of the responsible medical practitioner.

Woodcot and Arduthie Hospitals

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will take steps to ensure a full public consultation before the proposed closure of Woodcot and Arduthie hospitals in Grampian, and that the award of the contract for the replacement hospital is announced before the consultation is completed. [29734]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Public consultation carried out by Grampian health board through the local health council between June and September 1995 established strong support for a new hospital in Kincardineshire to replace the two existing old and unsuitable facilities. I look forward to learning the outcome of the tendering exercise currently being undertaken by the health board, and I will wish to be satisfied that any proposals put forward for an alternative model of service provision represent an improvement on what exists at present before I agree to the closure of any hospital.

Student Nurses

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the drop-out rate of student nurses in Scotland in each year of Project 2000 courses, for each of the last three years for which there are figures; and if he will make a statement. [29816]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is set out in the table. It gives the overall wastage rates for each year of training for intakes commencing during the fiscal years 1992–93 to 1994–95.

	Percentage
Year of commencement	Lost during first year	Lost during second year	Lost during third year
1992–93	12.2	9.4	3.6
1993–94	9.6	7.5	—
1994–95	9.1	—	—

Note:
All losses are expressed as percentages of the original intake sizes at commencement.
Source:
National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Scotland.

Project 2000 courses were introduced in August 1992 in Scotland; therefore only one cohort have completed; their three-year training courses. A valid wastage rate cannot be calculated from one cohort. As Project 2000 becomes established, trends in wastage rates will become apparent. An evaluation of Project 2000 has been commissioned and the results will be known in early 1997.

Health Boards (Administration Costs)

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a copy of his statement of 9 May on administration costs of health boards in Scotland. [29945]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Copies of my news release concerning administration costs of health boards in Scotland have now been placed in the Library.

Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the mechanisms which he employs for the acquisition of land for the provision of smallholdings under the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919. [30506]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: No land has been acquired under the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919 since 1947.

Ms Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on how many occasions the provisions of the Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919 have been used for the provision of smallholdings since 1966; and in each case what was the date and the location. [30507]

Mr. Robertson: The Land Settlement (Scotland) Act 1919 provisions for the creation of small holdings have not been used since 1966.

Health Boards (Shields Report)

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he intends to publish the Shields report on the role and responsibilities of health boards in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [29944]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The Shields report is to be published shortly. I will then place a copy in the Library.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30067]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The Scottish Office deregulation unit comprises one member of the senior civil service, one grade 7, two higher executive officers, one executive officer and two administrative assistants. The officers concerned are all career civil servants and none has worked recently in the private sector. These staff also perform other functions within the Scottish Office Education and Industry Department and for that reason it is not possible to assign a specific cost to their deregulation activities.

Home Energy Conservation Act 1995

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) when he plans to issue guidelines relating to the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995; [28470]

(2) if local authorities in Scotland will be eligible for grants during 1996–97 under the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995 action scheme; and if he will make a statement. [28471]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 9 May 1996]: Guidance on the operation of the Home Energy Conservation Act 1995 will be issued to Scottish local authorities, following consultation with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, later this year. It is expected that the Act will be brought into force in Scotland in 1997.

While Scottish local authorities are eligible to apply for assistance under the Energy Saving Trust Home Energy Conservation Act demonstration project, if they meet the criteria for the scheme, it is more likely to be of interest to Scottish authorities in 1997–98.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a list of all overseas visits made by all Ministers of his Department since 1990, including (a) details of the places visited and brief reasons for the visit, (b) details of the size, composition and cost to public funds of the delegation and (c) the names of non-ministerial members of each delegation and the capacity in which each was present. [17498]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 March 1996]: Details of overseas visits as from 1 January 1991 are listed in the table. Information before 1991 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Non-ministerial members of the delegations have not been named as it is not normal practice to do so. They were in attendance to provide support for Ministers.

Official Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was spent on official hospitality by his Department and all associated agencies in the financial year 1995–96. [28576]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 9 May 1996]: The total expenditure on official hospitality by the Scottish Office during the financial year 1995–96 was £82,978. In addition, the Scottish Office spent £34,680 on hospitality as part of the Government's contribution to the VE and VJ-day commemorations.

The actual expenditure on official hospitality during the financial year 1995–96 for each of the agencies associated with the Scottish Office is set out in the table.

Agency	Outturn of expenditure £
Scottish Office Pension Agency	973
Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency	2,063
Scottish Agricultural Science Agency	3,059
Student Awards Agency for Scotland	215
Historic Scotland	5,362
Scottish Courts Service	2,502
Scottish Prisons Service	6,824
Scottish Record Office	1,166
Registers of Scotland	6,249
Total	28,413

Cattle

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of (a) dairy and (b) beef cattle in Scotland at the latest available date. [29912]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 17 May 1996]: The information requested is set out in the table.

	December 1995
Total dairy cattle[1]	342,541
Total beef cattle[1]	664,587
Other cattle[2]	1,124,305

[1] The totals in each class include breeding cows, breeding heifers and other female cattle for breeding.
[2] Other cattle includes bulls for service and all other cattle not for breeding.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Exchange Rates (EU Funds)

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what have been the implications of recent changes in exchange rates upon the amounts Her Majesty's Government may receive from regional development funds and social funds from the European Union. [30166]

Mr. Eggar: Governments do not apply for grants from these funds; the Commission, following criteria laid down in Council regulations, makes a number of block allocations for each member state.

These allocations, like the whole of the EC budget, from which they are drawn, are denominated in ecu. Changes in exchange rates therefore affect the value in national currencies of the structural funds grants received by all member states.

Business Links

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many business link chief executives have been dismissed from that post; and what proportion this is of the total. [30126]

Mr. Page: No business link chief executives have been dismissed.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many chief executives of business links are the first appointments to such posts. [30127]

Mr. Page: Sixty-six business link chief executives are first appointments to their posts.

Nuclear Privatisation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his Department's response to the second report of the Trade and Industry Select Committee on nuclear privatisation, HC 383, what estimates his Department has received from British Nuclear Fuels plc in respect of the extent of the future growth in the market for plutonium-based mixed oxide fuel. [30007]

Mr. Eggar: This is a commercial matter for British Nuclear Fuels plc.

Export Controls

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what initiatives have been taken to date to implement the recommendations in Sir Richard Scott's report on (a) military and (b) dual-use equipment sales to Iraq in respect of the tightening of export controls and scrutiny of export licence applications; and if he will make a statement on the role of different Government Departments in executing the revised export control policy. [30008]

Mr. Lang: I plan to publish a consultative paper on export licensing procedures in the summer. The Government will consider fully all representations made in response to that paper before making proposals for a revised export control policy.

Research Establishments

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to make a decision on the future of the public sector research establishments under the first tranche of the prior options review; and if he will make a statement. [30323]

Mr. Ian Taylor: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced the timetable for the reviews on 26 January 1996, Official Report, columns 421–23, and made it clear that the results were to be considered by Ministers collectively.

The Government are currently considering the outcome of the first tranche of reviews. I expect an announcement to be made shortly.

British Energy

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what assumptions informed the adoption of a 135-year time scale for the full dismantling of British Energy's nuclear power generating plants; and if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which the full dismantling of nuclear power generating plants could be undertaken in a shorter period; [30391]

(2) pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) of 14 May, Official Report, column 409, what are the determinants of the future agreed strategy; and if he will make a statement. [30395]

Mr. Lang: Government policy on decommissioning is set out in the July 1995 White Paper "Review of Radioactive Waste Policy". This concluded that there are a number of potentially feasible and acceptable decommissioning strategies for nuclear power stations, including "safestore". British Energy's preferred strategy will be set out in the pathfinder prospectus. To ensure that operators' decommissioning strategies remain soundly based as circumstances change, they will be reviewed quinquenially by the Health and Safety Executive, which will consult the environment agencies. The agreements establishing the segregated fund provide for changes in the level of payments into the fund in the event that British Energy's agreed strategy changes.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements he has made of the assumptions and calculations used by BZW in its paper "The Cash Generator". [30455]

Mr. Lang: The research paper "The Cash Generator" was written by independent analysts from the utilities sector of BZW Research. It is one of a number of research papers by independent analysts on British Energy. The analysts at BZW Research are completely independent of the team from BZW advising the Government on the privatisation.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals he has to underwrite future contributions by British Energy to its segregated fund in circumstances where (a) British Energy could not meet the payment and (b) British Energy became insolvent. [30344]

Mr. Lang: The agreements contain cross and parent company guarantees which make Nuclear Electric Ltd. and Scottish Nuclear responsible for each others' obligations and require British Energy to act as guarantor.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what would be the level of payments of British Energy to its segregated fund if the time scale for the full dismantling of the nuclear power generating plants was (a) 20 years, (b) 50 years and (c) 70 years after the end of production. [30346]

Mr. Lang: The level of payments into the fund are based on British Energy's expected costs of decommissioning its advanced gas-cooled reactor nuclear power stations 70 years after the end of generation and 50 years after generation for the Sizewell B pressurised water reactor. Figures for other time scales are not available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the segregated fund would have preferential creditor status on the company's assets if British Energy became insolvent. [30345]

Mr. Lang: As with other parties with whom British Energy has contractual arrangements, the fund will be able to enforce its contractual rights against the assets of British Energy.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) to what extent British Energy's segregated fund will meet liabilities from the privatised assets; [30382]

(2) what proportion of the initial endowment towards the segregated fund of British Energy will be provided from public funds. [30381]

Mr. Lang: The initial endowment to the segregated fund will be paid for by British Energy, not from public funds. This endowment, and subsequent quarterly payments will be paid by the privatised companies.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proportion of the shortfall between total undiscounted liabilities of British Energy and the sum generated by the segregated fund will be met by British Energy revenues. [30335]

Mr. Lang: British Energy will be responsible for meeting all its liabilities.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leeds West, of 14 May, Official Report, column 409, from what source intermediate-level waste and high-level waste disposal costs are to be funded. [30394]

Mr. Lang: All ILW and HLW disposal costs for ILW and HLW arising from the operation of British Energy's power stations and the treatment of spent fuel from these stations will be funded by British Energy.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proportion of the undiscounted liabilities of British Energy will be met by the segregated fund. [30337]

Mr. Lang: BE's accounts for the year ended 31 March 1996 have not yet been finalised. BE provided provisional financial information in respect of the year ended 31 March 1995 at an analysts' briefing on 4 March 1996.

The provisional financial information indicated that BE's undiscounted nuclear liabilities at 31 March 1995 were £14.3 billion, consisting of £10.3 billion for fuel cycle and £4 billion for decommissioning. The majority of the fuel cycle liabilities are covered by contracts. The segregated fund deals with all decommissioning costs except defuelling costs. As at 31 March 1995, the segregated fund arrangements cover just over 90 per cent. of the undiscounted decommissioning liabilities.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the estimated annual cost for (a) each advanced gas-cooled reactor and (b) the pressurised water reactor of reprocessing after shut-down and stage 1 decommissioning. [30341]

Mr. Lang: This detailed information is a commercial matter for British Energy plc.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the undiscounted value of the liabilities of British Energy; and if he will give a breakdown of the constituent parts of the total. [30336]

Mr. Lang: Details of the undiscounted value of the nuclear liabilities of British Energy will be included in the prospectus.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the financial forecasts indicating when British Energy will generate income sufficient to meet the post-shut-down reprocessing costs and stage 1 decommissioning costs of the advanced gas-cooled reactors as they close. [30340]

Mr. Lang: This is a commercial matter for British Energy plc.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what public funds will be used to meet the liabilities arising from the assets of British Energy. [30383]

Mr. Lang: None. British Energy will be responsible for meeting all its liabilities.

Magnox

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, (1) pursuant to paragraph 8.21 of the nuclear review White Paper, Cm 2860, if he will estimate the extent to which sufficient funds will be (a) generated by the Magnox stations and (b) realised by the privatisation of the advanced gas-cooled reactors and pressurised water reactors to meet the cost of the liabilities which remain in the public sector; [30384]

(2) what is the undiscounted cost of the liabilities remaining in the public sector; and how those liabilities will be met; [30393]

(3) when the Magnox stations will exhaust their existing sources of funding including, income from generation and outstanding fossil fuel levy and cash and investments currently held on current assumptions and calculations; and when the Government expect to contribute to reprocessing waste management and decommissioning costs. [30385]

Mr. Lang: The undiscounted cost of Magnox Electric plc's nuclear liabilities will be shown in the company's annual report and accounts, which I understand will be published shortly. The sources of funding of these liabilities were described in the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and Energy to the hon. Member for Colchester, South and Maldon (Mr. Whittingdale) on 10 May 1996, Official Report, columns 294–96.

The timing and amount of funding of these liabilities by Magnox and the Government are dependent on a number of factors. These include the level of Magnox's future income, which is dependent on among other things, interest rates and electricity prices, the potential for further improvements in the understanding and control of decommissioning costs and other nuclear liabilities, and the benefits to be derived from the proposed integration of Magnox with British Nuclear Fuels plc.

Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has reached a decision on the future of the BBSRC's agriculture and plant sciences institutes; and if he will make a statement. [30818]

Mr. Lang: Prior options reviews have been completed of the Institute of Arable Crops Research, the Institute of Grassland and Environment Research, the John Innes Centre and the Silsoe Research Institute. I am satisfied that the functions of these institutes are needed and that they should retain their separate existence.

They are currently constituted as distinct legal entities with charitable status but are regulated by the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council. Their staff are members of the research councils pension scheme and BBSRC carries contingent liability for staffing. They are consequently subject to public sector financial controls.

I have concluded that full independence from the public sector, with the greater freedom this will provide the institutes to direct their own affairs, would be a desirable option which merits further consideration. This will therefore by the subject of further work led by the Prime Minister's adviser on efficiency, Sir Peter Levene. The institutes would remain eligible to compete for research funding from BBSRC and other public sector funders. [30329]

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to make an announcement on the current review of the research establishments under the control of the BBSRC.

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 21 May 1996]: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade announced the timetable for the reviews on 26 January 1996, Official Report, columns 421–23.

Four BBSRC institutes were included in the first tranche of reviews. These were the Institute of Arable Crops Research, the Institute of Grassland and Environmental Research, the John Innes Centre and the Silsoe Research Institute. I expect an announcement on the outcome of these reviews to be made shortly.

Four further BBSRC institutes were included in the timetable. The reviews of the Babraham Institute, the Institute for Animal Health and the Roslin Institute are due to be completed by the end of July 1996. The review of the Institute of Food Research is due to be completed by the end of December 1996. Announcements on the outcome of each of these reviews will be made as soon as possible.

National Weights and Measures Laboratory

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the outcome of the prior options review of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory. [30817]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Government have accepted the review team's recommendations that NWML should remain an executive agency of DTI.

In reaching this decision the Government took into account the advantages of maintaining the existing integration between NWML's technical and policy functions, for which support has been received from industry.

Central Laboratory of the Research Councils

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has reached a decision on the future of the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils; and if he will make a statement. [30814]

Mr. Lang: I announced to the House on 17 November 1995, Official Report column 10, that the Daresbury and Rutherford Appleton laboratories, which together form the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils, were to be the subject of a prior options review.

The review found that the functions performed by the CLRC are needed and that it should remain in the public sector as a non-departmental public body of the Department of Trade and Industry, through the Office of Science and Technology. The Government are content to proceed on this basis while asking that further work on the involvement of the private sector should be carried out as described later. I am also satisfied that the current arrangements, whereby CLRC obtains the great majority of its income from competitively won contracts and service level agreements, bring suitable market forces to bear on it and that these should continue.

The Government have agreed with the recommendations of the steering committee for the review that the laboratory should work to achieve further reductions in its overhead costs, and that work should be done to put in place a sound, longer-term planning model between CLRC and its research council customers. In addition, I have agreed that the CLRC should be set targets for broadening its customer base, and that further work should be carried out to identify and overcome, where appropriate, any barriers to greater private sector involvement with the laboratory, and on potential private sector interest in operating the establishment. These matters will be investigated by my Department.

I believe that these steps will enable the Council for the Central Laboratory of the Research Councils to build upon the success of the first year of its existence and will ensure that it remains well placed to contribute fully to the science and engineering base of the UK.

Public Sector Research Establishments

Mr. Wiltshire: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made on the prior options reviews of public sector research establishments. [30815]

Mr. Lang: I announced the timetable for the prior options reviews of public sector research establishments on 26 January, Official Report columns 422-23. The reviews are being conducted in three tranches, with a view to the major part of the work being completed by the end of 1996.

The Government have been considering the outcome of the first tranche of reviews. Our objective is to ensure that the Government receive the best quality scientific and technical services, with the best possible value for money for the taxpayer.

An announcement on the Building Research Establishment was made on 2 April, Official Report, columns 163-64, by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

I and my hon. Friend the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs are today making announcements on a number of establishments for which I have responsibility:

Central Laboratory of the Research Councils
Institute of Arable Crops Research Institute of Grassland and Environmental Research
John Innes Centre
National Weights and Measures Laboratory
Silsoe Research Institute

Announcements are also being made today by the responsible Minister for each of the following establishments:

Directorate of Fisheries Research
Fisheries Research Services
Forestry Commission Research Division
Macaulay Land Use Research Institute
Scottish Agricultural Science Agency
Scottish Crop Research Institute

Decisions on other establishments will be announced as soon as possible.

Industrial Relations

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the current state of industrial relations between management and employees. [29119]

Mr. John M. Taylor: There has been an immense improvement in relations between management and employees in recent years, as shown by the 94 per cent. reduction in the strike rate since the 1970s. The Government's step-by-step reform of industrial relations and trade union law has undoubtedly contributed significantly to this improvement.

Enterprise Agencies (Employment Initiatives)

Dr. Goodson-Wickes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on enterprise agencies in relation to employment initiatives. [29091]

Mr. Page: Enterprise agencies are independent local companies whose boards are drawn from local industry and the community. They offer a range of business services to new and established small firms including advice and counselling, specialist financial services, business skills training and the provision of managed workspace. A majority of enterprise agencies are partners in business link and are often local deliverers of training and enterprise council and business link services to start-up and micro firms.

Steelworkers

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to ensure that there is a fair distribution of (a) Rechar, (b) Resider, (c) Retek and (d) Konver funds to address the needs of unemployed steelworkers. [29975]

Mr. Eggar: I will announce the allocations as soon as possible, after giving full consideration to the representations I have received from the hon. Gentleman and others.

Late Payments

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 15 May, Official Report, column 495, when he expects to be in a position to state on what date his Department will be publishing the table of results of all Departments and their agencies for 1995–96. [30437]

Mr. Page [holding answer 21 May 1996]: I refer to my answer of 15 May on this subject. The figures are currently being collated and I would expect to be able to announce a publication date shortly.

Export Credit Guarantees

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the top 10 recipients of export credit guarantees granted by the Export Credits Guarantee Department in each of the last five years. [30154]

Mr. Nelson [holding answer 20 May 1996]: It has been the policy of successive Governments not to disclose information about commercial relations between the Export Credits Guarantee Department and individual companies unless the relevant parties have agreed to this.

Coal Investments Ltd.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the extra funding requirement needed by the Coal Authority as a result of the administrative receivership of Coal Investments Ltd.; and if he will make a statement. [30260]

Mr. Page: This is a matter for the Coal Authority.

Offshore Oil and Gas Exploration

Mr. Ainger: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) when he expects to publish draft regulations to implement the environmental impact assessment directive 85/337/EEC for offshore oil and gas exploration activities; and if he will make a statement; [29584]

(2) when he gave an undertaking to implement the environmental impact assessment directive 85/337/EEC for offshore oil and gas exploration activities; what consultations he had undertaken with interested parties; and when that consultation period ended. [29587]

Mr. Page [holding answer 16 May 1996]: The Government are committed to implementing directive 85/337/EEC in so far as it applies to offshore oil and gas activities and I intend to seek comments from interested parties on our proposals in the near future.

Scientists and Engineers

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 12 March, Official Report, column 526–28; how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed at each grade, including unified grades, in each year in the regional offices from their inception. [29831]

Mr. John M. Taylor [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The data requested are not available from the inception of regional offices. Records are available for the period since 1985 and are shown in the table, with the position as at 1 January in each year. Integrated Government offices were created out of regional offices on 1 April 1994. The figures for 1995 and 1996 reflect the number of relevant DTI officials in the integrated Government offices.

Data on the specialisms held by staff in the unified grades are not maintained historically, but the current position is shown in the table.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 12 March, Official Report, columns 526-28, how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed at each of the unified grades in the headquarters division of his Department in each year since 1991. [29830]

Mr. Taylor [holding answer 20 May 1996]: Data on the specialisms held by staff in the unified grades are not maintained historically. The current number of officers in the headquarters divisions of the Department with a science or engineering discipline is 117 at grade 7 level, 23 at grade 6 level and 17 in the senior civil service.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 12 March, Official Report, columns 526-28, how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed at each grade, including unified grades, in each of his Department's agencies in each year since 1991. [29833]

Mr. Taylor [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The table shows data for all agencies since 1991 with the position as at 1 January in each year for which relevant information is available. The environmental work of the Warren Spring Laboratory executive agency were merged with that of the Atomic Energy Authority in April 1994; the National Physical Laboratory became a contractually operated agency in October 1995; the National Engineering Laboratory executive agency was privatised on 1 November 1995; and the Laboratory of the Government Chemist executive agency was sold on 1 April 1996.

Historical data on the specialisms held by staff in the unified grades are not maintained, but of the Department's agencies, the National Weights and Measures Laboratory currently has two grade 7s and one in the senior civil service with a science or engineering disciple and the Radiocommunications Agency has 19 at grade 7 level, six at grade 6 and two in the senior civil service.

SOCIAL SECURITY

State Retirement Pensions

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners in the United Kingdom currently (a) draw their state retirement pension at a post office and (b) have it paid into a bank or building society. [29724]

Mr. Heald: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many pensioners in the United Kingdom currently (a) draw their state Retirement Pension at a post office and (b) have it paid into a bank or building society.

As of 31 March 1996, the latest date for which figures are available, 6,105,653 pensioners collect their Retirement Pension at the post office and 3,126,053 pensioners are paid direct into a bank or building society account. A further 279,995 pensioners receive payment by payable order which subsequently will be paid into a bank or building society account. These figures are provisional and subject to amendment.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Motability

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to clear the report of the National Audit Office into Motability and related matters. [30051]

Mr. Burt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) on 30 January, Official Report, column 735.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many representations he received in the first three months of 1996, regarding the working of the Child Support Agency; and if he will make a statement. [29726]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Ministers received 640 letters and representations from hon. Members on child support issues during the first three months of 1996. This compares with 969 received in the first three months of 1995 and reflects the improvements we have made to the scheme since then.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list, for each of her Department's agencies, the market testing which has been carried out into the services and what were the results. [30133]

Mr. Burt: The information for the period up to March 1995 has been placed in the Library.

"Competing for Quality" results for the period between April 1995 and March 1996 are being compiled for the Department's efficiency plan. It is anticipated that this information will be published in the 1996 next steps review.

Benefits (Loans)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security under what circumstances loans, other than student loans, are counted as income when applying for social security benefits. [26851]

Mr. Roger Evans [holding answer 29 April 1996]: Money from a loan may be treated as income if it is a sum received regularly—weekly, monthly or even annually—and will be taken into account at an equivalent weekly rate.

Lump sums received as one-off loans will generally be treated as capital and will not affect benefit if a claimant's overall capital remains below the lower capital limit—£3,000 for most claimants or £10,000 for people in residential care or nursing homes.

Compensation

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will exempt persons who successfully claim compensation as a result of disability arising from asbestosis and other similar conditions from the compensation recovery scheme; [30388]

(2) if he will raise the small payments limit for the compensation recovery scheme; and if he will make a statement; [30389]

(3) if he will ensure that the costs of any community care or aids and adaptations required, arising out of an injury or illness, where such medical conditions result in successful claims for compensation, are taken into account in any compensation recovery undertaken by the compensation recovery unit; and if he will make a statement. [30255]

Mr. Roger Evans: Extensive consultation has taken place on the implications of changes to the compensation recovery scheme. That consultation is now complete. The Government are now considering whether any reform of the present scheme is appropriate and will announce their decision in due course.

Means-tested Benefits

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of the total cash value of all benefits paid out were means tested, for each year between 1979 and 1991. [29854]

Mr. Burt: The information is in the table:

£ million

	1978–79	1979–80	1980–81	1981–82	1982–83	1983–84

Attendance Allowance

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in Scotland over the age of 65 years were in receipt of attendance allowance in (a) 1992–93 and (b) 1995–96. [29247]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people in Scotland, over the age of 65 years were in receipt of Attendance Allowance in (a) 1992–93 and (b) 1995–96.

The information requested is as follows:

At 31.3.93: 73,800

At 29.2.96: 109,600

(latest data available)

Figures are provisional and subject to amendment.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Disability Living Allowance

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will list the number of people in Scotland aged (a) five to 15 years, (b) 16 to 29 years, (c) 30 to 64 years and (d) over 65 years (i) in receipt of and (ii) refused disability living allowance mobility component at the higher and lower levels in (1) 1992–93 and (2) 1995–96; [29214]

(2) if he will list the number of people in Scotland aged (a) five to 15 years, (b) 16 to 22 years, (c) 30 to 64 years and (d) over 65 years (i) in receipt of and (ii) refused disability living allowance care component at the higher, middle and lower levels in (1) 1992–93 and (2) 1995–96; [29209]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions about the number of people in Scotland aged (a) 5–15 years, b) 16–29 years, and (c) 30–64 years and (d) over 65, (i) in receipt of and (ii) refused Disability Living Allowance (DLA) mobility component at the higher and lower levels of the mobility and care components of disability living allowance in (i) 1992–93 and (ii) 1995–96.

Appendix A gives details of DLA mobility component.

Appendix B gives details of DLA care component.

Appendix C gives details of DLA mobility and care components.

Unfortunately the information for refusals is not available in the format requested, as it is not possible to give a breakdown of disallowances by component or component level. However I am able to provide the total figure for all refusals of DLA following new claims received at both Edinburgh and Glasgow disability benefit centres for both the years.

1992/93: 25,890

1995/96: 35,148.

Figures are provisional and subject to amendment.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Severe Disablement Allowance

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the number of people in Scotland aged (a) 16 to 29 years and (b) 30 to 64 years, (i) in receipt of and (ii) refused severe disablement allowance in (1) 1992–93 and (2) 1995–96. [29213]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of severe disablement allowance is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking if he will list the number of people in Scotland aged (a) 16 to 29 years and (b) 30 to 64 years, (i) in receipt of and (ii) refused Severe Disablement Allowance (SDA) in (1) 1992–93 and (2) 1995–96.

The information is not available in the format requested. The total number of people in Scotland who were in receipt of SDA as at 31 March 1993 was 34,920 and at 31 March 1996 was 41,205.

However a statistical sampling exercise was completed and the information derived is as follows:

	Aged 16 to 29	Aged 30 to 64
As at 3.4.93[1]	8,000	25,000
As at 30.11.95[2]	9,680	28,500

Figures are provisional and subject to amendment.

[1] These figures are taken from a 1% sample of all claims to benefit in Great Britain, and are rounded to the nearest thousand. Regional information is recorded and has been used to produce this data.

[2] The latest figures available are for 30.11.95. These are taken from a sample of the Pensions Strategy Computer System for Incapacity Benefit, and do not include a small number of cases which are not held on this system.

The number of people in Scotland who were refused SDA can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people is Scotland currently in receipt of (a) the care, (b) the mobility and (c) both components of disability living allowance have been awarded the benefit for life. [29211]

Mr. Mitchell: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people in Scotland currently in receipt of (a) the care, (b) the mobility and (c) both components of Disability Living Allowance have been awarded the benefit for life.

Disability Working Allowance

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in Scotland were (a) in receipt of and (b) refused disability working allowance in (i) in 1992–93 and (ii) 1995–96. [29248]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people in Scotland were (a) in receipt of and (b) refused Disability Working Allowance (DWA) in (i) 1992–93 and (ii) 1995–96.

The information requested is not available in the format requested. Data is not available for 1992/93 as it has been destroyed in line with our current document destruction policy. Data for the period January 1996 to March 1996 will not be available until August 1996. However information is available for the calendar years 1993 and 1995 in the following table:

Number of customers	1993	1995

Invalidity Benefit

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in Scotland were (a) in receipt of and (b) refused invalidity benefit in 1994–95. [29249]

Mr. Burt: The administration of incapacity benefit is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Dr. Norman A. Godman, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people in Scotland were in receipt of and refused Invalidity Benefit (IVB) in 1994–95.

The number of people in Scotland in receipt of IVB on the last working day of each month is as follows:

	Number
April 1994	229,208
May 1994	229,761
June 1994	230,554
July 1994	231,819
August 1994	232,697
September 1994	233,850
October 1994	232,826
November 1994	234,889
December 1994	235,023
January 1995	236,565
February 1995	237,121
March 1995	238,918

Data are provisional and subject to amendment. Information on the number of people refused IVB is not held centrally. To obtain the information requested would require an examination of the clerical papers held in all BA benefit offices in Scotland to identify those customers who were refused invalidity benefit during the period in question. This information could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Benefits Agency Emergency Service

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants contacted the Benefits Agency out-of-hours emergency service for each of the last five years; and if he will break down the figures by (a) age and (b) reason for application. [29839]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Ms Ann Coffey, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many claimants contacted the Benefits Agency out-of-hours emergency service for each of the last five years; and if he will break down the figures by (a) age and (b) reason for application.

The information is not available in the format requested. Statistics are not kept which show the age of the customers referred to the out-of-hours service or their reason for application. Also, statistics were not kept of the number of referrals to out-of-hours prior to 91/92.

However listed below is the number of referrals for the statistical years (ending October) 91/92, 92/93, 93/94 and 94/95. It should be noted that the term "referral" is defined as a contact by the customer or by a third party on their behalf.

Statistical year	Number of referrals
1991–92	21,709
1992–93	42,722
1993–94	47,994
1994–95	48,744

Figures are provisional and subject to amendment.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to make available emergency financial provision to claimants following the proposed abolition of the Benefits Agency emergency service. [29838]

Mr. Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Ms Ann Coffey, dated 21 May 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what proposals he has to make available emergency financial provision to claimants following the proposed abolition of the Benefits Agency emergency service.

As you will be aware I recently outlined the BA's plans for the future delivery of social security benefits based on the BA vision of "right money to the right person at the right time, every time".

It is against this background that the Agency has declined to review the need for the out of hours service and the London Emergency Office which provides a service to customers at night and weekends. A decision on the future of the service is expected during this year.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Notes:

[1] Means-tested in-work benefits are defined as family income supplement, family credit and disability working allowance, plus housing benefit, rent and rates rebate, community charge benefit and council tax benefit paid direct to people with earnings but who are not on income support/supplementary benefit. Earnings for this purpose have been defined as employed or self-employed earnings.
[2] Figures are rounded to the nearest thousand except for disability working allowance, where exact figures are quoted.
[3] Figures are for May of each year and refer to benefit units, which may be a single person or a couple.
[4] Figures include estimates due to the data collection procedure in Scotland.
[5] Data on housing benefit and previous schemes providing financial assistance with domestic rents and rates cannot be broken down prior to 1988.
[6] Family credit replaced family income supplement in April 1988.
[7] Disability working allowance was introduced in April 1992.
[8] Community charge benefit—CCB—replaced rate rebate in Scotland for 1989 and Great Britain from 1990. CCB figures for 1989 refer to Scotland only; rate rebate figures refer to England and Wales only. Council tax benefit replaced community charge benefit from April 1993. Figures for council tax benefit exclude second adult rebate cases.

Income Support

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost in relation to income support of pensioners of reducing the assumed income from savings of between £3,000 and £8,000 to £1 per week per £1,000. [28898]

Mr. Roger Evans [holding answer 13 May 1996]: The estimated annual cost in 1996–97 is £60 million.

Notes:

1. Estimates are based upon date drawn from the 1991, 1992, and 1993 family expenditure surveys uprated to 1996–97 prices and benefit levels.

2. Estimates exclude cases in residential care and nursing homes.

3. Adjustments to these estimates are made using data drawn from the May 1995 quarterly statistical inquiry for income support.

4. Pensioners are taken to be all cases where at least one member of a couple, or a single person, is aged over 60 years.

5. Estimates are rounded to the nearest £10 million.

6. The estimate is based on assumed income of £1 per week for each £1,000 of capital held above £3,000 or part thereof.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of bringing the savings allowance for income support for pensioners into line with those for housing benefit and council tax benefit, and of setting the assumed income from savings above £3,000 to £1 per week per £1,000 for (a) income support for pensioners, (b) housing benefit for pensioners and (c) council tax benefit for pensioners. [28899]

Mr. Evans [holding answer 13 May 1996]: The lower and upper capital limits which apply in the calculation of income support are currently £3,000 and £8,000 respectively, and £3,000 and £16,000 in housing benefit and council tax benefit. For people living permanently in residential care or nursing homes, the lower and upper capital limits are £10,000 and £16,000 respectively in income support and housing benefit—from April 1996.

The estimated annual cost in 1996–97 of raising the upper capital limit in income support to £16,000 and reducing the assumed income from savings above £3,000 to £1 per week per £1,000 for pensioners on (a) income support is £220 million, (b) housing benefit is £140 million, and (c) council tax benefit is £80 million.

Notes:

1. Estimates are based on data drawn from the 1991, 1992 and 1993 family expenditure surveys uprated to 1996–97 prices and benefit levels.

2. Estimates exclude cases in residential care and nursing homes.

3. Adjustments to these estimates are made using data drawn from the May 1995 IS quarterly statistical inquiry for income support, and the May 1994 HB/CTB(MIS) for housing benefit and council tax benefit.

4. Pensioners are taken to be all cases where at least one member of a couple, or a single person, is aged over 60 years.

5. Estimates are rounded to the nearest £10 million.

6. The estimate is based on assumed income of £1 per week for each £1,000 of capital held above £3,000, or part thereof.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many representations he has received on his changes to the payment of mortgage interest for claimants. [19706]

Mr. Roger Evans [pursuant to his reply, 19 March 1996, c. 362]: Unfortunately, there was an error in my oral reply. The correct reply is as follows:

Our intention was that the system of add back should protect the benefit entitlement of existing claimants at the point of change when the standard rate was introduced in October last year. It was never our intention that add-back should provide permanent protection. Where Mr. Tickle's case is concerned I have caused further inquires to be made. I am told that he has a mortgage that is fixed up to a certain level and then variable above that level. It also appears that the system of add back is working as we intended. It provided Mr. Tickle with complete protection at the point of change, and is continuing to provide some protection.

Child Benefit

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children aged (a) 16, (b) 17, (c) 18 and (d) 19 years in receipt of child benefit attend (i) school, (ii) sixth form college, (iii) tertiary college, (iv) further education college and (v) the youth training scheme. [30139]

Mr. Burt [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The information is not available in the format requested. Child benefit data are not available on the nature of the education being undertaken, and education data have no regard to the receipt or otherwise of child benefit. The figures are therefore not directly comparable. However, child benefit is not payable for any young person undergoing a youth training course, and all entitlement ceases at the 19th birthday. Available data on the number of 16, 17 and 18-year-olds for whom child benefit is paid, and the number in education and training, are in the tables:

Number of children for whom child benefit is paid:

16-year-olds: 577,100

17-year-olds: 400,700

18-year-olds: 177,600

Educational establishments attended by 16 to 18-year-olds

	16-year-olds	17-year-olds	18-year-olds
Schools	246,000	175,000	19,000
Sixth form colleges	53,000	40,000	10,000
Tertiary colleges	35,000	30,000	13,000
Further education	125,000	112,000	74,000
Youth training	69,000	46,000	40,000

WALES

Abattoirs (Rendering)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received on the rendering capacity available to Welsh abattoirs; and if he will make a statement. [29608]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: My right hon. Friend and I have been closely monitoring the rendering provision for Wales and have listened carefully to the many representations from hon. Members, the farming unions, abattoirs and individuals.

We have strongly put the case for appropriate provision for Wales and officials are in constant contact with the Intervention Board which is operating the scheme.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list, for each of his Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services it provides and what were the results. [30128]

Mr. Hague: Cadw—Welsh Historic Monuments—has market tested the provision of its conservation repair service. The in-house bid was successful.

Alcohol Abuse

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from voluntary bodies working in the anti-alcohol abuse field concerning the level of funding to Alcohol Action Wales in the year 1996–97; and which successor bodies he has nominated to provide continuation of anti-alcohol abuse advice. [30502]

Mr. Hague: I have received two representations from voluntary bodies expressing concern at the decision not to fund Alcohol Action Wales this year. The Welsh drug and alcohol unit will provide expert advice and practical support to the Welsh Office, health and local authorities and other statutory and voluntary bodies that are involved in tackling drug and alcohol misuse.

Welsh Health Common Services Authority

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total expenditure on consultants in connection with the market testing of the materials management service, the contracts unit and the prescription pricing division of the Welsh Health Common Services Authority. [30503]

Mr. Hague: Some £176,190 for materials management and contracting which was a joint exercise and £120,609 for prescription services. In addition, £15,736 has been paid for legal advice to the authority covering these and other activities included in the market-testing exercises.

Inward Investment Project Broadcast

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set up an inquiry into the premature disclosure of the major inward investment project broadcast by the BBC on Friday 10 May. [30695]

Mr. Hague: I have already looked into the matter and do not believe that the source of any information was the Welsh Office or its executive agencies. Further speculation and publicity would not be in the best interests of Wales.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Performing Arts (Young Offenders)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment she has made of the value of performing arts programmes for the rehabilitation of young offenders. [28696]

Mr. Sproat: This is a matter for the Prison Service and the Arts Council of England which decides its own funding policy.

National Lottery

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) what has been (a) the number and (b) the amount of national lottery grants awarded by each of the national lottery boards in each English county, metropolitan authority and London borough; [29055]

(2) what has been (a) the number and (b) the amount of national lottery grants awarded by each of the national lottery boards in each parliamentary constituency; [29053]

(3) how many applications there have been to each of the five national lottery boards from each parliamentary constituency; [29052]

(4) how many applications have been made to each of the five national lottery boards by each English county, metropolitan authority and London borough. [29054]

Mr. Sproat: The information requested is not available. The Department of National Heritage is developing a new lottery database that will allow for these breakdowns to be made.

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the projects so far accepted for funding by the millennium fund (a) by value and (b) by local authority area. [29284]

Mr. Sproat: The Millennium Commission has made 55 awards totalling £494,033,411. These awards cover a total of 1,145 projects throughout the United Kingdom. The information is contained in the table.

Figures for national lottery funds broken down by local authority areas are not currently available. The Department of National Heritage is developing a new lottery database that will shortly allow for these breakdowns to be made.

55 awards, 1,145 projects

Mr. Renton: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many charities have been awarded funds from the national lottery. [28880]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 20 May 1996]: As at 15 May, 6,685 awards have been made, totalling over £1.54 billion. More than 80 per cent. of these grants have gone to charities or voluntary organisations and account for around half of all the money awarded.

The National Lottery Charities Board is distributing 20 per cent. of the proceeds of the national lottery exclusively to projects proposed not only by registered charities but by voluntary organisations and organisations with a philanthropic aim. The board has made 2,460 grant awards, totalling £159 million, to charitable organisations both large and small.

Canoeing

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what estimate she has made of the grant available from the Sports Council and other public bodies in support of canoeing in the year 1994–95, expressed in terms per capita of those participating in this sport; and what are the corresponding figures for the sport of angling. [29333]

Mr. Sproat: In 1994–95 the British Canoe Union received a grant of £320,000 from the Sports Council. A further £6,500 was also provided for canoeing schemes in awards from sportsmatch, a business sponsorship incentive scheme for sport launched by the Government in 1992 to increase the amount of business sponsorship going into grass roots sport and physical recreation. This represents a sum of £3.26 on a per capita basis for the estimated 100,00 people who take part in the sport. In 1994–95 Sports Council grants to the governing bodies of angling totalled £54,125. In addition to this, sportsmatch provided £42,250 in awards for angling schemes. This represents a sum of 3p on a per capita basis for the estimated 2.9 million people participating in freshwater and seawater angling in England and Wales.

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment she has made of the adequacy of the technical definition for canoeing in the Scottish/NVQ, for coaching. [30325]

Mr. Sproat: The awarding bodies forum has accepted the technical definition for canoeing, and it therefore meets the normal requirements for S/NVQs. In relation to health and safety, the technical definition was developed by the British Canoe Union following principles and procedures agreed by the forum, and it is for the BCU to review this definition on a regular basis.

Business Sponsorship

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment she has made of the extent of business sponsorship of innovative arts projects and small arts bodies. [29932]

Mr. Sproat: A significant percentage of smaller arts companies have attracted business sponsorship. Based on statistics collected by the Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts and analysed by the Arts Council of England, I understand that some 51 per cent. of arts organisations with a turnover of between £10,000 to just under £50,000 were in receipt of commercial support during 1994–95. Innovative projects also continue to receive sponsorship from the business sector. Recent examples include Barclays stage partners and the Guinness ingenuity awards for pub theatre.

Arts Council

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she last met the chairman of the Arts Council; and what was discussed. [29933]

Mr. Sproat: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State meets the chairman of the Arts Council on a regular basis to discuss a range of issues. Details of the discussions are not given.

Listed Buildings (North Frith House)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what advice she has received from English Heritage on whether North Frith house, Tonbridge, Kent, should be listed. [29736]

Mr. Sproat: English Heritage has advised my right hon. Friend that North Frith house should be listed. My right hon. Friend has decided to accept that advice and North Frith house and two bathing boxes in its grounds were added to the statutory list on 17 May 1996.

Museums and Galleries

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans she has in respect of the repair and refurbishment of museums and galleries. [29934]

Mr. Sproat: It is for those responsible for individual museums and galleries to make plans for the repair and refurbishment of their buildings. In 1996–97, the Department will provide over £205 million of grants in aid to 17 museums and galleries, plus a further £9 million to the Museums and Galleries Commission to help the wider sector, but these bodies each decide how much of their grant is to be directed towards repair and refurbishment. In addition, museum and galleries throughout the UK can apply for funds from the national lottery to refurbish and improve their buildings.

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what information she collates on the level of admissions to national galleries and museums. [29931]

Mr. Sproat: My Department collates figures on visitor numbers for each museum and gallery it sponsors. The latest such information was provided in the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) on 8 May 1996, Official Report, columns 170-71.

National Vocational Qualifications

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she expects the Scottish/NVQ technical definition for (a) cricket, (b) windsurfing, (c) trampolining, (d) tennis, (e) rugby union, (f) rugby league, (g) rowing, (h) swimming, (i) sub-aqua, (j) orienteering, (k) netball, (l) movement and dance (recreational), (m) judo, (n) hockey, (o) gymnastics, (p) fencing and (q) basketball, to be produced. [30324]

Mr. Sproat: Judo, cricket, tennis, movement and dance, hockey, swimming, rowing, orienteering, netball, and sub-aqua are all at an advanced stage of development of their technical definition. Windsurfing, basketball, gymnastics, and fencing are at the forefront of S/NVQ development in coaching. Consequently, their technical definition as part of their approval for centre status. In due course, these sports will develop a separate technical definition, which is the current practice for new NVQs. Rugby union, rugby league and trampolining are not, at present, involved in working towards the S/NVQ process of developing a technical definition.

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if groups not recognised by the Sports Council are permitted to submit contextual definitions within the Scottish national vocational qualifications for coaching. [30326]

Mr. Sproat: It is the responsibility of the sport concerned to develop the technical definition by consulting widely throughout the sport. Any non-recognised body would be able to contribute to this process through the recognised governing body. One of the criteria for recognising a governing body is that they are truly representative of the specified sport.

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many sport groups have taken up NVQs; and of these how many (a) are live, (b) have approved technical definitions and (c) can deliver NVQs. [30328]

Mr. Sproat: Twenty-one sports have now developed materials to allow the technical content of S/NVQs to be assessed. This figure includes those sports with separate technical definitions and those where technical definitions were approved when they received centre status.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list, for each of her Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30118]

Mr. Sproat: In the period from the formulation of my two agencies until March 1995 they have market tested the elements of their services to the public listed in the table.

The "Competing for Quality" figures for the period between April 1995 and March 1996 are being compiled for our agencies' efficiency plans. It is anticipated that this information will be published in the 1996 next steps review.

Concessionary Television Licence Scheme

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list the concessionary television licence schemes currently operating in the United Kingdom. [29991]

Mr. Sproat: In addition to the accommodation for residential care concessionary television licence scheme, a reduction in the licence fee is available for registered blind people.

Football Pools Industry

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will assist the football pools industry from the receipts of the national lottery, with special reference to measures to assist those recently made redundant in the industry; if she will consult representatives of the pools industry regarding this matter; and if she will make a statement. [30475]

Mr. Sproat: It was recognised during the passage of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993 that the pools companies would face a considerable challenge when the lottery was up and running. The Government have, therefore, made important changes to their regulatory and tax regime to help the pools firms compete effectively. These are:

- lowering the minimum age for play from 18 to 16;
- allowing pools companies to advertise on television and radio;
- allowing pools companies to roll over jackpots not won;
- allowing them to sell coupons in retail outlets; and, most important, reducing the rate of pools betting duty by 10 per cent.

A measure allowing the payment of football pools winnings in licensed betting offices is expected to come into force this summer. The Home Office is also considering further deregulatory measures proposed by the Pools Promoters Association and is consulting them and my Department about this matter.

All areas and sections of society are benefiting from the funds raised by the lottery for the five good causes. There are no current plans to change the beneficiaries or the method of distributing national lottery funds to allow the pools industry to benefit directly.

Advertising Standards Authority

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what monitoring she routinely undertakes of the Advertising Standards Authority. [30197]

Mr. Sproat: None. Matters relating to advertising controls in the non-broadcast media are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

Arts, Sport and Heritage Funding

Mr. Jessel: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will make a statement on the funding provisions for the arts, sport and heritage. [28770]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The areas for which I am responsible benefit from a wide range of funding. The partnership between public money in the form of central and local Government support and the lottery, and private money through sponsorship, provides well over £3 billion for arts, sport and our heritage. This partnership supports all our sectors on a scale never enjoyed before.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is her departmental funding of the arts for 1996–97; what estimate she has of the funding of the arts by other European Union states; and if she will make a statement. [22720]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 26 March 1996]: My Department's funding for the arts in England amounts to £194.25 million in 1996–97, of which £186.1 million is channelled through the Arts Council of England. The parallel figures for the Scottish, Welsh and Northern Ireland Offices are £24.47 million, £15.49 million and £7.67 million, of which £24.47 million, £15.49 million and £7.15 million respectively are channelled through the relevant Arts Councils. Local authorities spend an amount on the arts similar to that provided by central Government through the four Arts Councils which in 1996–97 totals more than £233 million. On top of this, lottery awards of more than £400 million have been made so far, all of which are helping to improve the quality and increase the availability of the arts for everyone in the UK. It is anticipated that the arts' share of lottery awards will be in excess of £300 million this year. This adds up to public funding in the UK for the arts in excess of £775 million in 1996–97. No comparative figures exist for funding provision for the arts by other European Union member states.

Council of Europe Meetings

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995 have been attended by Ministers or officials of her Department; and if she will make a statement. [29362]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 17 May 1996]: No separate record of attendance at meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe is kept by the Department of National Heritage.

Small Businesses

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many firms with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50, (c) 20 and (d) 10 employees were used by her Department in each of the last five years. [29439]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 20 May 1996]: In the past, neither my Department nor its agencies have kept a specific record of a supplier's size. This historical information could therefore be obtained only by incurring disproportionate cost.

However, my Department and its two agencies are now recording the size of suppliers invited to tender and this information will be available in future.

Sports Broadcasting

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she intends to publish the results of her consultation document on sport on television. [28784]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 20 May 1996]: "Broadcast Sports Rights: Informing the Debate" was not a formal consultation document, but a discussion paper published to assist the public and parliamentary debate. The Government's conclusions are reflected in the clauses on listed events which now form part of the Broadcasting Bill.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to her answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 370, what consultations she has had with the home rugby unions concerning the possibility of adding the Five Home Nations international championship to the schedule of listed events under the Broadcasting Act 1990. [30407]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 21 May 1996]: I have had several informal discussions.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how much her Department paid to the private sector for goods and services in 1995–96. [29454]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 20 May 1996]: While the information requested is not available, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost, my Department paid a total of £10.1 million for goods and services in 1995–96.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is her Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if her Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29423]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 20 May 1996]: My Department and its agencies have made some use of bonds for building contracts in accordance with the advice on the use of performance bonds set out in the central unit on procurement's guidance note No. 48, "Bonds and guarantees", copies of which are available in the Libraries of both Houses. The guidance makes it clear that bonds are not always necessary and are no substitute for considered judgments about the risks of a particular contract and the capabilities and financial resources of the available contractor. These factors will vary for each contract independent of the size of the contractor. My Department has made claim against only two bonds, one in 1994–95 by the British library project for approximately £100,000 and another in 1995–96 by the Royal Parks agency for approximately £4,000.

Credit Unions

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will introduce measures to ensure that the National Lottery Charities Board in Scotland is able to provide funding for credit unions. [29828]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 20 May 1996]: We have no plans at present to introduce changes to the legislation governing the National Lottery Charities Board. But, as with all legislation, we will keep the operation of the National Lottery etc. Act 1993 under review, and bring forward proposals for change where we consider it right to do so.

Euro 96

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what mechanism was used to divide moneys made available to local authorities for Euro 96; and in allocating funds what consideration was given to the fact that the ground of Manchester United is located in the borough of Trafford. [29967]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The Association of Metropolitan Authorities requested the funding and the Secretary of State agreed to provide it. The AMA identified in each case the local authority that would receive funding. In the case of Manchester, it has informed us that, although Old Trafford football stadium is in the borough of Trafford, the cultural events themselves will take place in areas under the jurisdiction of Manchester city council. Trafford council has a representative on the steering group which is overseeing that cultural programme.

Mr. Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what moneys have been made available to local authorities in respect of Euro 96; and for what purposes these sums have been granted. [29966]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The Department of National Heritage agreed in June 1995 to a request by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities for a contribution of £400,000 towards a core funding package of £800,000 for cultural events organised by the eight cities where Euro 96 matches are taking place. The Department has committed £100,000 in direct grant aid and a further £150,000 was earmarked within both the sportsmatch and Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts schemes. The AMA assured us this would enable funds of about £2.5 million to be generated from other sources.

In addition, the Sports Council is contributing £130,000, the Football Association is contributing £160,000 and the Foundation for Sport and the Arts has approved £78,000 for specific cultural events. The national music festival will also focus this year on Euro 96 and help promote events in the eight cities.

Premier League Tickets

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will refer the pricing regime of premier league football tickets for the 1996–97 season to the Office of Fair Trading. [30248]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 21 May 1996]: I have no plans to refer the ticket pricing regime of the premier league to the Office of Fair Trading as I have no evidence of either monopoly abuse or anti-competitive practice by clubs in the league.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the objectives and policies which form part of the information society initiative and which rely on the use of personal data; and if he has discussed these objectives and policies with the Data Protection Registrar. [29694]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The information society initiative brings together a range of existing and new support programmes into a coherent and accessible whole, with the overall objective of helping UK business take maximum advantage of information and communication technologies. It includes in particular programmes to raise awareness of the potential business benefits of using new technologies, and highlights some of the implications of doing so, including data protection and security issues.

No ISI programme relies on the use of personal data. Where personal data and received as part of the dissemination of ISI in areformation to interested parties, they are handled according to the relevant data protection regulations.

Crown Post Offices (Ayrshire)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many people are employed at each of the Crown post offices in Ayrshire. [28964]

Mr. Oppenheim: I understand from the Post Office that the number of staff employed at each Crown post office in Ayrshire as at May 1996 is as follows:

	Number
Ayr	15
Kilmarnock	18
Irvine	16
Kilwinning	8
Saltcoats	9

EU Countries (Trade Deficit)

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the countries in the European Community with which the United Kingdom currently has a trade deficit, indicating the amounts in each case. [30307]

Mr. Oppenheim: Information on visible trade between the United Kingdom and other European Community countries is published by the Office for National Statistics in tables B13 (exports) and C13 (imports) of the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Carpet Industry

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many square metres of carpet were imported in each year since 1979; and from which countries these imports originated. [30360]

Mr. Oppenheim: Total UK imports of carpets are given in the table. A breakdown by country of origin or dispatch can be provided only at disproportionate cost. Furthermore, since the introduction of the single market at the start of 1993, comprehensive information on the country of origin for imports is not available. Due to a revision in the system of classification, figures prior to 1988 are not strictly comparable with more recent ones.

UK Imports of carpets

Year	Million sq. m.
1979	30.7
1980	40.5
1981	50.2
1982	55.5
1983	66.2
1984	76.4
1985	86.2
1986	92.1
1987	101.4
1988	114.3
1989	125.7
1990	131.5
1991	121.6
1992	132.4
1993	94.3
1994	106.9
1995	108.3

Carpets are classified to Group 659, "Floor coverings, etc" of the Standard International Trade Classification (Revisions 2 and 3).

Mr. Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the output of the British carpet industry in each year since 1979; and what percentage was exported. [30362]

Mr. Oppenheim: The information is given in the table.

Output and exports of the British carpet industry

Year	Gross output £ million	Exports £ million	Exports as a percentage of gross output
1979	736	162	22.0
1980	659	145	22.0

Devon and Cornwall (Funding Applications)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what studies he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated which indicate the comparative success of Devon and Cornwall in securing funding by making funding applications (i) together and (ii) individually. [30402]

Mr. Nelson: Published statistics on regional selective assistance provide a basis for some inter-regional comparison. This and other funding programmes are monitored and evaluated continuously.

British Business (Prospects)

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he next plans to meet representatives of the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the prospects for British business. [30352]

Mr. Oppenheim: My right hon. Friend and other DTI Ministers regularly meet the Confederation of British Industry to discuss a range of issues.

Lingerie

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of (a) domestically manufactured and (b) imported lingerie for the most recent year for which figures are available. [30359]

Mr. Oppenheim: The information requested can be obtained from the Quarterly Market Report QR12 on womenswear, in the UK market series, which is available in the Library of the House. This report is published by Taylor Nelson based on data collected by the Office for National Statistics.

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; which agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30572]

Mr. John M. Taylor: From time to time the Department of Trade and Industry makes use of private detective agencies or investigators for such matters as process serving, but no central record is kept of the use of such people.

Lougborough Gas Research Centre

Ms Coffey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the effect of proposed job losses at the gas research centre Loughborough on current research programmes with his Department's funding. [31046]

Mr. Page: Current research and development programmes being funded by Government Departments will be completed within agreed contract terms and conditions and proposed manpower rationalisations will not affect this.

Ms Coffey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has sought assurances from British Gas that job losses at the gas research centre at Loughborough will not prejudice current research and development programmes to improve gas safety. [31048]

Mr. Page: The Government expect British Gas to maintain sufficient research and development to meet its obligations for ensuring gas safety. British Gas has made it clear that the new research arrangements will not affect safety standards and that no key areas of research have been affected.

Ms Coffey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the level of research and development funding by the Department of Trade and Industry to programmes at Loughborough gas research centre for each year since 1993. [31047]

Mr. Page: The total DTI funding paid for research and development projects conducted at British Gas's Loughborough research centre since 1993 is £1,236,034.

Ultra-sonic Gas Meter

Ms Coffey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the value to date of export sales of the ultra-sonic domestic meter developed by British Gas. [31083]

Mr. Page: The information requested is not separately identified in the UK trade classification. This is a matter for British Gas.

British Energy

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 593, if he will publish the independent actuarial advice upon which his decision was made to set the level of British Energy's contributions to a segregated fund before (a) the date upon which advertising the sale of British Energy commences and (b) the date upon which the pathfinder prospectus is launched. [31190]

Mr. Lang: The advice, as stated in my answer of 17 May 1996, Official Report, column 593, will be placed in the Library of the House when available. Appropriate details on the segregated fund will also be provided in the British Energy prospectus.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 593, on what basis his Department made a decision on the correct level of contribution by British Energy to its segregated fund. [31191]

Mr. Lang: The Government based their decision on a number of factors, including British Energy's expected costs of decommissioning, the investment policy for the fund and the expected returns on the funds assets, and the tax rules that will apply.

Wind Turbines

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much electricity was produced from wind turbines in the United Kingdom in (a) 1992, (b) 1994 and (c) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [30801]

Mr. Page: Electricity generated by wind schemes in the UK in each of the years 1990 to 1995 was approximately as follows:

Year	GWh
1990	1
1991	2
1992	26
1993	213
1994	337
1995	379
Total	958

I expect the numbers to continue to rise year by year as more wind farms come into operation.

Electricity Consumption

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the gross consumption of electricity in the United Kingdom in (a) 1992, (b) 1993 and (c) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [30761]

Mr. Page: Consumption of electricity in the United Kingdom was 291.45 TWh in 1992, 295.75 TWh in 1993 and, provisionally, 303.22 TWh in 1995. Electricity consumption grew by 3.9 per cent. in 1995, and by 1.3 per cent. per year on average over the last five years.

Anglia Television

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what investigations are currently being undertaken into possible insider dealing in Anglia Television shares; and when these investigations are expected to be completed. [30835]

Mr. John M. Taylor: It is not the practice of the Department to comment on individual cases.

Offshore Installations (Pollution)

Ms Ruddock: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list for each of the last five years (a) the number of releases of oil or chemicals from offshore installations on the United Kingdom continental shelf, (b) the substance released and the amount of oil or waste for each escape and (c) the name of the installation and the operator in each case. [31102]

Mr. Page: It is an offence under the Prevention of Oil Pollution Act 1971 to discharge oil or any mixture containing oil into the sea from a pipeline or in the course of petroleum exploration and production in the United Kingdom continental shelf if that discharge is not the subject of an exemption granted in accordance with section 23 of that Act. In practice the operators of installations on the UKCS obtain exemptions to permit operational discharges. These exemptions are limited in accordance with international standards and require the operator of the installation to report any discharge made in accordance with the exemption. The amount of oil discharged in accordance with these exemptions is published in summary form in volume 2 of the annual energy report, a copy of which is held in the Library of the House. The number of notifications make it impracticable to give this information otherwise than in summary form.

Companies licensed to carry out petroleum exploration and production on the UKCS are required by the terms of their licence to report to the Secretary of State any escapes of petroleum from the licensed area. A summary of oil spills reported to the Department of Trade and Industry is also published in volume 2 of the annual energy report. Again, the number of spills make it impractical to give details of each discharge.

The use of chemicals offshore is regulated by a notification scheme whereby licensees seek prior approval of the use of chemicals in exploration and production. Licensees are not required to report releases of chemicals from installations.

South-West Industrial Development Board

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 1 May, Official Report, column 545, what was the potential conflict of interest of Mr. Roger Harris that caused him to absent himself from the south-west industrial development board meeting; and on how many occasions potential conflicts of interest have prompted similar action by Mr. Harris. [28754]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 13 May 1996]: The potential conflict of interest arose because KPMG, of which Mr. Roger Harris is a senior partner in the Plymouth office, was acting as auditors and grant consultants to Pendennis Shipyard Ltd. Mr. Harris has absented himself for similar reasons from discussions by the board on other occasions.

South-West Regional Office

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what remuneration was granted to Mr. Kenneth Holmes for his external services between the dates of appointment and termination of contact; what were the terms of this contact; for what reason the contract ended; who has since assumed responsibility for this role; and what checks have been made into their financial background and interests. [28736]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 13 May 1996]: A total of £238,868 was paid to Dellcourts Limited, a company owned and controlled by Mr. Holmes, in respect of his services between 5 February 1991 and 15 April 1995. By the end of this period, the relevant contract had run its full term and was being renewed on a monthly basis.

The external advisers currently assisting the Government office for the south-west on applications from companies for financial assistance are:

Mr. Rodney Pool of Riverdale Ltd.

Mr. Terry Scarrott

Mr. William R. Mountford

Checks on all three have been undertaken on the Insolvency Service and other departmental databases; they have also been asked to supply—for inclusion on a register—details of their financial and other interests in companies.

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what financial interests in companies are held by the officials in his Department's south-west regional office. [28737]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 13 May 1996]: The work of the Department's former south-west regional office is now performed by the Government office for the south-west which employs 230 officials. Like all public servants, they must not use information gained in their work to advance their financial interests or the financial interests of others, nor must they participate in the taking of any decision which could affect the value of those interests.

Competition Policy

Mr. Rowe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the implications for the Government's competition policy of the judgment of Mr. Justice Knox in the chancery division of the High Court in the case of Mid Kent Holdings plc. delivered on 30 April; and if he will make a statement. [29614]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 16 May 1996]: I have carefully studied the judgment delivered by Mr. Justice Knox on 30 April. In relation to the specific case before the court, he concluded that Mid Kent Holdings did not have a sufficient private right to obtain declarations that General Utilities was in breach of undertakings given to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on 21 March 1991, and that in those circumstances he considered that it would be wrong for him to give a view as to whether there had been such a breach. Mr. Justice Knox also reaffirmed my discretion under section 93(A)2 to bring civil proceedings in respect of any failure, or apprehended failure, to fulfil an undertaking. I will ensure that future decisions take full account of Mr. Justice Knox's judgment in so far as it may be relevant.

Loan Guarantee Scheme

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if applications to his Department for financial assistance under the loan guarantee scheme are (a) considered and (b) offered by Department of Trade and Industry regional offices; if the value of the loan guarantee determines whether central or regional offices are responsible for the offering of this financial support; what other reasons require responsibilities to change between offices; and if he will make a statement. [30030]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 20 May 1996]: All applications for assistance under the small firms loan guarantee scheme, whatever their size, are considered centrally through the Department's loan guarantee section in Sheffield.

The scheme is a joint venture between the DTI and the lenders involved. It is the lender's responsibility to undertake the commercial assessment of a business proposal, and decide whether it is prepared to lend. Only if all normal bank lending criteria are met, other than the lack of security, should the scheme be considered. It is the lender who applies for, and receives, the guarantee.

It is the DTI's responsibility to consider whether the application meets scheme criteria. If so, the guarantee is issued.

Simplified arrangements allow certain lenders and their borrowers quicker access to the scheme where the loan amount does not exceed £30,000.

Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the newly recognised Federal Republic of Yugoslavia will enjoy the same agreements on trade that were in place for the former Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; what are the present arrangements for the duties on trade with Yugoslavia; if EUR1 certificates are applicable; whether former trading and duty arrangements between the European Union and Yugoslavia are being recognised by the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [30256]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 22 May 1996]: The 1982 trade and co-operation agreement between the EC and the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia was abrogated in 1991 following the break-up of the country. In February 1992 the trade benefits of the TCA were re-introduced for Slovenia, Croatia, Macedonia and Bosnia-Herzegovina only. Trade sanctions against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia were lifted in November 1995, but the preferences of the 1982 TCA were not extended to it. In accordance with the regional approach agreed by EU Foreign Ministers in October 1995, the EU will conclude new individual agreements covering trade with all of the successor states of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including FRY, as and when the political conditions have been met.

Many industrial products and a range of agricultural products can be imported duty free from Croatia, Solvenia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Macedonia, using EUR1 certificates, some within ceilings and quotas. Council regulations 3355, 3356 and 3357/94, as amended by Council regulation 3032/95, set out the arrangements applicable. These countries are also beneficiaries of the EU's agricultural generalised system of preference scheme, which grants preferential access to developing countries for many agricultural products. These trading arrangements are non-reciprocal. Duties on imports from FRY are levied at the most favoured nation rate. As FRY does not have preferential trading arrangements, EUR1 certificates are not applicable.

British Energy (Research Paper)

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will place in the Library a copy of the BZW research paper, "The Cash Generator". [30454]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 22 May 1996]: The BZW research paper on British Energy, "The Cash Generator" was produced by BZW Research, an affiliate of Barclays de Zoete Wedd Securities Ltd., as part of its internal research activity and was not produced on behalf of the Government. The Financial Services Act 1986 restricts the widespread distribution of this type of analysts' research. It is available to clients of BZW Research and other persons falling within FSA exemptions. Consequently, it is for BZW and its legal advisers to determine whether it would be appropriate for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Procedure Committee

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Lord President of the Council what plans he has to bring forward proposals to implement the recommendations of the first report of the Procedure Committee of Session 1995–96, HC 386, regarding the taking of the oath and other related matters after an election; and if he will make a statement. [30983]

Mr. Newton: I am considering the Committee's report, to which I hope to respond shortly.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women, in her Department on 1 April. [30558]

Mr. Sproat: As at 1 April 1996 there were 181 men and 168 women employed by the Department of National Heritage. The following table lists the number of officials in the principal grades—grades 1 to 7—and the number of staff in administrative grades—SEO and below—showing the percentage of women in each case.

Grade	Total number of staff	Total number of women	Percentage of staff that are women
G3	4	1	25
G5	16	4	25
G6	8	2	25
G7	48	15	31
SEO[1]	26	11	42
HEO(D)	4	2	50
HEO[1]	69	29	42
EO[1]	61	32	52
AO[1]	81	49	60
AA[1]	31	23	74

[1] Includes equivalent grades.

Listed Buildings (Exports)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what estimate she has made of the number of listed (a) non-conformist chapels, (b) other ecclesiastical buildings and (c) other structures which have been taken down exported and re-built in (i) Japan and (ii) other countries, since 1986. [30686]

Mr. Sproat: This information is not available.

Chipperfield Report

Dr. John Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage which of the proposals made by the Chipperfield report on the Royal Fine Art Commission have been accepted; and when she intends to implement them. [31023]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Government's response has been placed in the Library with the Chipperfield report. Recommendations concerning the post of secretary have been implemented and the post of deputy secretary, finance, has been dropped as suggested in the report. My right. hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment expects to give advice to local planning authorities later in the year about consulting the RFAC on major developments. The standard term of appointment for commissioners has been reduced from seven years to five and new appointments made in 1994, 1995 and 1996 reflect the diversity recommended in the report. Various less specific recommendations have been taken into account in the working practices of the commission.

Millennium Commission

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment she has made of the representation of each part of the United Kingdom in the membership of the Millennium Commission. [31244]

Mr. Sproat: Members of the Millennium Commission are appointed by Her Majesty the Queen. They are not appointed to represent specific areas of the United Kingdom. The commissioners have a broad range of experience and travel widely before making any decisions concerning the allocation of national lottery funds.

Telifis na Gaeilge

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what measures are proposed in order that people in Northern Ireland will have access to Telifis na Gaeilge when it commences broadcasting; and if she will make a statement. [29974]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 21 May 1996]: Telifis na Gaelige will be received by many residents in Northern Ireland who are already able to receive Radio Telifis Eireann broadcasts.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30062]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The Department of National Heritage is responsible for very few regulations and does not have a stand-alone deregulation unit as such. Three civil servants in the strategy and systems division at grades 5 , 7 and EO deal with deregulation matters as part of their remit to cover inter-departmental issues. Members of other divisions with specific areas of responsibility, particularly tourism, also handle deregulation as it affects their areas, liaising with the central staff as necessary. Thus it is not possible to identify a budgetary allocation as being dedicated to this activity.

None of the staff in the central unit has private sector experience, or has been seconded from business.

PRIME MINISTER

Kyle of Lochalsh

9. Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to pay an official visit to the Kyle of Lochalsh. [29808]

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 4 June. [30041]

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 4 June. [30043]

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 4 June. [29801]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Bosnia

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if he will consult other Heads of Government about extending the implementation force involvement in former Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement. [31154]

The Prime Minister: Under the terms of the Bosnia peace agreement, and the United Nations Security Council resolution 1031, IFOR's mandate expires in December. We expect implementation force IFOR to have successfully completed its military mission by that time. When IFOR leaves, we expect the leaders elected in the forthcoming Bosnian elections to take on responsibility for Bosnia's future. We remain in constant contact with other Governments on this and other Bosnia-related subjects.

Hong Kong (Beef Ban)

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Prime Minister what consultations took place between Her Majesty's Government and the Governor of Hong Kong before the decision was taken by the Hong Kong authorities to ban the entry of British beef into the colony. [31118]

The Prime Minister: Hong Kong has autonomy in all trade matters. The Hong Kong Government's suspension of the import of British beef was imposed after the European Union's decision to prohibit the export of British beef. In announcing the suspension, the Hong Kong Government made clear that they had taken this decision to restore confidence in the beef market in Hong Kong, and that they did not consider it necessary to restrict the import of British beef on health grounds.

Conservative Party (Donations)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make representations to the chairman of the Conservative party about the conclusions of the Touche Ross report to the Conservative party of July 1993 in respect of donations to that party of fraudulently obtained money. [31262]

The Prime Minister: This does not fall within my responsibilities as Prime Minister.

Dr. Trifkovic and Mr. Zametica

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister what meetings his Ministers have had with (a) Dr. Svdja Trifkovic and (b) Jovan Zametica; and what was discussed. [31144]

The Prime Minister: None. Mr. Zametica was present when Rajko Kasagic, former Prime Minister of the Republika Srpska, called on my right hon. and learned Friend, the Foreign Secretary and my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development during a visit to London on 29 April.

Northern Ireland (Talks)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the advantages for the success of the all-party talks of Sinn Fein taking part in them. [31153]

The Prime Minister: The talks will hold out the best prospects for a settlement if they are as inclusive as possible, but only on condition that all those participating are committed to exclusively peaceful methods. We and the Irish Government have expressed the hope that all parties with an electoral mandate will take part in the talks, including Sinn Fein; but we have agreed that they must be limited to parties establishing their commitment to peaceful methods, and that participation by Sinn Fein requires unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire of August 1994.

Pay Review Bodies

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the names and occupations of the current members of and the terms of reference of (a) the Review Body on Senior Salaries, (b) the Review Body for Nursing Staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine, (c) the Review on Doctors' and Dentists' Remuneration, (d) the Review Body on Armed Forces Pay and (e) the School Teachers' Review Body. [30316]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 21 May 1996]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) on 15 May, Official Report, column 457, and to the terms of reference contained in the 1996 reports of the review bodies, copies of which are available in the Library of the House. Personal details such as occupations, when published, may be obtained from the standard works of reference.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Crown Court Trials

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many Crown court trials there were in the west midlands in each year since 1990. [30652]

Mr. Streeter: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 4 June 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about the number of Crown Court trials held in the West Midlands since 1990.

The figures are as follows:

Year	Birmingham	Coventry	Wolverhampton
1990	569	142	309
1991	618	100	336
1992	509	137	333
1993	534	174	279
1994	495	246	327
1995	600	149	407

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the average cost of a Crown court trial in 1995. [30653]

Mr. Streeter: The Lord Chancellor's Department incurs three main costs during Crown court trials; staff and accommodation costs to the Court Service, judicial salaries and the cost to the legal aid fund. No average cost per trial is available as cost data for the Crown court are collected on the basis of the cost per day. For the year 1995–96 these amounted to approximately £5,245 per day. This figure does not cover the cost of any of the other agencies involved in the trial process.

Mortgage Possession Actions

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many mortgage possession actions were entered and orders made for the possession of property in each county court in England and Wales in each year since 1991. [30706]

Mr. Streeter: The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from M. D. Huebner to Mr. Gordon Prentice, dated May 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department has asked me to reply to your Question about mortgage possession actions and orders.

I enclose a table which details the number of mortgage possession actions entered and orders for possession made in each county court in England and Wales since 1991. As the table is too long to be printed in the Official Report, arrangements will be made for a copy to be deposited in the Library of the House.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total. [30764]

Mr. Streeter: For the Lord Chancellor's Department headquarters and associated offices, the Court Service and the Public Trust Office, the information is as follows.

	Number	Percentage
Able-bodied	9,796	82.82
Registered disabled	185	1.57
Self-classified disabled	227	1.92
Not known	1,620	13.69

Company Debts

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in how many cases legal aid has been allowed for company debts because these debts have subsequently been ascribed to an individual. [30809]

Mr. Streeter: Cases where legal aid is granted following an assignment from a company are not separately recorded. The Civil Legal Aid (General) (Amendment) (No. 2) Regulations 1996, which came into force on 1 June, permit an application to be refused where a cause of action is transferred to another party with a view to allowing the action to be commenced or continued with the benefit of a legal aid certificate.

Legal Aid

Mr. Bermingham: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what guidance he gives to the Legal Aid Board to help it to distinguish between genuine and bogus applicants; and what action is taken against those assessed to be abusing the legal aid system. [31025]

Mr. Streeter: Section 5(6) of the Legal Aid Act 1988 precludes the Lord Chancellor from giving guidance to the Legal Aid Board in relation to the consideration or disposal of applications for legal aid in particular cases. Applicants suspected of intentionally failing to comply with the regulations or of knowingly making any false statement or false representation are liable to prosecution under section 39 of the Legal Aid Act 1988.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Benefit

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the current number of children aged over 16 and under 19 years for whom child benefit (a) is and (b) is not payable who are taking (i) non-advanced courses and (ii) advanced courses, broken down as far as possible by the type of course. [30241]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The information is not available in the format requested.

Data are not available on the nature of the education being undertaken by children for whom child benefit is in payment. However, child benefit is payable beyond age 16 only where the child is undergoing full-time non-advanced education. Benefit is not payable for children undergoing advanced education, defined as courses above A-level or equivalent.

Compensation Recovery Unit

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the annual administrative cost of the compensation recovery unit in each year since it was established. [30390]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 22 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question, asking what was the administrative cost of the Compensation Recovery Unit in each year since it was established.

The information is provided in the table below.

Period	Operating costs (£ million)
1 August 1989–31 March 1990	0.13
1 April 1990–31 March 1991	1.7
1 April 1991–31 March 1992	1.9
1 April 1992–31 March 1993	2.1
1 April 1993–31 March 1994	2.7
1 April 1994–31 March 1995	2.8
1 April 1995–31 March 1996	3.1

Data are provisional and subject to amendment.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

University of Loughborough

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations his Department has (a) made to and (b) received from the university of Loughborough in the last year on matters relating to potential research into child support issues. [30684]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The centre for research in social policy at the university of Loughborough has been commissioned to evaluate a Benefits Agency/Employment Service scheme for lone parents which touches on child support matters.

CRSP was also invited to tender for research into the departures pilot scheme but was unsuccessful.

A possible survey of absent parents was under negotiation with CRSP, but further commissioning work has been postponed until after the departures scheme has been introduced and has had time to deal with a significant number of cases.

Motability Finance Ltd.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will maintain his policy that the banks currently involved in Motability Finance Ltd. are not granted sole lessor status. [29926]

Mr. Burt: The Department regards competition as a healthy measure in ensuring value for money. Competition must, however, bring long-term benefits to Motability's disabled customers.

End-of-year Returns

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, column 370–71, when he expects to publish the end-of-year returns for 1995–96. [30730]

Mr. Heald: Information will be available from May 1997.

Chronic Bronchitis and Emphysema

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to implement the recommendations contained in the report on the review of the prescription for chronic bronchitis and emphysema in underground coal workers, prescribed disease D12, by the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council. [31029]

Mrs Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to respond to the Industrial Injuries Advisory Council report, "Chronic Bronchitis and Emphysema," Cm. 3240. [31242]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Members to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) on 21 May, Official Report, column 185.

Goods and Services

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 27, on expenditure on goods and services, when the figures for 1995–96 will be available. [31237]

Mr. Burt: The figures for the Department's expenditure on goods and services in 1995–96 will be available in July 1996.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 28, how many (a) unconditional on-demand bonds, (b) performance bonds, (c) parent company guarantees, (d) advance payment bonds and (e) retention bonds were required by his Department in the last five years. [31232]

Mr. Burt: The information is not available.

Benefits Agency

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to ensure that the guidance sent to Benefits Agency staff members formerly published by HMSO will be available to organisations and members of the public. [31074]

Mr. Roger Evans: Guidance sent to Benefits Agency staff members formerly published by HMSO can still be obtained from that source.

Discussions are in progress between the Benefits Agency and HMSO to determine appropriate arrangements for the future.

Asylum Seekers

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people (a) had social security benefits withdrawn and (b) were ruled ineligible for such benefits due to the changes in social security regulations for asylum seekers, in March and April. [31182]

Mr. Roger Evans: Information is not available in the format requested. In March, the Benefits Agency was notified by the Home Office of 702 negative decisions on asylum status involving social security benefit claims. In April, 810 notifications were received.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his discussions with the Data Protection Registrar concerning registration of personal data held by the Security Service which are not subject to section 27 of the Data Protection Act 1984. [29699]

Mr. Howard: I have had no such discussions with the Data Protection Registrar. The Security Service has confirmed to the Data Protection Registrar, however, that exemption of personal data held by the service from the registration provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984 is required for the purpose of safeguarding national security as provided for by section 27 of the Act.

Electronic Tagging

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of people who were electronically tagged in England and Wales in 1995; and what was the total cost involved. [29998]

Mr. Sackville: Eighteen offenders were sentenced to electronically monitored curfew orders in 1995 as part of the trials being conducted in Manchester, Reading and Norfolk. A further 47 offenders have been similarly sentenced so far in 1996. As explained to the hon. Member on 26 October 1995, Official Report, column 761, the total cost of the first nine months of the trials to April 1996, including non-recurring start-up costs such as research and development, training, capital and equipment, was £1.6 million. The results of the trials are being evaluated by the Home Office research and statistics directorate.

Maidstone Prison

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many parole applications were turned down on the basis that rehabilitation courses had not been completed at Her Majesty's prison Maidstone per month since April 1993. [30211]

Miss Widdecombe: This information is not available.

Juvenile Offenders

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many secure centres for juvenile offenders have been built since 1986; and if he will list their locations in England and Wales. [30203]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 4 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about secure centres for juveniles which have been built since 1986.

Four local authority secure units have been built since 1986. They are Sutton Place Safe Centre in Hull; St. John's Community Home School, Erdington, Birmingham; St. John's Centre, Tiffield, Northampton; and Vinney Green Secure Unit, Mangotsfield, Bristol.

Temporary Releases

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many temporary release failures there have been in each month since 1 December 1995. [30680]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 4 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about how many temporary release failures there have been in each month since 1 December 1995.

The requested information is as follows:

December 1995: 48

January 1996: 45

February 1996: 43

March 1996: 40

April 1996: 29

To 18 May 1996: 17

Prison Population

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the number of prisoners likely to be held in United Kingdom prisons in October. [30473]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Barry Sheerman, dated 4 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question asking what is his estimate of the number of prisoners likely to be held in United Kingdom prisons in October.

The latest projection produced in April is that the prison population in England and Wales could be around 56,700 on 31 October 1996. The population was projected from current trends but past experience has shown the likelihood of departures from the trend. Information for Scotland and Northern Ireland is available from the Secretaries of State for those Departments.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of people seeking political asylum and being held in custody as of 14 May, the length of time each person has been held in detention and their nationality. [30512]

Mr. Kirkhope: The available information is for those held in detention as at 30 April and is given in the tables.

Table 1: Number of people recorded as detained on 30 April 1996[1] who had sought asylum at some stage, by length of detention

Length	Total number detained

[1] These figures include people who have been in detention for less than a month. Because of the delay in recording receptions into, and releases from, detention and the large number of persons detained for a short period, the figures should be used with caution.

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the protest by asylum seekers in Rochester prison on 17 May. [31197]

Miss Widdecombe: At approximately 20:30 hours on 16 May, 69 overseas nationals detained at Rochester refused to return to their cells at the end of the normal association period. The reason for the protest is not known at this time and is currently subject to an internal Prison Service investigation. However, it is thought that it may be linked to possible reductions in association time.

The protest was passive, but the detainees refused to participate in negotiations with staff. At 01:00 hours on 17 May, a direct order was given to the detainees to return to their cells, but they refused to comply. Prison Service control and restraint teams were deployed to clear the wing. Some detainees offered passive resistance by rolling themselves into a ball. The wing was cleared by 01:30 hours with no serious injuries to staff or detainees.

Following clearance of the wing, 10 detainees barricaded themselves into a cell, but this was quickly overcome with no resistance.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30545]

Mr. Howard: Figures for the number of male and female permanent non-industrial staff and the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and percentages of women employed at those grades in the main Home Office on 1 April were as follows. A breakdown by administrative grades is not available for that date; figures shown refer to the staffing position on 24 May. Figures for the Prison Service are as from 1 April.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary for the Home Department (1) how many people were detained in Birmingham prison, under Immigration Act powers in (a) March and (b) April; and what were the nationalities of those detained; [31183]

(2) how many of those people detained in Birmingham prison under Immigration Act powers were deported during the months of March and April. [31184]

Miss Widdecombe: At the end of March, 63 prisoners in Birmingham prison were recorded as being held under Immigration Act powers. At the end of April, 48 prisoners were held; a breakdown by nationality is given in the table. Provisional information shows that 37 persons were discharged and deported from Birmingham prison during March and April.

Prison Building Programme

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons are currently being built in England and Wales; and where each prison will be sited. [30533]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A.J. Pearson to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 4 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the number of new prisons being built in England and Wales and where each will be sited.

The Home Secretary announced in September 1993 that six new prisons would be built, using private sector finance. Lowdham Grange was added to the programme in March 1996.

The first three privately-funded prisons will open in 1997–98 at Bridgend in south Wales; Fazakerley in Merseyside; and Lowdham Grange in Nottinghamshire. Planning permission for further prisons is currently being pursued in Manchester.

Criminal Cases Review Commission

Mr. Boateng: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will announce the date for which the Criminal Cases Review Commission will receive applications. [30586]

Mr. Kirkhope: Members are currently being recruited for the commission and we expect them to be appointed during September. The commission will begin taking cases after a short transition period; the precise date will be announced nearer the time.

Metropolitan Police (Civil Damages Awards)

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many civil damages awards have been made against, and what was the total cost of such awards to, the Metropolitan police in each of the past five years; and if he will list the details by police division. [30672]

Mr. Maclean: Information on court awards is not held on a divisional basis. The following is the other information requested:

Court awards

Year	Number	Total cost £000s
1991	9	21
1992	11	203
1993	6	53
1994	11	84

Private Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the privately run prisons in England and Wales. [30536]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 4 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about privately-run prisons in England and Wales.

There are at present four contractually-managed prisons. They are: the Wolds prison, which is managed by Group 4; Blakenhurst prison, which is managed by United Kingdom Detention Services; Doncaster prison, which is managed by Premier Prison Services; and Buckley Hall prison which is managed by Group 4.

Ex-prisoners (Rehabilitation)

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what services he operates to enable prisoners, when released, to be rehabilitated into society, with special reference to arrangements for both long-term and short-term prisoners to find accommodation once their prison sentence has ended. [30663]

Mr. Sackville: Depending on their circumstances, accommodation is available to ex-prisoners in approved probation/bail hostels or in housing supported by area probation services. There are 2,349 places in approved probation/bail hostels and over 5,500 housing places supported by probation services.

The general arrangements for the post-release supervision of offenders are set out in chapter 7 of "National Standards for the Supervision of Offenders in the Community 1995" and the "National Framework for the Throughcare of Offenders in Custody to the Completion of Supervision in the Community", copies of which are in the Library.

Prison Education

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of prisoners received education and for how much time each week in (a) 1979 and (b) 1995 in (i) Wales and (ii) the regions of England. [30708]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Tilt to Mr. Win Griffiths, dated 4 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the percentage of prisoners who received education and for how much time each week in (a) 1979 and (b) 1995 in (i) Wales and (ii) the regions of England.

This information is not available in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Prisoners receiving education and training may attend for only a short time, it is therefore difficult to provide information on numbers of students and easier to provide information on student hours.

In 1979, when the average daily prison population was 42,220, 4.6 million student hours were spent on education and training classes by inmates. In 1995, when the average daily population (excluding those held in police cells) was 50,962, 9.4 million student hours were spent on education and training classes.
All prisoners are appraised for education and their attendance is decided as part of local sentence planning. The governor will then order the appropriate amount of education to cover the planned needs of the population within the constraints of his budget.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures. [30767]

Mr. Howard: The total number of registered disabled staff in the Home Office and its agencies, and the percentage this represents of the total number of staff, are as shown. Figures refer to the staffing position on 23 May.

Number of registered disabled staff: 229

Percentage of registered disabled staff: 0.4

The nature of many of the posts within the Prison Service limits the scope for employing people with disabilities. Excluding Prison Service staff, the total number of registered disabled staff in the Home Office and its agencies, and the percentage this represented of the total number of staff on 23 May were as follows:

Number of registered disabled staff: 174

Percentage of registered disabled staff: 1.5

Note: The total number of staff in the Home Office and its agencies, including the Prison Service, was 51,782 on 23 May. Excluding the Prison Service the total was 11,322.

Homeless People (Electoral Registration)

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue new guidelines to electoral registration officers as to the inclusion of homeless people on the electoral register following the decision in the case of Kevin Lippiatt v. the Electoral Registration Officer, Penrith district council. [31212]

Mr. Sackville: We aim to issue guidance in time for this year's electoral registration canvass.

Prison Service (Private Sector Involvement)

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to encourage greater private sector involvement in the Prison Service. [31062]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 4 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about private sector involvement in the Prison Service.

Over the past five years the Prison Service has successfully involved the private sector in initiatives to improve the services it provides and to achieve greater value for money. Currently, four prisons (Wolds, Blakenhurst, Doncaster and Buckley Hall) are managed by the private sector, and seven out of the eight prison escort areas have now been contracted-out. There has been substantial private-sector involvement to provide purposeful work and training for prisoners. Functions such as prison education have been contracted-out where it has been determined that this leads to greater efficiency and economy.

The Home Secretary announced in September 1993 that six new prisons would be built, using private sector finance, and Lowdham Grange was added to the programme in March 1995. The first three privately-funded prisons will open in 1997–8 at Bridgend in south Wales, Fazakerley in Merseyside, and Lowdham Grange in Nottinghamshire. Planning permission for further prisons is currently being sought in Manchester and Telford.

Prison Sanitation

Ms Janet Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of prisoners had 24 hour access to sanitation on (a) 12 April, (b) 12 May and (c) currently. [31064]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Ms Janet Anderson, dated 4 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the percentage of prisoners who had 24 hour access to sanitation on (a) 12 April, (b) 12 May and (c) currently.

The Prison Service achieved its performance target of ensuring that all prisoners had access to sanitation at all times on 12 April 1996 and full access has been maintained since then. This has been achieved despite a record rise in the prison population and despite the Service's need to reduce costs.

Deportations

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of people deported under Immigration Act powers from the United Kingdom for March and April. [31185]

Mr. Kirkhope: The number of persons removed under the deportation process, including voluntary departures after deportation action had been initiated, was 146 in March 1996. In addition, 231 illegal entrants were removed or departed voluntarily. Complete data for April are not yet available.

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many dogs have been destroyed as a result of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991; [31078]

(2) how many dogs are currently in police kennels awaiting the implementation of destruction orders; what is the average period of detention; and what is the longest current period of detention for a dog. [31077]

Mr. Sackville: Some 770 destruction orders were made between 1992 and 1994, although some of these orders will have been the subject of appeals. Figures for 1995 are likely to be available in the autumn.

There are currently 13 dogs held in police kennels in England and Wales awaiting the implementation of a destruction order under the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991. The average period of detention for these dogs is two years and four months, and the longest period of detention for a dog is currently four years and five months.

Mr. Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received in respect of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991; and what proposals he has to amend the legislation. [31076]

Mr. Sackville: The Department has received representations from various individuals and organisations which also submitted views to the recent House of Lords Select Committee on the Dangerous Dogs (Amendment) Bill [Lords]. Details are contained in its report, published on 26 February, HL paper No.48. The Government were unable to accept the recommendation contained in the report that the Act should be amended.

Representations have also been made to the Home Affairs Committee which is currently inquiring into the operation of the Act. While the Government will, of course, consider carefully any recommendations which the Committee may make, there are currently no plans to amend the Act.

Wild Animals and Birds

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what support he gives to organisations which provide sanctuary, treatment and rehabilitation in the wild for wild animals and birds; and if he will make a statement. [30793]

Mr. Sackville: I am not aware of any grant aid to any such organisations in recent years.

Tinsley House Immigration Detention Centre

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what has been the capital cost of Tinsley house immigration detention centre; and what are the terms of repayment under the private finance initiative; [31210]

(2) what are the terms of the contract concluded by Wackenhut for the operation of Tinsley house immigration detention centre. [31213]

Mr. Kirkhope: Tinsley house was not fully funded through the private finance initiative; the cost of the building works was borne by the private sector but the running of the facility is the subject of a separate contract. It would not be right to divulge the capital cost of the building, or the terms of the operating contract, as this information is commercially sensitive.

Mr. Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the annual savings from the operation of the contract by Wackenhut at Tinsley house immigration detention centre. [31211]

Mr. Kirkhope: Tinsley house is a new facility providing 150 additional detention places. The extra places will enable us to reduce the use of more expensive, less suitable, alternative accommodation and to effect the removal of more people with no entitlement to remain in this country. It is not possible to quantify the overall resultant savings to the public purse but I am satisfied that the contract with Wackenhut to run Tinsley house provides very good value for money.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Civil Service Trade Unions

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last met representatives of the civil service trade unions; and what subjects were discussed. [29928]

Mr. Freeman: I last met representatives of the civil service unions on 29 January where many issues relating to the civil service were discussed.

Council of Europe (Meetings)

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995 have been attended by Ministers or officials of the Office of Public Service; and if he will make a statement. [29366]

Mr. Freeman: There have been 212 meetings of or organised by the Council of Europe since January 1995 attended by members of staff of the United Kingdom delegation to the Council of Europe in Strasbourg. No Ministers or officials in the Office of Public Service have attended these meetings.

Government Car Service

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) if he will list the make, age and purchase price of each vehicle in the Government car service ministerial fleet; [30387]

(2) what was the total cost of maintaining and operating the Government car service ministerial fleet, for the years 1992–93 to 1995–96. [30386]

Mr. Freeman: As these are purely operational matters I have asked the chief executive of the Security Facilities Executive to write directly to the hon. Member.

Letter from J. C. King to Ms Glenda Jackson, dated 30 May 1996:

I have been asked by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to reply direct to your two Parliamentary Questions relating to the Government Car Service (GCS). As Chief Executive of the Security Facilities Executive Agency, I have operational responsibility for the GCS.

The Government Car Service currently purchases motor vehicles from the Ford, Jaguar, Rover and Vauxhall motor companies. I regret that, for security and commercial reasons, details of individual vehicles cannot be made public.

The estimated costs of maintaining and operating the Government Car Service for the years 1992–93 to 1995–96 are as follows:

1992/93: £7.0 million

1993/94: £7.3 million

1994/95: £7.6 million

1995/96: £7.4 million

These costs cover the whole of the Government Car Service, including the Ministerial vehicles.

Civil Service College (Devolution Course)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will place in the Library a copy of the now withdrawn Civil Service College leaflet advertising courses on devolution this summer; and if he will make a statement. [30693]

Mr. Freeman: The promotion and scheduling of courses and seminars at the Civil Service College is an operational matter. I have asked the chief executive of the Civil Service College to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from S. H. F. Hickey to Mr. Rhodri Morgan, dated 28 May 1996:

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has asked me to reply to your Question on the Civil Service College's proposed seminar on devolution.

I am arranging for a copy of the full information pack on College seminars and programmes for the Senior Civil Service to be made available for the Library. It includes a proposed single half-day briefing seminar on the work of the non-party Constitution Unit. In order to avoid any risk of misinterpretation, this seminar has been postponed.

Her Majesty's Stationery Office

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) for what reasons HMSO has ceased publication of the social fund guide; [31061]

(2) if he will list the publications which HMSO has ceased to publish in the last year; for what reasons HMSO has ceased publishing these documents; and what steps will be taken to ensure that copies of these remain available to the public. [31060]

Mr. Freeman: As these questions concern purely operational matters, I have asked the chief executive of HMSO to write direct to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mike Lynn to Mr. Keith Bradley, dated 29 May 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your two Parliamentary Questions (numbers 183 and 185) to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

The Social Fund Guide is a loose-leaf publication in two volumes, which was last published in May 1995. Amendments are published from time to time, and there have been five so far for the current edition. Both the main volumes and the amendments are prepared and printed by Benefits Agency Publishing Ltd, who provide copies for internal use within the Benefits Agency, and sell copies to HMSO for resale to customers. Amendments numbers 4 and 5 were printed some months ago, but there was a delay in taking copies for resale because of on-going discussions about alternative publishing methods, such as on-demand printing. I have now asked my people to take these amendments into stock immediately so that continuity of service can be provided to purchasers.

You also ask what publications HMSO has ceased to publish in the last year. The Government departments who commission the vast majority of our non-parliamentary publishing output are free to use other publishers (or to publish in-house) if they choose. The only regular publication that we are aware of ceasing to publish during the last year is The Commonwealth Yearbook, which is now published by Hanson Cooke.

Performance Bands

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official

Report, column 16, how many (a) unconditional on-demand bonds, (b) performance bonds, (c) parent company guarantees, (d) advance payment bonds and (e) retention bonds were required by his Department in the last five years. [31233]

Mr. Willetts: The Office of Public Service and its agencies, HMSO and the Central Office of Information have obtained six performance bonds and six parent company guarantees in the last five years. No unconditional on-demand bonds, advance payment bonds and retention bonds were required by the Department in the last five years.

China

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what discussions he had on human rights issues with those Chinese leaders whom he met during his recent visit to China; which political opponents of the Government he met; and if he will make a statement. [31156]

The Deputy Prime Minister: The two main objectives for my visit to China were to develop commercial opportunities for British business in China and to take forward co-operation over Hong Kong. During my visit, I focused on these two objectives, which were achieved. I did not raise human rights issues. The Chinese are in no doubt about our long-held and serious concerns in that area.

Hong Kong

Mr. Byers: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to meet (a) Mr. Li Ka Shing, (b) Mr. David Choy, (c) Mr. Rong Yiren, (d) Mr. Stanley Ho, (e) Mr. T. T. Tsui and (f) Mr. C. H. Tung during his forthcoming visit to Hong Kong. [30598]

The Deputy Prime Minister: During my visit to Hong Kong on 24 to 25 May, I met a broad range of businessmen, politicians and general opinion-formers.

DEFENCE

Service Personnel, Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the payment per week currently made to the three British service personnel who have been convicted and sentenced for the manslaughter of a Danish tour guide in Cyprus. [30199]

Mr. Soames: No payments have been made by my Department to the three men since they were discharged from the Army on 22 April. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has now assumed welfare responsibility for these individuals.

Wessex Helicopter (Royal Family)

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the replacement of the Wessex helicopter used by the royal family. [30242]

Mr. Arbuthnot : The Wessex HCC4s used to provide the VVIP helicopter service for the royal family and senior Government Ministers have been in service since 1969 and are becoming more difficult and costly to maintain. We are examining options for a replacement service but no decisions have yet been taken.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30552]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The number and percentages of male and female staff employed by the Ministry of Defence and its agencies are detailed in the following table.

British Forces Overseas

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the countries in which British military forces are based; and what is the number of service personnel at each such base. [30513]

Mr. Soames: The deployment of United Kingdom forces at April 1996 is shown in figure 3 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1996", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

The number of UK service personnel at permanent overseas stations is as follows:

	Number
Ascension Islands	156
Brunei	948
Cyprus	3,874
Diego Garcia	40
Falkland Islands[1]
Germany	23,500
Gibraltar	587
Hong Kong	1,920

[1] It is not our practice to publish the size of the Falklands garrison.

In addition some 10,500 service personnel are serving in the former Yugoslavia.

Defence Sales Office

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the net Government funding given to the Defence sales office for each of the last five years. [30591]

Mr. Arbuthnot: The net cost of the Defence Export Services Organisation for the last five years was as follows:

1991–92: £11.05 million
1992–93: £11.89 million
1993–94: £16.02 million
1994–95: £10.94 million
1995–96: £17.08 million

Army Technical Support Agency

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the planned collocation of the Army Technical Support Agency. [31476]

Mr. Soames: I am very grateful to those hon. Members, local authorities, other organisations and individuals who have responded to the consultative document issued on 8 December 1995.

Our objective remains to bring together more of the staff of the agency, currently dispersed over six principal sites. This will enable them to make better use of new logistic systems and processes in support of customers in the Army and the other two services.

Our analysis of the options for the site of a collocated ATSA takes into account a number of considerations. The site must provide best value for money in terms of the balance between transition costs and longer-terms savings; it must provide good business benefits, including ease of communication with ATSA's principal customers, located at Andover; it must be a reasonable location for the staff of the agency, taking into account the fact that a large number will have to relocate whatever the choice of site; and it must also take account of regional and other economic factors.

These complex and potentially conflicting issues have been fully reflected in the responses to the consultative document. The additional information which has been provided has been taken into account in an independent analysis of the investment appraisal by my Department's senior economic adviser. Reassessment of some of the factors has shown that formal consideration needs to be given to Andover and Ludgershall as potential sites for ATSA. In addition, it now appears that there would be room for ATSA at Chilwell even when taking account of the requirements of the engineer resources organisation which is planned to move from Long Marston by 1998. This is a material change from the circumstances set out in the consultative document.

As a result, I have concluded that more work is required to take account of the points that have emerged during consultation and to consider formally Andover, Ludgershall and Chilwell. Although I am anxious to resolve the uncertainty felt by ATSA staff at all the current locations, our priority is to reach a conclusion in the best long-term interests of the agency, its customers and its staff. The results of this work will be subject to a further consultative process when it has been completed, and I hope to make a final decision of the location of a collocated ATSA by the end of the year.

Sandhurst Cadets

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the names of schools sponsoring cadets at Sandhurst, indicating the figures for each regiment. [30988]

Mr. Soames: This is a matter for the chief executive of the Army Individual Training Organisation. I have asked the chief executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Chris Elliott to Mr. Paul Murphy, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about schools sponsoring cadets at the Royal Military Academy, Sandhurst as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Army Individual Training Organisation.

Cadets at the Royal Military Academy, Sandhurst are not sponsored by their schools.

A small proportion of the Cadets have come direct from school through the Entry Selection Process. However, the vast majority pass through university before going to Sandhurst.

Please let me know if I can be of any further assistance.

Sea King Helicopters

Mr Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 54, if he will list the number of Sea King helicopters currently in service with the Royal Navy and the Royal Air Force by year of entry into service; how many Sea Kings have suffered cracks in the lift frame, by year of entry into service; how many have suffered cracking to the lift frame more than once; and if he will make a statement. [30812]

Mr. Soames: The information requested is provided in the table:

		RN	RAF	Total[1]
1969	8	—	8	1
1970	15	—	16	3

[1] Includes aircraft no longer in service.

Although the problem of lift frame cracking has a transitory effect on aircraft availability, the repair load is manageable, and there is no question of its affecting the ability of the Sea King to continue in service until its planned out-of-service date. Furthermore, the aircraft design is tolerant of failures and this, combined with rigorous periodic in-service inspections, maintains the good airworthiness record of the Sea King structure. No aircraft accidents have been caused by Sea King lift frame or associated component failure.

Market Testing

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy concerning market testing. [30822]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave him on 6 February, Official Report, column 120. The policy has not changed.

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the projected annual savings as a result of the market testing of health provision for British forces services; and if he will make a statement. [30985]

Mr. Soames: Market testing of health provision for British forces in Germany is expected to realise annual savings of £2 million in financial year 1998–99, £3.4 million in 1999–2000, and £4 million in 2000–01. Initial set-up costs, and some dual running to facilitate a seamless transition to the new service will result in increased costs of £2.3 million in 1996–97 and £2.9 million in 1997–98. Therefore, over the five-year period of the service level agreement with "The Health Alliance", net savings of some £4.2 million are expected to accrue to the Defence budget.

These changes have been achieved with no detriment to the overall level of service which is provided to our forces and their families. Indeed, in many aspects an improved level of service has already been achieved.

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) all of his Department's activities which have been contractorised or market tested, (b) the date of contractorisation and market testing and (c) the overall costs. [30986]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I am writing to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Environmental Assessments

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what Environmental assessment his Department carries out of RAF stations or bases before they are sold or disposed of; when such assessments started; which officials within his Department carry out such assessments; if such assessments measure nuclear contamination; and to whom the results of such assessments are made available. [31266]

Mr. Soames: My Department is introducing a procedure for land quality assessment, the outcome of which is a land quality statement, which is to be applied to all sites earmarked for disposal. A prioritised programme is also being drawn up for other sites on the defence estate where such work is considered appropriate. Although the procedure has only recently been formally introduced, investigation of land quality using the present methodology commenced in 1993.

Within the RAF, the majority of such assessments are undertaken by independent specialist consultants which are managed by the defence estate organisation. Specialist in-house resources such as the RAF's explosive ordnance disposal team and the defence radiological protection service are employed where a civilian contractor might not have the relevant expertise. Reports of their findings are made available to the specialist consultant appointed to carry out the land quality assessment work.

The land quality assessment procedure is intended to cover all categories of contaminants, and where appropriate will include recommendations for and implementation of remedial action. The resulting land quality statement is made available, amongst others, to prospective purchasers. My Department complies fully with the requirements of the Environmental Information Regulations, 1992.

HMS Sheffield

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the implication for the environment of the Falkland islands of the grave of HMS Sheffield. [29925]

Mr. Soames: HMS Sheffield sank in deep water, some 350 miles to the east of the Falkland islands. We are confident that there is no risk to the environment of the Falklands.

Buses and Coaches

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what percentage of buses and coaches owned by, or used by, the services are now fitted with engine governors, restricting their top speed to 65 mph. [30665]

Mr. Soames: The joint service fleet of buses and coaches currently consists of 929 vehicles of mixed types, all of which have speed limiters fitted. Approximately 41 per cent. of the total fleet, which was acquired before 1988, has limiters set at 65mph. The remaining 59 per cent. is restricted to 60mph. Buses and coaches hired for service use have to comply with the speed limiter regulations in force in the country in which the vehicle is hired.

RAF Sealand

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reasons he has extended the deadline for bids under the market testing programme at RAF Sealand; and if he will make a statement. [30823]

Mr. Soames: The time taken to answer bidders' formal questions, to provide up to date detailed Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981—TUPE—data and to amend the invitation to tender have all contributed to the extension. In order to allow bidders sufficient time to respond to ITT changes, the tender submission date has been delayed from 8 May 1996 to 12 June 1996.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many uniformed personnel are currently stationed at RAF Sealand, Deeside. [30821]

Mr. Soames: On 23 May 1996 there were 338 uniformed personnel stationed at RAF Sealand.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many civilians are employed at RAF Sealand. [30820]

Mr. Arbuthnot: On 1 April 1996 there were 1,305 MOD civilian staff employed at RAF Sealand.

Nimrod

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the current servicing contract for the RAF Nimrod fleet. [30963]

Mr. Soames: As a result of the "Competing for Quality" initiative a five-year contract was awarded to FR Aviation in March 1995. This contract provides those engineering services previously performed by the Nimrod major servicing unit at RAF Kinloss, including the maintenance of the Nimrod maritime and Nimrod reconnaissance fleets.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Nimrod aircraft are grounded and for what reasons; and if he will make a statement. [30825]

Mr. Soames: As at 20 May 1996 no Nimrod aircraft were grounded.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Nimrod aircraft are currently in service; what are their principal purposes; and if he will make a statement. [30824]

Mr. Soames: There are 27 Nimrod aircraft currently in service. In addition three aircraft are in long-term storage and a fourth aircraft is undergoing major repair. The principal purpose of the Nimrod MR2 is maritime patrol; and that of the Nimrod R1 reconnaissance.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Nimrod aircraft are serviced by companies engaged under market testing; and if he will make a statement. [30826]

Mr. Soames: As a result of the "Competing for Quality" initiative a contract was awarded to FR Aviation in March 1995 for the provision of engineering service including the maintenance of the 31 aircraft in the Nimrod fleet.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of individuals from ethnic minorities serving in each regiment and corps in the Army giving the figures for each rank. [30987]

Mr. Soames: This information is not currently available. However, in accordance with the joint action plan between the Army and the Commission for Racial Equality announced on 28 March 1996, the Army is currently undertaking a detailed survey of the ethnic composition of the Army. Classification will be in accordance with the CRE guidelines. It is intended that the results of this survey will be available by the end of the year and that the data will provide the means by which the Army will monitor the success of its equal opportunities policies. It should, at that time, be possible to derive figures about the distribution of ethnic minorities by both rank and capbadge through the Army.

Consultants

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the private consultants employed by his Department in each of the last five years; what projects they were involved with; and what was the total cost in each year. [31024]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Individual budget holders in my Department have delegated powers to employ external consultants as they think fit within the limit of their resources and consistent with all requirements for propriety and value for money. The information required has not been held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The hon. Member will however wish to note that my officials are currently collecting data from all areas of the Department to establish the total expenditure on external consultancy. The exercise covering financial year 1995–96 is nearing completion. Once the information is to hand I will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Army Commissions

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) state and (b) private school applications were made for Army commissions in the last available year. [30984]

Mr. Soames: I will write to the hon. Member.

Retained Files

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) for what reasons files with the classmark ES1/542-547 recorded at the Public Record Office concerning nuclear weapon hazards from an aircraft crash between 1951 and 1959 are currently retained by his Department; and if he will consider opening them under the open government initiative; [31264]

(2) for what reasons the file with the classmark ES1/548 recorded at the Public Record Office concerning the appointment of a weapon accident investigation team between 1958 and 1964 is currently retained by his Department; and if he will consider opening it under the open government initiative. [31265]

Mr. Soames: Arrangements are being made to review ES1/542-547 and ES1/548 to establish whether release into the public domain is now possible. I will write to the hon. Member on completion of the review process.

Married Quarters Estate

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if the basis for the sale of the married quarters estate is monthly based rent with five-yearly reviews; [31292]

(2) if bids based on index-linked rents are being considered for the sale of the married quarters estate. [31274]

Mr. Arbuthnot: We set out in the preliminary information memorandum, a copy of which is in the Library of the House, proposals for setting the rent MOD will pay for those married quarters it leases from the purchaser of the married quarters estate. The final arrangements will be settled in discussion with potential purchasers of the estate. The proposed sale of the estate will have no impact upon the arrangements whereby the charges which service personnel pay for their accommodation are independently recommended by the Armed Forces Pay Review Body.

Nuclear Accident Response Organisation

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the duties of the Nuclear Accident Response Organisation; when this organisation was established; how many are employed within the organisation; and how many civilians are employed by the organisation. [31268]

Mr. Soames: The aim of the Nuclear Accident Response Organisation is to ensure that in conjunction with the appropriate civil agencies, there would be an effective response to safeguard the general public and MOD personnel in the unlikely event of an emergency involving defence nuclear materials.

The eight full-time staff in MOD headquarters, five of whom are civilians, give policy direction for the development and exercising of appropriate plans and procedures, but overall the NARO could draw on the skills of many hundreds of personnel across the armed forces and the MOD. Their precise number and specialisation would be dependent on the particular circumstances of an accident but it might include medical experts, health physicists, technical/design specialists, radiation monitoring experts, engineering teams, and associated logistic and other support staff. Contingency arrangements to deal with a range of accidents have existed for as long as the MOD has used nuclear material.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the procedures for informing foreign Governments if an accident involving British-controlled nuclear weapons had occurred on their soil or within their borders; when these procedures were adopted; and under what circumstances foreign Governments have had to be warned of such accidents. [31263]

Mr. Soames: In ratifying the International Atomic Energy Agency convention of 26 September 1986 on early notification of a nuclear accident, the United Kingdom Government undertook to notify the IAEA and affected states in the event of an accident to military facilities or equipment which had or might have consequences that could be of radiological safety significance for another state. Separate bilateral arrangements have also been concluded as appropriate: the terms of these are classified. There has never been an accident involving a UK nuclear weapon which has required a foreign Government to be informed under these arrangements.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 52, how many (a) unconditional on-demand bonds, (b) performance bonds, (c) parent company guarantees, (d) advance payment bonds and (e) retention bonds were required by his Department in the last five years. [31228]

Mr. Arbuthnot: In line with central Treasury advice, this Department does not seek unconditional on-demand bonds. With regard to categories (b) to (e), our centrally held records show there to be almost 200 current guarantees and indemnities in place dated since 1 January 1991. Our records do not differentiate between the categories as requested. An indemnity or guarantee provided under category (c) could cover (b), (d) and/or (e). More specific information could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Military Training

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 27 March, Official Report, column 637, if he will make a statement on the (a) defence and (b) wider foreign policy aims underlying the decisions to provide military training assistance to (i) Indonesia, (ii) Guatemala and (iii) Sudan between 1 January 1991 and 31 December 1995; and what assistance is being provided to (i), (ii) and (iii) currently. [30319]

Mr. Soames [holding answer 22 May 1996]: The defence and wider foreign policy aims which underlie the provision of military training assistance include the promotion of peace and stability, the spread of democratic values and the strengthening of standards in the armed forces. Details of the assistance provided is confidential between Governments; however, no military training assistance is currently being provided to Sudan.

Defence Radiological Protection Service

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the duties of the defence radiological protection service; how many people are employed in the service; when the service was set up; and if the service publishes an annual report. [31267]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Simon Hughes, dated 4 June 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question about the Defence Radiological Protection Service (DRPS) which is now part of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency.

DRPS employs 75 people and provides the Ministry of Defence with technical and advisory services on all aspects of ionising and non-ionising radiation protection. DRPS also provides advice on the transport and disposal of radioactive material, carries out environmental monitoring surveys and advises on the remediation of land or buildings contaminated with radioactive substances.

DRPS was formed in 1982 from the Naval Radiological Protection Service which had been set up in 1965. It remained part of the Royal Naval Medical Service until 1 April 1996 when it became part of DERA.

DRPS has published its own Annual Report since its formation and will produce its last independent report later this summer for the financial year 1995/96. In the future information on DRPS will be included in the DERA Annual Report.

I hope this is helpful.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for each of his Department's agencies what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30115]

Mr. Arbuthnot: These matters fall to the chief executives of my Department's agencies and I have asked the chief executives to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from J. R. Drew to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing in Defence Agencies. As Chief Executive of one such agency (the Army Base Repair Organisation (ABRO), I am replying with respect to the market testing we have been conducting.

Since the launch of ABRO on 1 April 1993 the Agency has completed one market test. This competition covered the complete range of services provided by one its major business units—ABRO Bovington (covering re-manufacture of armoured fighting vehicles, including the Challenger Main Battle Tank, and also equipment repair support to the Royal Armoured Corps Centre and other local affiliated military units). The market test was won by the in-house team and a Service Level Agreement has been in place since July 1994.

The Agency is currently engaged on the market test of the equipment repair support service that it provides to Army Land Command. Recommendations on the results of this competition are due to be made to Ministers by 31 January 1997. ABRO will then have market tested activities amounting to 65% of its running costs.

The final phase of the Agency's current Competing for Quality programme will be to evaluate and implement the strategy for ABRO Donnington. This can only begin once we have the full set of experiences from the market test currently in train. I have enclosed a copy of our Corporate Plan which will give you a fuller picture of our activities.

Letter from K. J. W. Goad to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I reply to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence regarding Market Testing activity by this Agency.

As Chief Executive I submit a nil return on behalf of the Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency (ABSDA).

Letter from C. L. Elliott to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing in Agencies as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Army Individual Training Organisation (AITO).

No market tests have been completed to date. However, the AITO is in the early stages of carrying out market testing at 6 of our training establishments.

The outcome of this programme of tests will not be known for at least 18 months, and therefore I am unable to report any results at this stage.

Please let me know if I can be of any further assistance.

Letter from J. R. Prince to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing into services provided by this agency, as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Army Technical Support Agency (ATSA).

ATSA launched in October 1995 and, to date, no market testing has been carried out.

Letter from A. H. Roache to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

As Chief Executive of the Defence Animal Centre (DAC) I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence regarding what Market Testing has been carried out into the services provided by the DAC, and what were the results.

An independent study into Competing for Quality by Shreeveport Limited concluded that Market Testing was not viable for the DAC and therefore the matter was taken no further.

Letter from Paul Altobell to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Defence Analytical Services Agency (DASA).

A market testing review of the Agency was carried out shortly after its launch in July 1992. The study team concluded that the Agency as a whole should remain in the public sector. A reappraisal in February 1995 also considered that the bulk of the work of the Agency should be retained in-house though there was some opportunity for contracting out.

Competing for Quality figures for the period between April 1995 and March 1996 are being compiled for the Agency's Efficiency Plan. It is anticipated that this information will be published in the 1996 Next Steps Review.

Letter from T. R. Thurgate to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing of the Defence Bills Agency as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive.

There are no plans to market test the work of the DBA. The task of the DBA was formerly carried out by the now disbanded Defence Accounts Agency. Under market testing rules, an in-house bid which represented substantial savings was submitted. Ministers accepted the bid and the DBA was formed.

Letter from R. N. Dixon to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing in the Defence Clothing and Textiles Agency (DCTA) as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Agency.

As part of the procedure which resulted in the formation of the DCTA on 22 November 1994, full consideration was given to the "prior options". This included an exhaustive examination of whether the services of the Agency could be better provided through contractorisation or privatisation, in whole or in part. The conclusion then was that they could not. There has been no market testing of the services provided by the Agency in the period since it formation.

It should be noted, however, that a very substantial proportion of DCTA expenditure is already being placed externally through the normal competitive process. Cash expenditure by DCTA in 1995/96 totalled £137M of which £124M (90%) represented money spent on the purchase of clothing, textiles and general stores, as well as externally-sourced R&D effort and support services. Contracts for these goods and services were placed in full compliance with government requirements for open competition between suppliers.

Letter from C. Roberts to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

Your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about Market Testing falls within the responsibilities of the Chief Executive of the Defence Dental Agency. I am responding on the Chief Executive's behalf during his absence on duty.

The Defence Dental Agency was formed on 1 March 1996. This was in line with the recommendation of Defence Cost Study 15 that the three single Service dental branches should be brought together into a single tri-Service Directorate and considered for Agency status. Prior to the launch of the Agency a Competing for Quality feasibility study was completed by outside consultants. The Study concluded that neither market testing, privatisation nor contractorization of Defence primary dental services were feasible options, but made a number of recommendations on efficiency which are now being implemented.

I hope that this is of help.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

Your recent question to Secretary of State for Defence asked for details on market testing carried out in his Department's agencies. I am replying on behalf of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA).

I should begin by explaining that DERA was only formed on 1 April 1995 when the Defence Research Agency (DRA) joined with other Ministry of Defence research and evaluation organisations to form a single science and technology Agency. The figures for Market Testing initiatives, which I set out below, however refer mainly to the period from April 1991 when the DRA was a separate Agency. They are:

Area	Financial year	Value of service reviewed (£ million)	Outcomes
a. DRA Experimental Flying	1992–93	26.2	Contract award to in-house MOD team based at Boscombe Down.
b. DRA Site Services	1993–94 1994–95	45.0 90.0	Market Test suspended in May 1994 when competition at early sites in programme revealed that equivalent savings could be obtained organisationally by restructuring requirements.

Area	Financial year	Value of service reviewed (£ million)	Outcomes
c. DRA Engineering Services	1994–95	47.0	Market Test suspended. Savings achieved by combination of prior options review of requirement and rationalisation.
d. DRA Financial Accounting	1994–95	3.1	Award made to in-house team after competition.
e. IS Data Telecoms	1994–95	1.0	Overtaken by rationalisation measures.

Market Testing is only one part of a wider Competing for Quality Programme pursued by this Agency. For the period between April 1995 and March 1996 this programme has been incorporated into the DERA's Corporate Planning process. This has resulted in the proposal, currently under consideration, for the privatisation of the support services elements of DERA as announced by the Minister of State for Defence Procurement on 27 March 1996. It is anticipated that information on this efficiency programme will be published in the 1996 Next Steps Review.

I hope this is helpful.

Letter from T. McG Brown to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Defence Postal and Courier Services Agency.

Three Agency functions have been market tested so far. The Mill Hill catering and stewardship functions where the contract was awarded to Gardner Merchant Ltd. The mall sorting functions at St Giles Court and Mill Hill together with the MOD Van Service were subsumed into our Mail 2000 Initiative, part of the Defence Cost Studies programme, and hence remained in house.

I hope this is helpful, please let me know if you require any further information.

Letter from J. C. R. Hunt to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing of services provided as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Meteorological Office.

Contractorisation of Meteorological Office work has historically run at a high level. The attached table gives the details, in terms of staff costs, of what further gains we have so far achieved as a consequence of the Government's market testing initiative.

Work continues to examine the scope for market testing in a number of other areas of the Office.

I hope you find this information useful.

Activity	Number of staff (before efficiencies)	Annual value (£000) (staff costs)	Efficiencies made (Percentage)

Letter from R. G. Smith to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing by Agencies as this matter, in respect of my Agency, falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Defence Secondary Care Agency (DSCA).

The DSCA was only launched on 30 April 1996; I have not yet implemented any market testing programmes. However, we are undertaking scoping work in order to identify areas suitable for market testing in the future. In this respect, I regard support services as being particularly suitable for this sort of exercise. I therefore intend, if the possibility exists, to subject all support services to some form of competition including market testing where appropriate.

I hope this information is helpful.

Letter from M. G. R. Hodson to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence, about market testing, as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Defence Transport and Movements Executive Agency.

The only market test taking place in this agency is that of the MOD Freight Distribution Service. The Feasibility Study commenced in October 1994 and, following Trades Unions consultation, an Invitation to Tender was issued on 26 January 1996 to 4 commercial tenderers and a tri-Service in-house bid team. Tenders were due in by 30 May 1996. Results are currently planned to be announced in November 1996. Once this particular market test is completed, over 90% of DTMX business will have been market tested.

Letter from Keith Ellender to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing in my agency as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Disposal Sales Agency.

No market testing was carried out within the Disposal Sales Agency between October 1994, when we achieved agency status, and March 1995.

CFQ figures for the period between April 1995 and March 1996 are being compiled for my agency's Efficiency Plan. It is anticipated that this information will be published in the 1996 Next Steps Review.

Letter from G. H. Wilson to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing as this matter falls within my area of responsibility of Chief Executive of the Duke of York's Royal Military School.

No market testing was carried out prior to March 1995 into the services we provide.

CFQ figures for the period between April 1995 and March 1996 are being compiled for our Agency's Efficiency Plan. It is anticipated that the information will be published in the 1996 Next Steps Review.

Letter from J. P. Clarke to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

You recently asked the Secretary of State for Defence a Parliamentary Question concerning the extent to which market testing had been carried out within Agencies of the Ministry of Defence. As the Chief Executive of the Hydrographic Office Defence Agency, the issue raised falls within my area of responsibility and I have been asked to reply to you.

The simple answer to your question is that no market testing has been carried out into the services provided by the Hydrographic Office. Given the paucity of this response it might be of some benefit if I were to expand a little on this statement.

The Hydrographic Office, during 1993 and 1994 conducted a number of internal studies into various activities to ascertain if market testing represented a feasible and realistic method of achieving value for money. In the event, the Hydrographic Office Board concluded that a formal Market Testing programme would not be conducted as it was not, for various reasons, considered to be an appropriate option. However, the various feasibility studies highlighted a number of areas and activities where it was felt further efficiency savings could be made. In light of this a formal Efficiency Programme was instigated with the aim of realising savings, commensurate with those which could have been expected from market testing. This programme was successful with savings targets being met in both financial years 1994/95 and 1995/96.

I hope the above information has been helpful.

Letter from N. J. Pearson to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre Defence Agency. The Agency, which is only 2 months old, has not carried a market test of any of the services which it provides.

Letter from A. W. Pollard to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about what market testing has been carried out into the services that Agencies provide. As Chief Executive, this falls within my area of responsibility for the Logistic Information Systems Agency (LISA).

Although LISA was included in the Market Testing programme prior to its launch as an Agency in November 1994, the activity to be tested was subsumed by the Agency's CFQ Partnership initiative. This culminated in the award of a contract in December 1995 to EDS. Under the terms of this contract, all LISA non-core activity is being transferred to the Private Sector partner who will continue to provide these services on site under GOCO arrangements. The bulk of the transfer took place on 1 March 1996 with the remainder to follow by April 1997. It is anticipated that final CFQ figures for the year ending March 1996 will be published in this year's Next Steps Review.

If you require any further information, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Letter from B. E. Nimick to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about Market testing, as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Medical Supplies Agency.

The Medical Supplies Agency was established "to ensure the cost effective and timely provision of medical, dental and veterinary material, blood and blood products, technical and logistic support and trained personnel to the UK Armed Forces worldwide". It was initially proposed that the provision of these services be subject to a market test. However, Defence Cost Study 15 recommended that this should be cancelled and that the wider system covering medical supply, provisioning points and other medical stores should undergo agency review.

As a consequence of this review, this Agency came into being on 1 March 1996 and copies of the Framework Document and Corporate Plan have been placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

Our efficiency programme is estimated to achieve savings of £27m over the 10 year Long Term Costing period. Clearly it is too early in the life of the Agency to have completed market testing exercises for the services we provide, but our corporate plan identifies the strategies designed to deliver value for money and cost effective services. In brief these strategies are to:

(a) Utilize the Private Sector for direct deliveries of medical material of end users and the setting up of dormant contracts, where appropriate, to enable a percentage of War Maintenance Reserve (WMR) to be held by trade. This would drive down the need to hold stocks and limit the storage facilities to the minimum required for operational purposes.

(b) Factor out the non-core functions to the most cost effective provider, whether Public or Private sector. This in turn will enable a further rationalisation of sites within the medical supply organisation. There are a number of areas where Service Level Agreements with other MOD authorities, who are also pursuing efficiency programmes, would be appropriate, for example, Army Base Storage and Distribution Agency (ABSDA) and Director of Transport and Movement Executive (DTM(X)). Emphasis will be placed on customer satisfaction through both control of supply and distribution. With the resultant rise in customer confidence, it is expected that there will be a corresponding reduction in local stock holdings.

(c) Develop partnership arrangements with authorities beyond MOD either in Industry or other elements of the Public Sector such as the Buying Agency and the National Health Service Supplies Authority (NHSSA). Discussions with a variety of existing and potential suppliers are being carried out.

(d) Commission a review of policy concerning range and standardisation of material. Proposals for rationalising range and prescribing policy will be submitted to the Surgeon General for approval. This will achieve a reduction in programme costs.

As these measures are carried out, the Medical Supply Organisation will reduce in size and will eventually have a core of service medical personnel, with the necessary clinical skills, working closely with a civilian team to provide a compact multi-disciplined team. This will be the source of purchasing, provisioning, clinical and technical support to advise the Surgeon General and provide him with advice with regard to the acquisition of material and related services and to support Operations more effectively through integrated Operational Supply Chains.

I hope this is helpful.

Letter from P. R. Wildman to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing carried out by government agencies. This matter falls within my area of responsibility, as Chief Executive, as far as the Military Survey Defence Agency is concerned.

No market testing has been completed by Military Survey to date. The three initiatives started in 1993 ceased to be candidates when they fell below revised financial thresholds. However, these initiatives have now been reviewed under Competing For Quality (CFQ) guidelines and a new CFQ programme is being developed. It is anticipated that further information will be published in the 1996 Next Steps Review and the 1996/7 Agency Annual Report.

Letter from W. E. E. Boreham to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing, as this falls into my area of responsibility as Chief Constable/Chief Executive of the Ministry of Defence Police Agency.

The non-core activities of Ministry of Defence Police business were market tested as part of our prior options exercise, which resulted in the placement of contracts, at MDP Wethersfield, covering catering, estate management, grounds maintenance, accommodation services, cleaning and administration, effective from April 1993. The resultant savings are in excess of £300K per annum.

Letter from W. S. Graham to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

1. I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence, that asked what market testing has been carried out into the services provided by the 'Naval Aircraft Repair Organisation (NARO)' and what were the results, as the matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the NARO.

2. No market testing has been carried out in respect of services provided by the NARO.

Letter from J. H. S. McAnally to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

The Secretary of State for Defence has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question, about agency Market Testing (MT) initiatives, in my capacity as Chief Executive of the Naval Recruiting and Training Agency (NRTA).

The NRTA came into being on 1 April 1995. During the 1980s and prior to the formation of the Ministry of Defence Market Testing Organisation, the Royal Navy contracted out a number of shore establishment support activities, such as catering, cleaning and grounds maintenance.

In March 1995, one small Market Test was successfully concluded at the Britannia Royal Naval College boat maintenance facility at Sandquay, Dartmouth. In addition, MT feasibility studies were conducted in late 1994, at two NRTA shore training establishments. Both of these studies concluded independently that further scope for possible savings from MT were likely to be limited and would involve multiple, management intensive, tests of small identifiable units, with the accompanying need for, and expense of, consultancy support for in-house team bidders. As a consequence, the NRTA is developing a Partnering Initiative as an alternative to the traditional MT approach, whilst still complying with Governmental Competing for Quality (CFQ) policy. The Partnering Initiative will, in addition to providing "standard" CFQ savings in services delivery, provide a third party income stream to help offset the overhead costs of the NRTA infrastructure.

Letter from M. A. Rowe to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing where it relates to my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Pay & Personnel Agency.

My Agency was launched on 1 February 1996 and no market testing of the services we provide has been carried out.

Letter from S. B. Burdess to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying, on behalf of Air Vice-Marshal R. H. Kyle, who is currently on leave, to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing within his Department's Agencies as this matter falls within his responsibility as Chief Executive of the Royal Air Force Maintenance Group Defence Agency (RAF MGDA).

Competing for Quality figures for the period between April 1995 and March 1996 are being compiled for our Agency's Efficiency Plan. It is anticipated that this information will be published in the 1996 Nest Steps Review.

Letter from P. C. Ayee to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence asking if he would list for each of his Department's Agencies what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide, and what the results were. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Royal Air Force Signals Engineering Establishment.

My Agency is currently market testing a multi-activity package of its supporting activities, covering motor transport, provisioning, catering, information technology, communications and selected administrative services, and valued at £8m per annum in pay costs. Five external bids and one in-house bid have been received and are currently being evaluated. The successful bidder is expected to be announced in time for implementation of the results in January 1997.

Letter from J. A. G. May to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about market testing of services insofar as this bears on my responsibilities for the Royal Air Force Training Group Defence Agency.

Up to 31 March 1995, the following activities contributed to the Agency's response to the Defence Market Testing Initiative and the targets set by Departmental Plan 92:

(a) Support Services at Royal Air Force Scampton. The Support Services at Royal Air Force Scampton were contractorized. The Station has since been closed.

(b) The Joint Elementary Flying Training Squadron at Royal Air Force Topcliffe. The Joint Elementary Flying Training Squadron at Royal Air Force Topcliffe was contractorized. The Squadron, together with the Contractor, has since moved to Royal Air Force Barkston Heath.

(c) Supply Services at Royal Air Force Locking. The market test of the Supply Services at Royal Air Force Locking was put into abeyance pending decisions on the future of the Station. It has since been decided to close the Station.

Except for the outcome of the recent competition in respect of Support Services at Royal Air Force Valley, which we hope will be announced shortly, the Agency's Competing for Quality forward programme for the period from 1 April 1995 to 31 March 1996 has yet to be finalized. It is expected that the outstanding conclusions will be published in the 1996 Next Steps Review.

I am sending a copy of this letter to my Air Officer Commanding-in-Chief.

Letter from I. S. Mitchelson to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence relating to market testing within each of his Department's Agencies, insofar as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of Service Children's Education.

For the period up until March 1996 this Agency had not yet completed the market testing of any of its services. This Agency is, however, currently involved in a wider market test concerning Army Catering and Mess Services in Germany. The project is being led by the United Kingdom Support Command (Germany) and the market test includes catering and cleaning in Service Schools in Germany; contractual arrangements are planned to be effective from 1 October 1997.

Letter from Brian Raine to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about what market testing has been carried out into the services we provide and the results thereof as this matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of Queen Victoria School.

Since Queen Victoria School became an Agency on 1st April 1992 no market testing has been carried out into the services we provide. We currently have no plans to carry out market testing in the future.

If you have any further questions about this please do not hesitate to contact me.

TREASURY

Tax Complaints

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many cases investigated by the revenue adjudicator in each year since 1993 have been settled; and if he will make a statement; [29601]

(2) how many complaints in each year since May 1993, have been fully investigated by the revenue adjudicator; and if he will make a statement. [29605]

Mr. Jack: The following table shows the number of full investigations of complaints about the Inland Revenue which the adjudicator completed in the three years to 31 March 1996:

Year	Complaints taken up for investigation	Complaints settled in the year
1993–94	308	105
1994–95	504	381
1995–96	470	495

On 31 March 1996, the adjudicator had 301 complaints under full investigation.

European Monetary Union

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the levels of unemployment that would be optimal for successful economic convergence prior to entering the European monetary union. [30468]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The criteria against which member states will be assessed when determining whether they have successfully converged prior to entering the European monetary union are set out in article 109j of the treaty establishing the European Community. Levels of unemployment are not included among these criteria. But having an efficient and flexible labour market increases competitiveness and generates growth and employment.

The United Kingdom labour market is one of the least regulated in the European Union with an impressive record on job creation, and we have more people in jobs and fewer out of work than any other major European country.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 567, what was the average cost of answering an (a) oral and (b) written parliamentary question for April of the current year; and if he will put the information and statistics on which this calculation is based in the Library. [30470]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information required to calculate the average cost of answering parliamentary questions for April 1996 is not yet available. The calculation is dependent upon the availability of data on movements in earnings, published annually in October. I am arranging for details of the basis of the April 1995 calculation to be placed in the Library.

Debt Servicing Bill

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the annual reduction in the Government's debt servicing bill in the years (a) 1996–97, (b) 1997–98, (c) 1998–99, (d) 1999–2000 and (e) 2000–01 resulting from a fall in United Kingdom interest rates of 1.5 per cent. across all maturities of the yield curve. [30594]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The forecast reductions in net central Government interest payments resulting from a half of 1 per cent. fall in interest rates across the yield curve are as follows: (a) 1996–97 £0.3 billion, (b) 1997–98 £0.5 billion, (c) 1998–99 £0.6 billion, (d) 1999–2000 £0.7 billion, (e) 2000–2001 to £0.7 billion.

These reductions are calculated using the 1995 Budget forecast for borrowing and assume that the half point fall is sustained throughout the forecast.

Road Traffic Offences

Sir David Steel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will earmark a major proportion of revenue raised from road traffic penalties to be used for increased preventive measures. [30676]

Mr. Waldegrave: Revenue raised through either fines or taxes is paid into the Consolidated Fund. Priorities for public expenditure are settled through the public expenditure survey process.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30544]

Mr. Jack: The information for HM Treasury is given in the table. On 1 April 1996, all Treasury staff transferred from their old grades, into new, broad pay ranges. Staff who were in the old grades of administrative assistant and administrative officer are now in pay ranges A and B respectively.

	Male	Female	Total	Female (per cent.)
Pay range A	26	52	78	67
Pay range B	71	174	245	71
Pay range C	75	75	150	50
Pay range D	178	93	271	34
Pay range E	187	67	254	26
Pay range F	68	13	81	16
Pay range G	15	4	19	21
Pay range H	11	0	11	—
Total	631	478	1,109	43

Housing Stock Sales (VAT)

Mr. Donohoe: Top ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rate of value added tax pertains to the sale of housing stock owned by a development corporation to a housing association, [30542]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Value added tax is not levied on the sale of housing, irrespective of who supplies it to whom. Generally, new housing is zero rated and other housing is exempt from VAT.

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; what agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30560]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury has not used any private detective agencies or investigators during the years in question.

Vehicles (Disabled Use)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what guidance is given to local VAT offices to enable them to decide which types of vehicles are eligible for class three zero rating for disabled use; [30967]

(2) if he will list the rules of eligibility for class three vehicles to qualify for zero rating for disabled road use; and if he will make a statement; [30965]

(3) what plans he has to classify all-terrain vehicles as being eligible for class three zero rating for the purposes of VAT when used on public roads by people with disabilities; [30964]

(4) what measures would be required to classify all-terrain vehicles as eligible for class three zero rating; [30968]

(5) if he will list those types of vehicle which currently qualify for zero rating for disabled purposes on public roads. [30966]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The legal definition of an invalid carriage, under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Person's Act 1970, is a vehicle constructed or adapted for the use of a disabled person. For VAT purposes class three invalid carriages, like classes one and two qualify for zero rating when supplied to a disabled person or to a charity which makes them available for use by a disabled person. The construction requirements for class three invalid carriages are set out in The Use of Invalid Carriages on Highways Regulations 1988 which are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

For VAT purposes all-terrain vehicles will qualify for zero rating if they are designed solely for use by disabled people when supplied to a disabled person or to a charity for making available to disabled people. Local VAT offices are issued with general guidance on what equipment is designed solely for use by a disabled person. The only types of vehicles for use on public roads qualifying for the zero rate are those class three invalid carriages which are permitted to use the roads.

Investment Income Surcharge

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the probable yield of an investment income surcharge in the year 1997–98 at the equivalent rates to those abolished in 1984. [30995]

Mr. Jack: The estimated full-year yield if introducing a 15 per cent. surcharge to investment income above £13,000, which is the 1983–84 level of revalorisation to 1996–97, would be about £1.1 billion at 1996–97 income levels. The yield for 1997–98 would depend on levels of incomes in that year.

Assets

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total value of (a) United Kingdom assets based overseas and (b) foreign-owned assets based in the United Kingdom. [30797]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The total value of identified United Kingdom overseas assets recorded at the end of 1995 was £1,613 billion. The total value of identified UK liabilities recorded at the end of 1995 was £1,597 billion.

Smuggling

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many flexible anti-smuggling teams have been established; and what plans he has to establish more in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [31098]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The composition of flexible anti-smuggling teams varies from place to place and time to time according to Customs assessment of the resources needed to carry out controls. Consequently the number of teams is not meaningful.

Approximately 2,250 officers are currently deployed on anti-smuggling duties. There are no plans to increase this number in 1996–97 or 1997–98.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many brigades have been established to tackle drug smuggling; and what plans he has to establish more in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [31097]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In anti-smuggling terms, brigades are not forces additional to normal anti-smuggling complement. They are forces assembled temporarily on a local basis, and deployed outside their normal operational area to address specific targets or to test risk. Consequently they are not formally established and the question of numbers of brigades does not arise.

Small Business Compliance

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the proposed pilot scheme to aid small business compliance. [29954]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 21 May 1996]: There is a wide range of work underway in the Chancellor's Departments, including a number of pilots, to reduce the compliance burdens of business in complying with their various tax obligations. For example, there are a number of pilots within the joint working programme between the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise and the Contributions Agency—announced by the Deputy Prime Minister on 19 September—including plans for joint seminars for small businesses, a national helpline for employers and a review of forms and leaflets. All are well on course.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual budget for his departmental deregulation unit; how many staff it employs; and of these how many (a) are career civil servants and of what grades, (b) have been seconded from business, and (c) have experience of the private sector. [30056]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 21 May 1996]: Within the Chancellor's Departments much of the work on particular deregulation issues is carried out by the policy teams with overall responsibility for those particular issues. Separate units do exist within the Treasury, Customs and Excise, Inland Revenue and the Office for National Statistics which have the responsibility of co-ordinating the deregulation effort of these departments, but in each case, deregulation represents only part of the workload of these units.

Treasury

In the Treasury, deregulation work is co-ordinated by the competition, deregulation and energy team, which has total annual budget of £231,048. The team has seven staff, comprising one grade 5, one (part time) grade 7, one HEO(D), one HEO, one assistant economist (half time equivalent, also has duties in another team), one AO and one personal secretary. Of these the grade 5, HEO, AO and personal secretary spend part of their time dealing with deregulation. All of these staff are career civil servants; none have been seconded from business.

HM Customs and Excise

In Customs and Excise, deregulation is co-ordinated by the business unit, which allocates £80,000 of its annual budget to work on this issue. Within the unit, one grade 7 and one HEO work full time, and one EO works half time on deregulation. All of these staff are career civil servants; none have been seconded from business.

Office for National Statistics

The survey control and deregulation unit of the Office for National Statistics has a total annual budget of £162,500. This unit has six staff, comprising one grade 7, two HEOs, one EO, and two AOs, all of whom spend part of their time dealing with deregulation. All of these staff are career civil servants; none have been seconded from business.

Inland Revenue

Inland Revenue's departmental deregulation unit has six staff, comprising one grade 5, a grade 6, two grade 7s, one SEO one personal secretary. This unit is a subdivision of a larger team, which has various other responsibilities, and there are no separate figures available covering the costs of deregulation work. All of these staff are career civil servants; none have been seconded from business.

Many of the officials listed, in each of the four departmental deregulation units, will have experience of contacts with the private sector, whether in the course of their present duties, or gained in previous posts. Each of these departments have separate internal accounting systems, so the figures for expenditure by the various deregulation units are not available on the same basis.

Tax Fraud

Mr. Battle: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what estimate he has made of the savings accruing to public funds from campaigns against tax fraud in each year since 1979; [30415]

(2) how many staff have been employed full time by the Treasury in tackling tax fraud for each year since 1979; [30418]

(3) how much was spent by his Department on publicity campaigns against tax fraud for each year since 1979. [30420]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 21 May 1996]: It is not possible to isolate resources relating to fraud cases from other tax investigation work, but I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) on 3 November 1995, Official Report, column 503 about the resources used for tax investigations generally back to 1988–89. Accurate figures are not available as far back as 1979.

The Inland Revenue seeks all appropriate opportunities to publicise its compliance activities. Publicity is sought for every successful Revenue prosecution and significant levels of press coverage have been achieved for its compliance work. In addition, contributions have been given to radio and television programmes, with occasional full-length feature programmes about the Revenue's work including its anti-evasion operations.

Given the varied nature of all this publicity, it is not possible to estimate its actual impact on tax revenues.

Premium Bonds

Miss Hoey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will lower the limit on the minimum purchase of premium bonds to £10. [30249]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 21 May 1996]: No. The increase in the minimum purchase to £100 was made in July 1989. At the time of the change the average purchase of premium bonds was £150. It is now much higher, at £1,730.

Employment Growth

Mr. Byers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was for each year since 1991 the percentage change in employment growth on the previous year for (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the European Union, (c) the United States of America and (d) Japan. [30161]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 22 May 1996]: The information requested is held in the 1995 edition of "Labour Force Statistics 1973–1993" in table 6.0—"Civilian Employment". More recent data are available for countries that compile labour force statistics on a monthly or quarterly basis in the "Quarterly Labour Force Statistics Number 1 1996". These books are published by the Organisation for Economic C0-operation and Development and copies are available in the Library.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the estimated cost to the Treasury in 1997–98 of moving to payments on account of one twenty-fourth of companies' VAT liabilities in accordance with the requirements of the Value Added Tax (Payment on Account) (Amendment) Order 1996; [30223]

(2) what is the estimated income to the Treasury in 1997–98 of removing the seven-day extension to the time for companies making VAT payments on account in accordance with the requirements of the Value Added Tax (Payment on Account) (Amendment) Order 1996. [30224]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 22 May 1996]: The effect on total VAT collected of the package of changes to the payments on account scheme is nil in 1997–98. There is however a cash flow gain to the Treasury of approximately £30 million from removing the seven-day extension to the time for companies making VAT payments on account. This is offset by a cash flow loss to the Treasury of approximately £65 million from moving to payments on account of one twenty-fourth of companies' VAT liabilities. There is therefore a net cash flow loss of £35 million.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Kashmir

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent reports he has received concerning the situation of the British hostages held in Kashmir. [30685]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: As the House is aware there have been reports that the hostages may be dead. We continue to work with the Indian Government to assess whether these reports are true, and to keep the families and constituency MPs fully informed. Until we have reason to do otherwise we shall continue to work for the hostages' safe release.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30546]

Mr. David Davis: The details requested are given in the tables. The figures are from the annual staff in post return as at 1 April 1996, including part-time staff.

The corresponding figures as at 1 April 1995 for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office diplomatic wing are given in table 6 on page 16 of the FCO departmental report, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; what agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30562]

Mr. David Davis: Neither the FCO diplomatic wing nor the Overseas Development Administration has made any use of private detective agencies or investigators.

Peru

Mr. Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made towards securing agreement on options to deal with Peruvian indebtedness to the United Kingdom. [30534]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: We are ready to take part with other Paris Club creditors in a further rescheduling of Peru's official bilateral debts once agreement has been reached with the International Monetary Fund on a new economic reform programme. This is expected in the next month or so.

It has recently been suggested that the British Government should use aid funds to cancel some of Peru's debts in return for the Peruvian Government using the local currency equivalent to fund development projects. We believe, however, that is more effective to fund these activities directly: our aid programme to Peru amounts to some £2.5 million a year. The Overseas Development Administration wrote off Peru's aid debts of some £5 million in 1994.

CFE Conference

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the conventional forces in Europe review conference. [30509]

Mr. David Davis: The CFE review conference which ended in Vienna on 31 May was the first operational review of the CFE treaty. During the conference, agreements were reached which resolved the outstanding implementation problems of Russia's non-compliance with the treaty's flank limits and with its commitments to destroy equipment east of the Urals. States parties also agreed to begin immediately a process of discussion aimed at promoting the objectives of the treaty and enhancing its viability and effectiveness in Europe's changing security environment.

Overseas Visits (Royal Family)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, column 362, if he will give a breakdown of the costs incurred by his Department in respect of royal visits abroad in each year since 1990–91. [30034]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor [holding answer 20 May 1996]: It is not possible to provide a breakdown of expenditure for financial years 1990–91 and 1991–92 without incurring disproportionate cost.

For 1992–93, I refer the hon. Member to the replies given on 16 June 1993, Official Report, column 64 and 24 June 1993, Official Report, column 239 to the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams). Those replies reflected total costs to the Department at that time amounting to £423,500. The full outturn figure for that year amounted to £455,695.

For 1993–94, 1994–95 and 1995–96 the breakdown is as follows:

1991	154	0	154

Council of Ministers

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many decisions have been taken by the Council of Ministers since 1 January which were reached by (a) qualified majority and (b) unanimity. [31181]

Mr. David Davis: This information is not yet available. I shall write to the hon. Member when we have it.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, columns 56–57, how many (a) unconditional on-demand bonds, (b) performance bonds, (c) parent company guarantees, (d) advance payment bonds and (e) retention bonds were required by his Department in the last five years. [31226]

Mr. David Davis: The information requested is not centrally held and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Bosnia

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the UN implementation force's—IFOR—current policy towards those held responsible for crimes against humanity in Bosnia; and if he will make a statement. [31152]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: IFOR will detain and transfer to the international criminal tribunal for former Yugoslavia any persons indicated by the tribunal with whom it comes into contact in the performance of its mission.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Barristers

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what reference to a declaration is contained in his warrant in respect of barristers taking silk. [27568]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: We warrant signifying the appointment of Queen's counsel will continue to make no reference to the declaration which will continue to be made when the appointee has tendered the warrant to the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland.

Decommissioning

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he has shown the Government of the Republic of Ireland the text of his draft legislation for decommissioning arms and explosives; [31091]

(2) if the Government of the Republic of Ireland has been asked to show him or his officials the text of their draft legislation for decommissioning arms and explosives; and if he will make a statement. [31103]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: Both Governments are co-operating closely in drawing up legislation designed to underpin any decommissioning scheme.

Fisheries

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answers of 31 January, Official Report, column 794, and 12 February, Official Report, column 436, for what reasons the fishery division of the Department of Agriculture did not oppose the application under its remit under the Fishery Act 1986 in respect of its responsibility for fisheries. [31275]

Mr. Ancram: The previous answers referred to do not make mention of an application. The question cannot be answered in its present form.

"The Nemesis File"

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 14 December, Official Report, column 801, what conclusion was reached by the inquiry conducted by the Royal Ulster Constabulary serious crime squad. [30705]

Sir John Wheeler: I have nothing to add to the answers I gave to my hon. Friend on 14 December 1995, Official Report column 801, and to the hon. Member for Belfast, South (Rev. Martin Smyth) on 24 April 1996, Official Report, columns 182–83. The RUC investigations into the allegations contained in this book continue.

Public Bodies (Employees)

Ms Mowlam: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list (a) the number of women employed in each non-departmental public body in Northern Ireland and (b) the number of non-departmental public bodies in Northern Ireland which have a female chair. [30494]

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; what agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and what cost to his Department. [30565]

Sir John Wheeler: During 1995–95 and 1994–95, the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments have used detective agencies or investigators on the following occasions:

(1) serving six debt enforcement orders;

(2) gathering evidence in relation to an enforcement action against the unauthorised change of use of a property;

(3) investigating seven public or employers liability claims;

(4) investigating two industrial injury claims;

(5) work in relation to an appraisal of a project for which grant assistance had been sought; at a total cost of £17,861.

Names of the detective agencies have not been disclosed on grounds of confidentiality and security.

Hydroelectricity

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make available to the Lough Neagh and Maine System Game Anglers Association the contents of letters exchanged between a member of the fishery division of the Department of Agriculture and hydro-electric consultant of Dougal Billie Associates. [31224]

Mr. Ancram: No. Release of this information would adversely affect the Department's ability to secure the best possible fishery protection measures in water abstraction situations related to hydroelectric projects.

WALES

Forest Enterprise

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many parcels of forestry are currently being offered for sale by Forest Enterprise Wales; and if he will make a statement. [29633]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The subject of the question relates to matters undertaken by Forest Enterprise. I have asked its acting chief executive, Mr. Gordon M. Cowie, to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Gordon M. Cowie to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 31 May 1996:

You asked the Secretary of State for Wales the following question:

"how many parcels of forestry are currently being offered for sale by Forest Enterprise Wales: and if he will make a statement."

The question relates to an issue that is my responsibility, as Acting Chief Executive of Forest Enterprise, so I have been asked to respond. The information you require is as follows:-

There are currently 34 woodlands totalling 1,242 hectares being offered for sale, by Forest Enterprise Wales. As set out in the Government's Expenditure Plans 1996–97 to 1998–99 Forest Enterprise plans to sell 40,000 hectares of forest land in the next three years and expects to receive about £60 million from the sale of forest land and surplus properties during that period. Some 15 per cent of these sales will be in Wales.

Local Government Re-organisation

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the local authorities which will cover all or part of each of the parliamentary constituencies which will come into existence at the end of the present Parliament. [30353]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information is set out as follows:

Constituency	Unitary Authority
Aberavon	Neath Port Talbot
Alyn and Deeside	Flintshire

Organochlorines

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has evaluated concerning production and discharge as waste of chlorinated organic compounds from industrial establishments in south Wales since 1966; and if he will make a statement. [30484]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: A number of sources of information and reviews are available relating to the emission of certain chlorinated organic compounds from industrial sources. These include "The Chemical Release Inventory", first published by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in 1994, which includes detailed analyses of emissions both by local authority area and by industrial sector.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has evaluated on the level of organochlorines in the aerial environment of Cardiff as compared with other urban centres in the United Kingdom. [30485]

Mr Jones: Organochlorines in air, including dioxins, furans, polychlorinated biphenyls and pesticides, are currently monitored at three urban and four rural sites throughout the United Kingdom as part of the Department of the Environment's national air quality monitoring network. It should be noted that not all the pollutants are monitored at every site. Between January 1991 and September 1993 one site was located in Cardiff. A summary of data from these sites is presented each year in the "Digest of Environmental Statistics", copies of which have been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Local Government Archives

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken to ensure that arrangements entered into between two or more authorities on archive services offer an adequate and stable framework for the delivery of services. [30690]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The details of joint arrangements are a matter for the councils concerned. In considering the draft schemes on which councils consulted him under section 60 of the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994, my hon. Friend looked for evidence that joint arrangements would exist for a reasonable period beyond April 1996 and that adequate staffing and other resources would be provided.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of whether archive services are being provided at the same standards as the previous local authorities by the new unitary authorities under section 60 of the Local Government Act (Wales) 1994. [30689]

Mr. Jones: It is too early to make any such assessment. Eighteen county and county borough councils have still to send to my right hon. Friend the final versions of the schemes which they are required to prepare under section 60 of the 1994 Act.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of whether existing collections of archive records are being maintained intact by the new unitary authorities; and what arrangements are in place to monitor the operation of the archive schemes by the new authorities. [30691]

Mr. Jones: My right hon. Friend has made no such assessment. Section 60 of the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 imposes duties on county and county borough councils to prepare and maintain archive schemes; and, before making or modifying a scheme, to consult my right hon. Friend and to have regard to his advice.

Pharmacy Contractors

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many pharmacy contractors there are in each of the local authority areas of Wales. [30590]

Mr. Hague: The information is not available in the form requested. The number of pharmacy contractors in each health authority area is as follows:

Area	Number
Bro Taf	190
Dyfed Powys	122
Gwent	121
Morgannwg	129
North Wales	152

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received from pharmacy contractors concerning the late payment of remuneration; how many payments of remuneration have been delayed more than 120 days; and if he will make a statement. [30588]

Mr. Hague: There are no identified cases of agreed payments of salary, overtime or allowances to Welsh Office staff being delayed for more than 120 days.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he will adopt to assist the cash flow problems of pharmacy contractors with regard to their need to pay their suppliers. [30589]

Mr. Hague: The present system of reimbursement is being considered as part of the 1996–97 pay negotiations for pharmacists' fees and allowances. As the negotiations are not completed, it would not be appropriate for me to comment further at this stage.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has received from pharmacy contractors concerning the late payment of remuneration. [30587]

Mr. Hague: One from a pharmacy contractor, and eight from hon. Members writing on behalf of a constituent.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he proposes to retain retail price maintenance for medicines; and if he will make a statement. [30601]

Mr. Hague: The decision to review retail price maintenance for pharmacy products was made by the Office of Fair Trading. I understand that the review is looking closely at the possible effects which abolition may have on the viability of the independent pharmacy sector.

Pharmacists Review Panel

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what contacts he maintains with the independent pharmacists' review panel; and if he will make a statement. [30600]

Mr. Hague: Welsh Office officials maintain regular contacts with the pharmaceutical services negotiating committee on matters concerning the provision of pharmaceutical services in Wales.

Ambulance NHS Trusts

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he has had with chief ambulance officers and the chairmen of the Welsh ambulance trusts concerning (a) financial viability, (b) revisions of boundaries (c) mergers and (d) potential efficiency savings; and if he will make a statement. [30696]

Mr. Hague: I have had no consultations with ambulance NHS trusts on border changes or mergers. All NHS trusts, including ambulance trusts, are monitored regularly by my Department to ensure financial viability. For 1996–97, I have asked health authorities to make 3 per cent. efficiency savings across Wales which will be reflected in the contracts which they strike with all trusts.

Dispensing Doctors

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the level of profit made by dispensing doctors in dispensing on the NHS free samples from pharmaceutical companies; what plans he has for an abatement scheme to recover these costs; and if he will make a statement. [30694]

Mr. Hague: It is for the independent Review Body on Doctors' and Dentists' Remuneration to make recommendations on the level and distribution of net incomes for doctors taking part in the NHS. Among the evidence available to it each year is a comparison of the earnings and expenses of dispensing and non-dispensing doctors.

Payments to doctors in respect of practice dispensing have been subject to an abatement, known as the discount scale, since 1983. The discount scale represents the difference between the list price of all drugs dispensed in general practice and the net acquisition cost of the same drugs.

Cattle Slaughter Scheme

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 66, what plans he has to set up rendering capacity in Wales in conjunction with the 30-month and cull cow slaughter scheme. [30698]

Mr Hague: We are continually monitoring all aspects of the operation of the over 30-month slaughter scheme; we are actively considering a variety of options for increasing throughput of cattle under the scheme.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total number of (a) beef cattle and (b) dairy cattle slaughtered so far in Wales under the 30-month compensation scheme. [31115]

Mr. Hague: The total number of cattle from Wales slaughtered under this scheme at 30 May 1996 is 7,383.

No breakdown between beef cattle and dairy cattle is available.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30548]

Mr. Hague: The information requested is given in the following table:

Staff in the Welsh office by grade as at 1 April 1996

Administrative Grades	Total	Male	Female	Percentage
Senior Civil Servants	68	53	15	22
G6	23	18	5	22
G7	146	107	39	27
SEO	118	95	23	19
HEO	293	173	120	41
EO	460	202	258	56
AO	522	142	380	73
AA	526	211	315	60
Total	2,156	1,001	1,155	54

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; what agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30564]

Mr. Hague: In 1994–95 private investigation services were used by my Department on eight occasions at a cost of approximately £670. In 1995–96 such agencies were used on three occasions at a cost of approximately £310.

Private investigation agencies have been used in cases of damage to trunk road furniture and recovery of rent. The companies are not named for reasons of commercial confidentiality.

Refereeing (Insurance)

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what estimate he has made of the cost of providing all-Wales insurance cover for school staff supervising or refereeing sporting activities and how this would compare with (a) each local education authority providing cover for their schools and (b) each school taking out its own insurance policy; [30707]

(2) if he will make it his policy to insure all staff in schools when they are supervising or refereeing sporting activities. [30710]

Mr. Hague: No such estimate has been made. It is for local education authorities in respect of county and controlled schools, and the governing body in the case of voluntary-aided and grant-maintained schools, to ensure that insurance is adequate to cover staff involved with school sporting activities.

Specialist Beef Cattle

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he intends to announce exemptions from the 30-month ban in respect of specialist beef cattle. [31080]

Mr. Hague: Comments from interested organisations were invited on 3 May on a proposal to establish a voluntary mature beef assurance scheme, which would allow cattle aged over 30 months from specialist beef herds which met the scheme's conditions to be sold for human consumption. Comments are being considered, and the next steps will be announced as soon as possible.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 65, how many (a) unconditional on-demand bonds, (b) performance bonds, (c) parent company guarantees, (d) advance payment bonds and (e) retention bonds were required by his Department in the last five years. [31227]

Mr. Hague: The information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the concern caused by the BSE crisis to Welsh agriculture; and what has been the cost to public funds to date of measures taken to deal with BSE. [31099]

Mr. Hague: My hon. Friend and I have met the farming unions, farming delegations and others, and are well aware of their concerns. As regards the cost of Government measures introduced to deal with this crisis I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Northampton, North, (Mr. Allen) Official Report, columns 321-22.

Cattle Trading

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action his Department is taking to ensure that cattle trading in Welsh markets is not subject to (a) cartels and (b) other unfair trading practices. [31079]

Mr. Hague: The Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce is working to enable the carcases of clean beef animals over 30 months old and cull cows to be put into cold storage until rendering capacity is available to deal with them. This should help maintain a competitive market for these animals.

HEALTH

GP Fundholding

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the statutory regulation will be in place requiring former general practitioner fundholding practices to apply accumulated savings to discharge outstanding liabilities; and what have been (a) the number of fundholders and (b) the financial amounts involved prior to the introduction of this statutory regulation over the last five years. [26725]

Mr. Malone: This regulation has been in effect since 1 April 1996. One fundholding practice left the scheme with both undischarged liabilities and savings before that date. In 1995–96 the practice overspent by £148,000. By agreement with the health authority, it returned £45,000 of its £92,000 savings from earlier years, towards the overspend, with the balance being met from contingency funds.

Free Prescriptions

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the cost of providing free prescriptions and optical and dental treatment to students on the ground of low income; and what proportion of those students were in full-time higher education for each year since 1990. [29040]

Mr. Malone: The information is not available.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proposals he has to modify the exemption list in relation to prescription charges and the criteria for the eligibility for the list; and if he will make a statement; [30186]

(2) what proposals he has (a) to extend the range of medicines which are issued free of charge and (b) to widen the list of conditions entitling the sufferer to free prescriptions; and if he will make a statement. [30185]

Mr. Malone: We do not plan to extend the arrangements to include other groups of people, medical conditions or medicines. Our prescription charge exemption and remission arrangements are among the most generous in Europe.

Doncaster Health Authorities

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the running costs of (a) Doncaster health authority and (b) Doncaster family health services authority in each year since 1988. [29735]

Mr. Malone: The information is shown in the table.

Headquarter revenue expenditure

1994–95	1,376	1,996

Source:
Annual accounts of the district health authority and the family health services authority.
Notes:
1. Changes over the years in the roles and responsibilities of family practitioner committees, family health services authorities and district health authorities mean that the figures are not strictly comparable.
2. The health authority costs are those reported in the accounts as "Authority administration and purchasing expenses". This includes capital charges after 1991–92. The family practitioner committee/family health services authority administration costs are those reported in the annual accounts as revenue administration costs and represent that part of total expenditure which is not medical, dental, ophthalmic or pharmaceutical.

AIDS and HIV

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) men and (b) women were registered suffering from (i) AIDS and (ii) HIV, in each London borough council in December 1995. [29994]

Mr Horam: The number of men and women with AIDS reported voluntarily by clinicians to the communicable disease surveillance centre as resident in London boroughs to December 1995 is shown in the table. Similar information for diagnosed HIV infection is not available.

For reasons of confidentiality the figures are not shown separately by sex.

Crohn's Disease

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current level of public funding into research for Crohn's disease; if he will increase this figure over the planning period; and if he will make it his policy to amend the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 to allow Crohn's sufferers to make claims for compensation. [3065]

Mr. Horam: The main agency through which the Government support biomedical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. The council is an independent body, deciding what research to support on its own expert judgment. Although it supports a significant portfolio of research related to intestinal diseases and inflammatory bowel diseases, it does not currently fund any research specifically on Crohn's disease.

Responsibility for the Vaccine Damage Payments Act 1979 rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security.

Yorkshire Regional Health Authority

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what dates Yorkshire regional health authority bought its premises at Park parade, Harrogate; how much was paid for the premises; and from whom they were bought. [30687]

Mr. Malone: The Yorkshire regional health authority bought its premises at Park parade, Harrogate from County Hotels (Harrogate) Limited on 31 March 1981 for a sum of £300,000.

Administration Costs

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the proportion of the budget spent on administration for (a) health authorities, (b) NHS trusts, (c) directly managed units, (d) fundholding general practitioner practices, (e) non-fundholding general practitioner practices and (f) the NHS as a whole. [30735]

Mr. Malone: The latest available information is for 1994–95 when spending on administration by regional health authorities, district health authorities, family health services authorities and special health authorities accounted for 3.5 per cent. of the national health service total gross spending. This figure includes the total revenue expenditure on pay and accommodation costs of staff at headquarter level in RHAs, DHAs and SHAs as identified in their annual accounts and the administration expenditure identified in the FHSAs' accounts.

The costs of administrative support in trusts are not separately identifiable from the 1994–95 accounts, as these were regarded as part of operational expenditure.

The costs of administrative support in directly managed units are included in the costs of the parent health authority.

All general practitioners are independent contractors supported through the general medical services system of payments and allowances. There is no facility within this system to separate out administrative costs. Fundholding practices receive a management allowance to meet the additional costs incurred in managing a fund. In 1994–95 these allowances accounted for 0.2 per cent. of NHS total gross spending.

Across the health service as a whole, 4.4 per cent. of total gross spending was committed to administration. This total includes the elements identified above as well as the gross running costs of the NHS executive and NHS-related functions of the Department of Health and the costs of the Prescription Pricing Authority and the Dental Practice Board.

Charities (NHS Budget)

Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the total NHS budget came from charities in each of the past five years. [30736]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Prostate Cancer

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve prostate cancer screening; and if he will make a statement. [30800]

Mr. Horam: We have no plans to introduce a national NHS screening programme for prostate cancer. The key aim of any screening programme must be to secure a demonstrable improvement in health by increasing length of life and enhancing quality of life. There is, as yet, no evidence that this would be achieved in relation to prostate cancer. The Department is aware of the need to assess the value of available techniques for the early detection of prostate cancer. Several research projects are currently being undertaken.

Although there is no national screening programme for prostate cancer, individual patients can be tested on request. This may be necessary where there is a family history of the disease. Some general practitioners offer patients testing as part of a general health check.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of prostate cancer have been identified in the United Kingdom in each of the past five years; what analysis he has made of these figures; and if he will make a statement. [31146]

Mr. Horam: The number of cases of prostate cancer registered in England and Wales were published in "Cancer Statistics Registrations", series MBI Nos. 19-1986, 20-1987, 21-1988 and 22-1989, and in the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys "Monitor" MBI 95/1-1990. Copies of all five publications are available in the Library.

Questions relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the proportion of NHS patients suffering from prostate cancer who have been treated with brachytherapy combined with external beam radiation; and if he will make a statement. [31147]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy with regard to making a prostate specific antigen test generally available at an early date to people suspected of suffering from prostate problems; and what plans he has to introduce a regular screening test for all men of vulnerable age groups. [31149]

Mr. Horam: The Department is aware of the need to assess the value of available techniques for the early detection of prostate cancer, including the prostatic specific antigen test. The Department of Health's standing group on health technology assessment has identified prostate cancer as one of the priority areas for health technology assessment and has commissioned work to assess the cost-effectiveness, clinical benefit and comparative value of measurement of PSA in serum and transrectal ultrasound in the diagnosis and management of prostatic cancer. The results of this work should be available shortly.

Although there is no national screening programme for prostate cancer available to national health service patients, individual patients can be tested on request. This may be necessary where there is a family history of the disease. Where appropriate, general practitioners can offer some patients testing as part of a general health check.

We have no plans currently to introduce a national NHS screening programme for prostate cancer. The key aim of any screening programme must be to secure a demonstrable improvement in health by increasing length of life and enhancing quality of life. There is, as yet, no evidence that this would be achieved in relation to prostate cancer.

Patient Costs

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is (a) the average patient care cost and (b) the number of in-patient beds in each NHS hospital trust, broken down by region. [30827]

Mr. Horam: Information on in-patient and day case costs will be placed in the Library.

Information on the number of in-patient beds is contained in the Department of Health publication "Bed Availability for England, Financial Year 1994–95", copies of which are available in the Library.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures. [30774]

Mr. Horam: The number of registered disabled people employed by the Department, including the executive agencies, is 57. This represents 1.09 per cent. of the total number of staff.

Depressive Illness

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received from the Depression Alliance organisation; and if he will make a statement. [30782]

Mr. Bowis: I met representatives of Depression Alliance on 20 March. Departmental officials are in regular contact with the organisation and enjoy a constructive relationship with it.

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the incidence of depressive illness in the United Kingdom; and what studies are being undertaken by his Department to investigate the effectiveness of treatment. [30781]

Mr. Bowis: The national survey of psychiatric morbidity carried out in 1993, and funded by the Department of Health, includes data on the incidence of depressive illness in the United Kingdom. Copies of the documents relating to the survey are available in the Library.

Although the Department is not undertaking any studies into the effectiveness of treatment for depressive illness, the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, is funding a number of trials which examine different types of treatment and therapies in this field.

Nurses' Wages

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds have been allocated to Doncaster health authority in 1996–97 for the purpose of increasing nurses' wages; and what percentage change this represents over the figure for 1995–96. [30811]

Mr. Malone: There is no specific funding within health authority allocations for pay.

Children's Homes

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action his Department has taken to implement the recommendations contained in its internal inquiry into the selection, development and management of staff in children's homes. [30994]

Mr. Bowis: We have conducted no internal inquiry into such matters.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many places there were in residential care homes for children in (a) local authorities, (b) the voluntary sector and (c) the private sector for each year since 1979. [30993]

Mr. Bowis: Information currently available centrally on places in children's homes was published in "Children's Homes at 31 March 1995, England, A/F 95/22", copies of which are available in the Library.

GP Prescribing Costs

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his letter of 1 April, (1) what is the estimated timetable for having available information on the prescribing costs for 1995–96 of each of the relevant categories of general practitioner; [31200]

(2) what was the average prescribing cost expressed as net ingredient cost per patient unit in 1989–90 and 1990–91 for those categories of general practitioners who had become by 1994–95 (i) non-fundholders, (ii) first wave fundholders, (iii) second wave fundholders, (iv) third wave fundholders, (v) fourth wave fundholders and (vi) fifth wave fundholders. [31203]

Mr. Malone: Data for 1990–91 are shown in the table. Comparable data for 1989–90 are not in a format suitable for analysis. Data for 1995–96 are not yet available.

PACT data, Prescription Pricing Authority. Figures are for items prescribed by GPs in England and dispensed during the months April-March.

Notes:

1. Expenditure is quoted in net ingredient cost terms for comparison purposes. Fundholder spending is actually monitored against actual cost, after allowing for discounts and container costs.
2. The population denominator is the prescribing unit. Persons 65 and over count as three PUs, those under 65 as one. PUs are calculated using Office of Population Censuses and Surveys mid-year estimates of the resident England population.

3. For technical reasons, a proportion of items and their associated net ingredient cost values have been excluded from the data. The figures are comparable with those for later years quoted in the letter of 1 April, but are not directly comparable with national drugs bill data.
4. "All non-fundholders" refers to non-fundholders in 1991, i.e. all doctors.
5. The "Continuing non-fundholders" data represent those practices which have not become fundholders in the first five waves.

Read Codes

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the arrangements for fair remuneration to the NHS centre for coding and classification for licence income arising from overseas sales of Read codes material, if he will list the accrued income from each such overseas country; and if he will make a statement. [31198]

Mr. Horam: The national health service centre for coding and classification has no responsibilities for overseas use of Read codes. As a result of the negotiations to purchase the copyright of the Read codes in 1990, Computer Aided Medical Systems Ltd. currently has total rights to market Read codes overseas.

Overseas income during the period from March 1990 to 30 September 1995 was £220,000, against which direct expenses and company costs of £270,000 have been expended over the same period. Details of individual arrangements are commercially confidential.

In 1994, CAMS proposed, free of charge, to surrender to the Department of Health its total rights to generate income overseas and to bring overseas income within the controlled cost plus arrangements which apply to the income from NHS sources. Negotiations to amend the original contract are in hand.

NHS Accounting

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will review the arrangements for the joint accounting and book-keeping of the NHS centre for coding and classification and Computer Aided Medical Systems Ltd. [31199]

Mr. Horam: The accounting and book-keeping arrangements for the national health service centre for coding and classification are the responsibility of the NHS executive, of which the centre is a part; the arrangements for Computer Aided Medical Systems Ltd. are the responsibility of that private company. There are no joint accounting or book-keeping arrangements, but the same financial consultant overseas the accounting and book-keeping at both CAMS and NHS CCC. This arrangement is being reviewed.

Drug Addicts (West Midlands)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of registered drug addicts in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands in each year since 1990. [31093]

Mr. Bowis: The information is shown in the table.

All drug addicts notified to the Home Office in Coventry district health authority and West Midlands regional health authority, 1990–1994

	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994
Coventry	95	73	76	91	101
West Midlands	670	947	1,143	1,221	1,506

Silicone Breast Implants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ban the use of silicone breast implants. [30667]

Mr. Horam: No.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what tests are available in the United Kingdom to measure the extent of silicone migration in the body. [30664]

Mr. Horam: There are no validated test methods available, either in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, suitable for determining the extent of silicone migration in body fluids and tissues.

Pesticide Poisoning

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he intends to take to ensure that the publication "Pesticide Poisoning, Notes for the Guidance of Medical Practitioners" is made publicly available through bookshops. [31019]

Mr. Horam: "Pesticides Poisoning, Notes for the Guidance of Medical Practitioners", will be available in Her Majesty's Stationery Office bookshops from the end of June.

Resource Management Initiative

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total cost to date of the resource management initiative. [31049]

Mr. Malone: The total cost is not possible to ascertain since boundaries between the programme and normal local developments in information technology and clinical management would be impossible to define precisely and therefore to cost.

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evaluation is being undertaken of the resource management initiative. [31050]

Mr. Malone: An independent evaluation of the resource management programme in England was commissioned by the national health service executive from a consortium led by the health services management unit.

NHS Pension Scheme

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to allow general practitioners' staff to join the NHS pension scheme. [31022]

Mr. Malone: The matter is under consideration. A number of complex issues have to be resolved before a decision is reached.

Psychiatry (Children)

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of (a) whole-time equivalent child and adolescent psychiatry consultants, (b) clinical psychologists working with children and (c) psychotherapists working with children for each year since 1979. [30991]

Mr. Malone: The available information is shown in the table. Information on the number of clinical psychologists working with children is not available centrally.

National health service hospital and community health services child and adolescent psychiatry consultants and child psychotherapists, excluding assistants and trainees, in England at 30 September each year 1979 to 1994

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to is answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 78, how many (a) unconditional on-demand bonds, (b) performance bonds, (c) parent company guarantees, (d) advance payment bonds and (e) retention bonds were required by his Department in the last five years. [31236]

Mr. Horam: None.

"A New Partnership for Care in Old Age"

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of (a) the number and (b) the proportion of elderly people in long-term residential and nursing care homes in (a) 2000, (b) 2005 and (c) 2010 who will have a partnership long-term care policy if the proposals in "A New Partnership for Care in Old Age" are implemented. [31296]

Mr. Bowis: We have no targets for the take-up of partnership products to meet long-term care costs. This will depend on the nature of the scheme and consumer choice.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the annual cost in terms of income forgone by local authorities or the Government in (a) 2000, (b) 2005 and (c) 2010 of a partnership long-term care insurance scheme, as proposed in the White Paper, "A New Partnership for Care in Old Age", assuming £1.50 protection for every £1 of insurance benefit was taken out by (i) 10 per cent., (ii) 25 per cent., (iii) 50 per cent., and (iv) 100 per cent., of elderly people with capital assets greater than £10,000. [31294]

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on 14 May, Official Report, column 419. In reaching conclusions about the partnership proposals, the Government will take careful account of the cost implications, including costs falling on local authorities.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will supplement the examples given on pages 35–36 of "A New Partnership for Care in Old Age", to exemplify the cost of long-term care insurance, within and without a partnership scheme, in terms of a monthly premium and a lump sum payment for benefits worth £1,600 a month for (a) a single male, (b) a single female and (c) a couple aged (i) 60 and (ii) 65 years. [31295]

Mr. Bowis: We expect that premiums for long-term care insurance generally, and particularly under a partnership scheme, will fall relative to current products as the market develops. However, premiums are still likely to vary considerably according to individual circumstances.

Safety of Medicines

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for the calendar years (a) 1993, (b) 1994 and (c) 1995 the total number of fatal suspected adverse drug reactions reported to the Committee on Safety of Medicines; and for each of the years if he will list the 10 drugs associated with the largest number of reported suspected fatal adverse reactions. [26291]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 24 April 1996]: The information is shown in the tables.

Year	Total number of fatal[1] reports
1993	471
1994	408
1995	476

[1] Reports where the fatality was associated directly or indirectly with the adverse reaction.

The table provides information on the number of reports of suspected adverse drug reactions for fatal cases associated directly or indirectly with reactions reported to the Committee on Safety of Medicines by health professionals from 1993 to 1995. As the scheme is voluntary, not all adverse reactions are reported. A report of a suspected adverse drug reaction does not necessarily mean that it was caused by the drug cited; other factors may have contributed. Comparisons between different drugs may be misleading because many factors influence reporting, including the level of usage of a medicine, the length of time it has been on the market and whether there has been significant media coverage relating to its use.

The 10 drugs most frequently associated with fatal[1] suspected adverse reactions in 1993, 1994 and 1995 are listed in the table.

[1] Reports where the fatality was associated directly or indirectly with the adverse reaction.
[2] This product was withdrawn from the market in 1993 because of concerns regarding increased mortality associated with its use.
Some of the reports associated with the drug substances presented concern products containing multiple active ingredients.
The figures provided are for the number of suspected adverse drug reactions where the reaction began in the year specified.

Residential Care Provision

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what powers he has to ensure that local authority care managers offer the required level of choice to elderly people and their relatives seeking residential care. [31189]

Mr. Bowis: We have issued a statutory direction to local authorities which requires them to place a resident in a care home of his or her choice subject only to availability of a bed, appropriateness of the home to the level and type of assessed need and reasonableness of cost in relation to the range of price normally paid by the authority for the level and type of need.

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy in respect of an independent inspectorate supported by private residential sector residential homes. [31269]

Mr. Bowis: A number of organisational models, including an independent inspectorate, have been put forward for consultation in our review of the regulation and inspection of social services. We shall consider possible changes to the current regulatory structure in the light of the independent assessor's report.

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cut-off point of beds per home for private sector residential homes in Devon laid down by Devon social services; what is the equivalent figure for local authority homes; and what guidance he has issued on this matter. [31188]

Mr. Bowis: These are matters for the registering authority. No guidance has been issued by the Government on the maximum number of beds in residential homes.

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many local authority residential homes in Devon are neither registered nor accredited; and what action he plans to take to bring about their registration or accreditation. [31239]

Mr. Bowis: Local authority residential care homes are not currently required to register under the Registered Homes Act 1984. Authorities are however required to inspect their directly managed homes and apply the same standards as they do to independent sector homes. The possible need for local authority homes to be regulated is being considered as part of our review of the regulation and inspection of social services.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he plans to take in respect of staffing levels in local authority residential homes in Devon which fail to meet Devon council's recommendations for the private sector. [31238]

Mr. Bowis: This is a matter for the local authority. We require local authorities to apply the same standards, including standards on staffing levels, to directly managed homes as they do to independent sector homes.

Sir Peter Emery: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact on the provision of health care of the relative costs of caring for the elderly, mentally ill patients in (a) a local authority-run home in Plymouth and (b) private sector establishments in Devon. [31240]

Mr. Bowis: No assessment has been made centrally of these relative costs.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what powers he has to ensure that in residential homes in Devon the purchaser/provider split takes place in accordance with the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. [31195]

Mr. Bowis: There are no such powers in the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. We encourage authorities to obtain maximum value for money from their purchasing arrangements for community care services and we agree with the Audit Commission that this includes making better use of the independent sector.

Mr. Allason: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the differences in the provision of respite care to (a) private sector homes in Devon and (b) the local authority's own residential homes. [31187]

Mr. Bowis: Centrally available information on adult short stay residents in residential care homes in Devon at 31 March 1995 and on short stay admissions during the year to 31 March 1995 is shown in the table.

Short-stay residents in and short-stay admissions to residential homes in Devon[1]

	Number of residents at 31 March 1995	Percentage of all residents	Number of admissions in year to 31 March1995	Percentage of all admissions
Local authority homes	225	61	5,860	76
Independent sector homes[2]	145	39	1,890	24
All homes	370	100	7,750	100

[1]"Short stay" includes short placement for assessment and other reasons as well as respite care.
[2]Private and voluntary sector residential care homes registered under the terms of the Registered Homes Act 1984.

Oral Contraceptives

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each year since 1990 the total number of suspected adverse reactions to combined oral contraceptives reported via the yellow card system and the number which were fatal. [26437]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 24 April 1996]: The information is shown in the table.

Suspected adverse reactions reported to the Committee on Safety of Medicines from 1990–1995 for oral contraceptives in the United Kingdom

Year	Total number of suspected adverse drug reaction reports where oral contraceptives are indicated as a suspect drug	Total number of suspected fatal[1] adverse drug reaction reports where oral contraceptives are indicated as a suspect drug
1990	285	12
1991	215	10

1993	137	14
1994	121	6
1995	232	21

[1] Reports where the fatality was associated directly or indirectly with the adverse reaction.
A report of a suspected adverse drug reaction does not necessarily mean that it was caused by the drug cited.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Polly Peck

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General what action is currently being taken by the Serious Fraud Office to investigate moneys stolen from Polly Peck plc for the purposes of political donations in the United Kingdom. [30666]

The Attorney-General: The role of the Serious Fraud Office is to investigate alleged serious or complex fraud.

Asil Nadir, formerly chairman of Polly Peck International plc, stands indicted before the central criminal court on 13 counts of theft involving over £33 million alleged to have been stolen from Polly Peck International plc. In May 1993 he absconded and a warrant was issued for his arrest.

The purposes for which moneys allegedly stolen are alleged to have been used are not directly relevant to the charges and are not the subject of current investigation by the SFO.

Amusement Machines

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Attorney-General what recent representations he has received on the operation of section 34 of the Gaming Act 1968. [30805]

The Attorney-General: I have received letters from 27 Members of Parliament, including the hon. Gentleman, requesting clarification of the Crown Prosecution Service's decision to seek leave to appeal to the House of Lords for a definitive ruling about the interpretation of section 34 of the Gaming Act 1968 in the case of R v. Burt and Adams Ltd. the HB Leisure case.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, columns 56–57, what was the size of the performance bond called in by the ODA; and what size of company it related to. [31225]

Mr. Hanley: The company had a contract partly funded by ODA, it went into receivership and the performance bond of £54,608 was called in by the overseas client.

The company no longer exists and no record of the company's size is available in ODA.

Bosnia

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports his Department has received from the World Health Organisation about the use the World Health Organisation made of the £300,000 which it received from the British Government for the physical rehabilitation programme in Bosnia; how much was used for prosthetics; and in which Bosnian medical institutions. [31120]

Mr. Hanley: The World Health Organisation has provided an interim report to my Department, dated 31 May 1996. As Finland had tied its contribution to the provision of prosthetics, WHO has chosen to use the ODA grant—originally expected to cover this area—elsewhere within its programme of co-ordinated physical rehabilitation activities. The grant will be used in 1996 to expand the programme within Bosnia (Banja Luka and Bihac), Serbia-Montenegro (western Baka), and Croatia (eastern Slavonia). The activities include training for professionals, rehabilitation, and the provision of equipment and supplies.

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is being taken by the British Government to work with the Bosnian Government to co-ordinate the work of voluntary and non-government organisations in Bosnia. [31121]

Mr. Hanley: We work with the Bosnian and other former Yugoslav Governments, non-government organisations and international agencies such as the United Nations High Commission for Refugees to identify needs and determine priorities. Because non-government organisations are independent, neither we nor the Bosnian Government are in a position to direct them, but co-ordination between and with them is achieved through practical liaison. Since 1992, the Government have provided more than £18 million for the work of voluntary, non-government organisations in former Yugoslavia.

Greenwich University

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what transfer of funds took place from the ODA to the university of Greenwich arising from the transfer of the scientific arm of the ODA to the university. [31193]

Mr. Hanley: There was no transfer of funds from ODA to Greenwich on completion of the sale agreement. There will be an adjustment to the nominal consideration paid by Greenwich based on the agreed level of net current assets at completion; this could result in a payment from the ODA to Greenwich or vice versa.

HIV-AIDS

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the United Kingdom's contribution to UN organisations has been used specifically for HIV-AIDS programmes for each year since 1991. [30227]

Mr. Hanley: Several UN systems agencies—including the World Health Organisation, UN Development Programme, UN Population Fund, UN Childrens' Fund, UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation, and, now, the UN AIDS programme—have, since 1991, implemented programmes that will benefit people at risk of, or affected by, HIV infection. The UK is an important contributor to all, except UNESCO. The data needed to calculate the proportion of these contributions used "specifically for HIV-AIDS programmes" are not currently available.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the United Kingdom's contribution to the European Commission has been used for HIV-AIDS specific activities for each year since 1991. [30226]

Mr. Hanley: Several directorates-general within the EC—including I, V, VIII and XII—have, since 1991, used funds with the specific intention of benefiting people at risk of, or affected by, HIV infection. The data needed to calculate the proportion of the UK's contribution used for these activities are not currently available.

Myanmar

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list, for each of the past five years, the (a) grant loans and (b) loans made available by his Department to Myanmar. [31279]

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my reply to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) on 20 December 1995, Official Report, column 1177. In 1990–91 and 1991–92—the years not covered by my earlier reply—UK bilateral aid to Burma amounted to £68,000 and £53,000 respectively. All UK bilateral assistance over the past five years has been on grant terms, largely for humanitarian aid.

Contraception Research

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many and what research projects to develop new methods of contraception were funded by the aid budget in (a) 1994 and (b) 1995; and for what period of time. [30459]

Mr. Hanley: None in 1994. In 1995, ODA and the Medical Research Council agreed support over a five-year period for a contraceptive development network focusing on the contraceptive effects of antigestogens for women and steriodal hormones for male contraception with the aim of developing promising new methods of contraception.

Sexual and Reproductive Health

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many and what research projects in the field of sexual and reproductive health were being funded by the aid budget in (a) 1994 and (b) 1995; and for what period of time. [30460]

Mr. Hanley: Twenty-three research projects were funded in 1994 and 24 in 1995. Details are as follows:

Methodologies for measuring maternal health in developing countries. April 1992–April 1995.

Hypertension and Eclampsia in Pregnancy. April 1994–March 1996.

Pelvic Inflammatory disease in slum women in Bombay. January 1993–December 1995.

Sexual awareness, life styles and related health needs of young, single female factory workers. April 1992–April 1995.

Socio-cultural determinants of induced abortion in developing countries. April 1992–April 1994.

The management of eclampsia-control trial of magnesium sulphate and diazepam to reduce maternal morbidity. June 1992–June 1995.

Reproductive Morbidity. April 1992–April 1995.

Study of induced abortion among urban poor. October 1992–October 1995.

Reproductive health beliefs among young women. June 1994–December 1994.

Impact and cost-effectiveness of focused perinatal health education for mothers on infant care, neonatal mortality and postnatal family planning practices. January 1994–January 1996.

Pilot study to explore and compare health seeking behaviour and socio-economic context in commercial sex workers and other women. May 1994–December 1994.

Menstrual health of adolescent girls. July 1994–July 1996.

Malaria and maternal anaemia—an intervention study in pregnancy. September 1994–September 1997.

The development of an appropriate approach to community based education in family planning. April 1994–1995.

Cervical cancer in developing countries. March 1993–March 1996.

Assessment of reproductive health needs of out of school adolescents. April 1992–April 1994.

HIV-AIDS study of selected economic aspects of adult illness. August 1990–March 1995.

Prevention of HIV-related tuberculosis. October 1992–October 1996.

Risk factors for mother-to-infant transmission of HIV-1. October 1993–December 1995.

Investigation of early diagnosis of HIV in children. April 1994–March 1996.

The Informal Economy of Health: Management of STDs and Paediatric Crisis by Women. November 1992–March 1996.

Collaborative study on effectiveness of HIV-AIDS work in developing countries by non-governmental organisation. November 1993–March 1996.

New tools for prioritising and evaluating safe motherhood programmes. December 1994–October 1996.

The social factors influencing the high rates of Caesarian section births. October 1995–February 1997.

Acceptability of barrier methods as a means to prevent reproductive tract infection. October 1995–October 1998.

A rational package of antenatal care: economic evaluation alongside a multi-centre randomised controlled trial. November 1995–November 1996.

Delivering cost-effective antenatal care in low and middle income countries. November 1995–February 1996.

Increasing the efficiency of antenatal care in identifying and referring women needing institutional deliveries. December 1995–December 1996.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Special Needs

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if she will list by local education authority the ratio of staff employed in a special educational needs capacity to pupils receiving special needs education; [30403]

(2) if she will list by local education authority the ratio of teaching assistants to qualified teaching staff employed in a special educational needs capacity. [30401]

Mrs. Gillan: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Callaghan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to introduce further incentives in the near future to encourage firms to employ an increased percentage of disabled workers. [30351]

Mr Paice: The Disability Discrimination Act 1995 will provide an effective legal framework for improving access to jobs, and participation in all aspects of work, for disabled people. The Secretary of State for Education and Employment intends to commence the employment provisions of the Act around the end of the year. Together with the practical schemes and services that the Government provide through the Employment Service and training and enterprise councils both for disabled people and for their employers, this will help to ensure that disabled people can make increased use of the available opportunities.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many registered disabled people are employed by her Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures. [30776]

Mr Paice: The number of registered disabled staff employed by the Department, including its agencies, was 1,597 at 1 April 1996. This was 3.69 per cent. of the total number of staff employed by the Department.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recent research she has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated regarding the educational attainments of ethnic minorities. [30448]

Mrs. Gillan: The Secretary of State has commissioned research studies which provide data on educational qualifications and labour market experiences of ethnic minority groups. These are:

(i) The youth cohort study.

(ii) The fourth national survey of ethnic minorities.

This and other relevant research brought to the Department's attention is reviewed as results become available.

Consultants

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list the contracts for consultancy work between (a) her Department and (b) training and enterprise councils and (i) Millbank Consultants Ltd., (ii) Paddington Consultancy Partnership Ltd., (iii) Mr. Neale Coleman, (iv) Mr. Stephen Hilditch and (v) Mr. Peter Bradley; and if she will indicate the total fees paid to (i) to (v). [30660]

Mr. Robin Squire: According to existing databases, the Department has not entered into any contracts with the consultants as named, either in its own right or in conjunction with any training and enterprise council. TECs are private companies and are not required to inform the Department of contracts that they enter into in their own right.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in her Department on 1 April. [30559]

Mr. Robin Squire: The table shows the number of full-time equivalent staff at 1 April 1996, including the Employment Service and the Teachers' Pensions Agency.

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what use her Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; which agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to her Department. [30574]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department for Education and Employment made no use of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95.

Careers Service

Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 600, what arrangements are in place for ensuring that the objectivity and impartiality of the careers service will be delivered; and what will be the involvement of (a) schools, (b) employers, (c) pupils and (d) parents. [31041]

Mr. Paice: I refer the hon. Member to the replies that I gave on 17 May 1996, Official Report, columns 599 and 600. The arrangements described there for quality assuring and inspecting careers services involve seeking the views of schools, employers, pupils and parents as appropriate. The arrangements are set out in the "Requirements and Guidance for Providers", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer 17 May, Official Report, column 599, what steps were taken to replace the input of the inspector with the possible conflict of interest; and what terms and conditions of service apply to his successor. [31045]

Mr. Paice: There is no longer a specific careers inspector post; therefore, the inspector has not been replaced.

Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the funding provided to the careers service will be protected and enhanced in areas where there is increased population; and how the targets set for the service reflect the needs of individuals. [31043]

Mr. Paice: Funding for careers service work is allocated to Government offices based on the number of young people in each region. Government offices then have the flexibility to negotiate funding with individual careers services, taking into account the number of young people in the area and other relevant local circumstances.

The targets agreed with each careers service include group advice sessions, individual interviews and action plans for young people. These targets reflect the key purpose of the careers service which is to provide objective advice that enables young people to make appropriate choices.

Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 7 May, Official Report, column 600, what plans her Department has to ensure that the careers service will cater for the needs of adults not in full–time education or part-time vocational education; and what is the timetable for the integration of adult guidance services with the careers service. [31042]

Mr. Paice: There are no plans to expand the existing statutory careers service client group. However, the consultation document on lifetime learning published in December 1995 highlights the importance of guidance. The Government will be responding to the consultation shortly.

Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 17 May, Official Report, column 599, if local education authorities' partners in the new careers service are companies; and what is their strategic operational role in the delivery of careers services. [31044]

Mr. Paice: The majority of new careers service companies have training and enterprise councils and local education authorities as major partners. A minority of careers service providers are other types of company with a major interest in guidance training and education. Additionally, the prospectus inviting bids to provide a careers service seeks clear proposals from bidders for achieving and maintaining the confidence, trust and support of key customers and stakeholders, including LEAs. The Secretary of State's "Requirements and Guidance for Providers" states that careers services must be able to demonstrate responsiveness to local community needs, including clients, local employers, local authorities, and education and training providers.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Kilfoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many foreign nationals have been given awards under the assisted places scheme. [30989]

Mrs. Gillan: Information about the nationality of children holding assisted places is not collected centrally. The number of foreign nationals is likely to be small. To be eligible for an assisted place, a child must have been ordinarily resident in the British Islands or, if a national of a country in the European Economic Area and a child of a migrant worker, in an EEA country, for two calendar years before taking up the place, unless of a refugee granted exceptional leave to enter or remain in the British Islands.

Benefits

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what statistics the Employment Service is required to keep on decisions relating to persons suspended from benefit for not actively seeking work. [31254]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mike Fogden to Mr. Clive Soley, dated 4 June 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question about what statistics the Employment Service Agency is required to keep on decisions relating to persons suspended from benefit for not actively seeking work.

The actively seeking employment condition was introduced in the 1989 Social Security Act. Information on the number of decisions and disallowances issued to Unemployment Benefit claimants, including those in respect of the definition of actively seeking work, is contained in the quarterly summary entitled "Analysis of Adjudication Officers' Decisions", copies of which are held in the Library of the House. This information is available from 1 October 1989, when the actively seeking work condition was introduced, to the quarter ending March 1996.

Decisions to disallow Income Support claims because of failure to satisfy the actively seeking work condition are given by Adjudication Officers in the Benefits Agency of the Department of Social Security. Therefore, we do not hold information about the number of these disallowances.

I hope this is helpful.

Ethnic Minority Pupils

Ms Estelle Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what steps her Department is taking to ensure that additional resources allocated to reducing disruptive behaviour in schools will address the problems of excluded children from ethnic minorities; [31082]

(2) what steps her Department is taking to reduce the number of ethnic minority children among those excluded from school; [31071]

(3) what plans her Department has to discuss with the Commission for Racial Equality the proportion of children from ethnic minorities among those excluded from school; [31072]

(4) what action her Department plans to take based on the data available to it regarding the number of ethnic minority children among those excluded from school. [31073]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department's guidance on exclusions, which was issued to all schools in May 1994, emphasises that disciplinary procedures should be applied objectively and consistently across all cultural groups and reminds head teachers that failure to do so could constitute unlawful racial discrimination under the Race Relations Act 1976.

The aim of reducing the number of ethnic minority pupils who are excluded is an important element in a number of the projects the Department is supporting under our 18 million programme of grants over the next three years to help schools tackle behaviour and discipline problems.

This Department is currently analysing data collected from schools on permanent exclusions in the 1994–95 school year, including, for the first time, information on the ethnic origin of permanently excluded pupils. Aggregate data will be available in the early autumn. My right hon. Friend will consider whether action needs to be taken in the light of that information and consultations with interested bodies.

Vandalism

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the annual cost of vandalism in the Bolton area, in each of the last 10 years; of that what amount can be attributed to arson; how many incidents of arson there have been in each year; and if he will make a statement. [31160]

Mr. Robin Squire: This information is not held centrally.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to her answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 11, how many (a) unconditional on-demand bonds, (b) performance bonds, (c) parent company guarantees, (d) advance payment bonds and (e) retention bonds were required by her Department in the last five years. [31234]

Mr. Robin Squire: According to existing databases the Department has required one performance bond (b) and one parent company guarantee (c).

Computers in Schools

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to promote an increase in the availability of computers in schools before the next general election. [31057]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department is continuing to promote the availability of computers in schools through its programme of grants for education support and training and by other means.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what schemes have been put in place since 1992 to ensure that each child (a) has had access to a computer and (b) is computer literate by the time he or she leaves school. [31059]

Mr. Squire: The Department has continued to support the development of pupils' information technology skills in a number of ways. These include the establishment of IT as a separate subject within the national curriculum; the programme of grants for education support and training which supports the purchase of computer hardware, software and teacher training in IT; and support for the work of the National Council for Educational Technology.

Internet

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what schemes she has established to promote access to the Internet in schools. [31058]

Mr. Robin Squire: The Government published in November 1995 their statement of policy on the development of networked communications in education. "Superhighways for Education: The Way Forward", a copy of which is in the Library, identifies the national priorities and sets out the action to which the Government are committed. This includes support and encouragement for the piloting of new communications technologies in education, and ensuring that advice on the use of these technologies is made available through appropriate bodies. The paper announced an innovative programme of pilot projects, including several piloting the use of the Internet, which the Department is evaluating. The Department is also supporting two parallel projects. One will evaluate the benefit of educational Internet services; the other will assess the development of a virtual languages centre on the Internet. Advice and guidance for schools on networking and the use of the Internet is available from the National Council for Educational Technology.

SCOTLAND

Ministerial Visits

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the cost to public funds of the visit by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to Innerleithen, Tweeddale, on 26 April; what was the purpose of the visit; and what is the policy of Scottish Office Ministers in respect of notifying right hon. and hon. Members of visits to their constituencies. [28063]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for industry and local government visited Peebles and Innerleithen in the right hon. Member's constituency on 25 April, not 26 April. He visited Clough Mill Ltd., Waverley Mills, Innerleithen with the chairman of Scottish Borders Enterprise as one of a number of engagements in the area. The cost of this element of the day's programme cannot be separately identified. My hon. Friend wrote to the right hon. Member on 26 March, as is the normal practice, to inform him that he would be carrying out ministerial engagements in his constituency; this particular engagement was added to the original programme at a late stage.

Victoria Infirmary, Glasgow

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what meetings outside trust premises have been held between private companies tendering for the support services at the Victoria infirmary in Glasgow and staff who work for the Victoria infirmary trust; if the trust board was informed of such meetings; and what action the board has taken about them. [30132]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The question concerns specific operational matters on which the chief executive of the trust is best placed to provide answers. Accordingly the hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Small for details.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what opportunity was available to staff at the Victoria infirmary in Glasgow to make an in-house bid for the support services recently put out to competitive tender; if he will list those in attendance at the meeting where staff were informed of that opportunity; and if he will place in the Library (a) a copy of the minutes of the meeting and (b) all correspondence between the trust board and those private companies which indicated an interest in tendering for the services. [30131]

Lord James Douglas Hamilton: I understand from the Victoria Infirmary NHS trust that, in addition to placing an advertisement in the Official Journal of the European Communities, a number of open meetings were held with staff to announce the trust's intention to invite tenders for specific contracts and to confirm that there was a potential for making an in-house bid. No record of staff who attended these open meetings was made, nor were minutes or notes taken. Correspondence between the trust and the private organisations expressing interest in this tender exercise is a matter of commercial confidence.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list, for each of his Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30121]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: For the period 1 April 1992 to 31 March 1996, the activities listed below have been reviewed under my competing for quality programme. Market testing is one of three main outcomes from competing for quality reviews. The others—strategic contracting out and internal restructuring—are also listed.

Retex

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to make dependency on textiles a deciding factor when calculating levels of additional resources under the EU RETEX initiative; and if he will make special provision for the borders region. [30673]

Mr. Kynoch: Textile dependency as set out in article 6 of the Commission's guidelines as decided on 13 May 1992 (Official Journal number C 142, 4 June 1992), already determines eligibility for funding under RETEX, and additional resources will be allocated between UK eligible areas, including border region, on the same basis as the original allocation.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list (a) the number of (i) males and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30550]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of male and female staff in each of the principal and administrative grades, and the percentage of these that are women are shown in the table.

Inverclyde Enterprise Zone

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs have been created as a result of the establishment of the Inverclyde enterprise zone; in which industries such employment has been found; what is the sex ratio of the employed; and if he will make a statement. [30175]

Mr. Kynoch: As at 31 March 1995, 2,245 jobs had been created within the Inverclyde enterprise zone. Of these, 1,669 were in manufacturing industry and the remaining 576 in other activities ranging from construction work to catering. Information is not available to distinguish between male and female employment.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many designated sites of the Inverclyde enterprise zone are still awaiting industrial development; and if he will make a statement. [30176]

Mr. Kynoch: Four of the 13 designated sites within the Inverclyde enterprise zone do not, at present, have any enterprise zone activity.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the companies which have established industrial and commercial units in the designated sites of the Inverclyde enterprise zone; how many full-time employees they have recruited since commencing business in the zone; and if he will make a statement. [30177]

Mr. Kynoch: The table contains the names of companies and details of the sites in which they were located within the enterprise zone as at September 1994, the most recent date for which this information is available. Monitoring information compiled for the Department of Environment indicates that, by March 1995, 33 industrial and commercial establishments, employing a total of 2,245 people, were located on designated enterprise zone sites. No information is available on the number of full-time employees recruited since these companies commenced business in the zone.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to modify the regulations governing the designation of sites in the Inverclyde enterprise zone; and if he will make a statement. [30178]

Mr. Kynoch: My right hon. Friend has no plans to modify the regulations governing the designation of sites in the Inverclyde enterprise zone.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Inverclyde enterprise zone is due to cease to exist; what proposals he has to extend its existence; and if he will make a statement. [30179]

Mr. Kynoch: Inverclyde enterprise zone will cease to exist on 2 March 1999 after 10 years of enterprise zone designation. My right hon. Friend has no plans to extend its existence.

Gourock Ropeworks

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received concerning the demolition or retention of the Gourock ropeworks of Port Glasgow; and if he will make a statement. [30180]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has received no recent representations regarding the Gourock ropeworks. An application for listed building consent to demolish the building has been received by Historic Scotland and is under consideration. A decision on whether my right hon. Friend will call the application in for his own determination will be taken soon.

Greenock Sheriff Court

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what was the total cost of the renovation of the Greenock sheriff court; and if he will make a statement; [30182]

(2) on how many occasions proceedings at the Greenock sheriff court have been postponed in the past two years; what were the reasons for such postponements; and if he will make a statement; [30183]

(3) what has been the total cost of remedial work carried out to the structure, heating system, water supply and other facilities and services at the Greenock sheriff court following its re-opening on the completion of the renovation programme; and if he will make a statement. [30184]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The total cost of the renovation of Greenock sheriff court, including the temporary outhousing of the court while work was proceeding, was £4,032,000, inclusive of professional fees and VAT. The work involved rot eradication, stonework repairs and extensive internal refurbishment. Subsequent to the renovation, parts of the external drainage system were replaced at an inclusive cost of £56,500.

The courthouse was reopened on 8 August 1994. On two occasions during the winter of 1995, business was adjourned at 10am following difficulties with the heating system. On 3 and 9 May 1996, business was adjourned at 10am and on 13 May 1996 business was adjourned at noon; each of these adjournments was a result of problems with the incoming water main. On each occasion, the courthouse was open for business the next working day.

The causes of the problems experienced at the court and the allocation of costs for remedial action are still the subject of discussion between the Scottish Court Service and its contractors and consultants.

Fixed Penalties

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many charges of breach of the peace have been dealt with by way of fixed penalty by the procurator fiscal at Kilmarnock in the past 12 months; and how many of these have involved criminal injuries. [31068]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am advised by my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate that, during the period from 1 May 1995 to 23 May 1996, the procurator fiscal at Kilmarnock issued 198 fixed penalty notices in respect of charges of breach of the peace. The procurator fiscal does not have information available to him to indicate how many, if any, of such cases resulted in awards by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Agency. As to whether personal injury was involved in any of the cases, this information is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. In general, it is unusual for a breach of the peace charge to involve personal injury to any party.

Computerised Tomography Scanners

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the hospitals that have CT scanners; and if he will make a statement. [31157]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are 28 CT scanners in the following NHS hospitals in Scotland:

Hospitals	CT Scanner
Aberdeen royal infirmary	2
Western infirmary, Glasgow	1
Glasgow royal infirmary	1
Royal infirmary, Edinburgh	2

Sheriffs

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average cost saving achieved per day through the use of a temporary instead of a full-time permanent sheriff in Scotland. [25470]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 April 1996]: Temporary sheriffs provide cover for the absences of permanent sheriffs and more generally offer a useful element of flexibility in the handling of court business.

Temporary sheriffs are paid a daily rate of £282 plus travel and subsistence expenses. The daily rate for a permanent sheriff, based on working 220 days per annum is £345.

Information Directorate

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the cost to date of media monitoring carried out on behalf of the information directorate; and if he will make a statement. [25489]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 16 April 1996]: The contract for media monitoring was awarded on the basis of a competitive tendering exercise. The actual cost of the contract is a matter of commercial confidence.

Animal Foodstuffs

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the current means of ensuring prohibited foodstuffs are kept out of the foodchain; what assessment he has made of their effectiveness; and what criteria he adopts to assess their effectiveness. [29914]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson [holding answer 17 May 1996]: It is a statutory requirement that cattle organs prohibited from human consumption—those which could potentially contain the BSE agent (the head including the brain but not the tongue, the spinal chord, spleen, thymus, tonsils and intestine)—are removed from carcases in the abattoir and stained with a distinctive dye. Such material is then rendered and disposed of at licensed landfill sites. Compliance with this requirement is supervised by the Meat Hygiene Service, an executive agency of the Great Britain agriculture Departments. The State Veterinary Service monitors the effectiveness of those operations on a regular basis to ensure that the statutory controls are being complied with.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the test for mammalian feed in animal foodstuff will be made available for public analyst services and protective services departments of local authorities. [29916]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 17 May 1996]: The ELISA test used for the detection of mammalian protein in animal feed is currently not available for use in other laboratories. The purification process for the preparation of samples prior to test has been patented and is available. For the immunological test, however, because of the difficulties experienced with validation and the limited stocks of antisera currently available, it is not possible to make the test more widely available. Nevertheless, materials can be submitted to MAFF for testing at the one veterinary investigation centre that is currently equipped to carry out the test, subject to available capacity.

Commercially available ELISA kits were tested with a view to assisting other laboratories to introduce testing, but these proved not to be sufficiently consistent in sensitivity, specifically for use for statutory purposes.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what trials have been conducted by his Department regarding the test for mammalian feed in animal foodstuff; and when these trials began. [29915]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 17 May 1996]: During validation of the test on samples collected on farms in Great Britain by the State Veterinary Service, a total of 1,577 samples were analysed between June 1994 and January 1996.

National Health Service Trusts

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes and additions to the list of chairpersons and non-executive directors of NHS trusts in Scotland have occurred since 25 January 1993 and what are the current levels of annual remuneration. [27049]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 2 May 1996]: The information requested by the hon. Member has been placed in the Library of the House of Commons.

ENVIRONMENT

Landlords

9. Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to encourage small landlords. [29780]

Mr. Clappison: The Housing Bill includes provisions to encourage landlords into the private lettings market.

Standard Spending Assessments

15. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received about the current year's standard spending assessments; and if he will make a statement. [29786]

Sir Paul Beresford: We have received a number of representations from local authorities and their associations. Proposals for change are examined with the local authority associations.

Packaging Waste

16. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to publish the Government's proposals under the European directive on packaging waste. [29787]

Mr. Clappison: Shortly.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the provision of a conscience clause in the draft regulations, now being prepared by his Department, under the Environment Act 1995, concerning the shared legal obligations and recovery in recycling of packaging waste; and if he will make a statement. [30646]

Mr. Clappison: I and colleagues are fully aware of concerns that the regulations which we are presently preparing on producer responsibility for packaging waste should not compel businesses to join a scheme if, for whatever reason, they do not wish to do so. I can offer a full reassurance on this matter. There will be two routes for businesses obliged under the regulations to discharge their obligation. They will be free to discharge it alone, or by joining a collective scheme. One of the central provisions of the enabling legislation was that the individual route should be a valid option for an individual business and this will be fully reflected in the regulations. This should become clear when the draft regulations are issued for consultation.

Water (London)

18. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State of the Environment if he will make a statement about water supplies in London. [29789]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Most of London receives its public water supplies from Thames Water, although some of the outer London boroughs are supplied by Three Valleys Water, Essex and Suffolk Water, Sutton and East Surrey Water or North Surrey Water. The quality of the public water supply is very high. The Environment Agency's recent report to my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, published on 1 May, states that water resource problems are not expected in the Thames Water and North Surrey Water areas this summer, whatever the weather. In the other companies' areas, no restrictions are anticipated given a normal summer although hosepipe and inessential use bans may possibly become necessary in parts of these areas if the summer is very hot and dry.

"This Common Inheritance"

19. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further measures he proposes to introduce over the next year by way of advancing the objectives set out in the White Paper "This Common Inheritance". [29790]

Mr. Clappison: We published the latest "This Common Inheritance" annual report on 26 March. This sets out what we propose to do over the next year to meet our objectives for sustainable development and the environment. Copies of the report were placed in the Library.

Water Pollution

20. Mr. Ronnie Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received regarding water pollution. [29791]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: We have received representations on various aspects of water pollution, including in respect of the very considerable improvements in the quality of our rivers that have been achieved in recent years.

Local Government Finance

21. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to give councils the powers to set their own spending limits. [29792]

Sir Paul Beresford: We will soon begin to consider the details of the next year's local government finance settlement, including capping. Once we have reached decisions on the local government settlement for next year, they will be announced in the normal way.

Elderly Person's Accommodation

22. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the support he makes available for local authorities to upgrade facilities for elderly persons' accommodation. [29794]

Mr. Clappison: Local authority housing investment programme allocations total over £1.2 billion for 1996–97. Local authorities also use resources from revenue and useable capital receipts for capital expenditure on housing. In 1995–96, this totalled £1.1 billion. It is up to local authorities to use these resources efficiently and effectively to address their local housing needs, including those of the elderly.

Council Tax

24. Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of local authority expenditure is met by the council tax in (a) Hyndburn borough council and (b) Westminster city council. [29796]

Sir Paul Beresford: The proportion of local authority expenditure funded by council tax depends largely on where an authority sets it budget in relation to its standard spending assessment.

Hyndburn borough council has set a budget in 1996–97 which is 28.4 per cent. above its SSA, so the proportion of expenditure funded by council tax is 41.5 per cent. while Westminster city council has set a budget which is 12.7 per cent. below its SSA, so its proportion is 14.2 per cent.

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of local authority expenditure council tax constitutes in (a) Nottingham and (b) Westminster. [30535]

Sir Paul Beresford: The proportion of local authority expenditure funded by council tax depends largely on where an authority sets its budget in relation to its standard spending assessment.

Nottingham city council has set a budget in 1996–97 which is 10.9 per cent. above its SSA, so the proportion of expenditure funded by council tax is 28.7 per cent., while Westminster city council has set a budget which is 12.7 per cent. below its SSA, so its proportion is 14.2 per cent.

Planning Appeals

26. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has received from planning authorities to his new proposals for planning appeals; and if he will make a statement. [29798]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Responses to the Department's recent draft circular on planning appeal procedures have been received from the main local authority associations in England and from nine local planning authorities. Responses have also been received from around 80 other organisations.

Noisy Neighbour Prosecutions

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how may (a) successful and (b) unsuccessful noisy neighbour prosecutions have been brought in (i) the London borough of Ealing and (ii) other London boroughs in each of the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [30662]

Mr. Clappison: Comprehensive details are not available. The tables set out the readily available information:

(1) 1991–92 to 1993–94 (based on responses to surveys by the Chartered Institute of Environmental Health and information from the London borough of Ealing)

Year	Number of London boroughs	Number of prosecutions[1,4] (of which are Ealing)	Number of convictions[1,4] (of which are Ealing)
1991–92	18	113(11)	93(11)
1992–93	20	106(13)	101(12)
1993–94	18	154(24)	131(22)

(2) 1994–95 to 1995–96 (based on information from the London Borough of Ealing)

Year	Number of prosecutions[1,4]	Number of convictions[1,4]
1994–95	13[2]	10[2]
1995–96	25[3]	24[3]

[1] Prosecutions and convictions under section 80 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 relating to noise from domestic premises.

[2] A further three successful prosecutions were brought under section 23 of the London Local Authorities Act 1991 relating to domestic intruder alarms.

[3] A further six successful prosecutions were brought under section 23 of the London Local Authorities Act 1991 relating to domestic intruder alarms.

[4] Some prosecutions and convictions may relate to complaints in previous years.

Air Pollution

23. Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what new proposals he has to reduce air pollution. [29795]

Mr. Clappison: The Government will be publishing a consultation draft of a national air quality strategy this summer, as required by the Environment Act 1995. It will include air quality standards and objectives, and set out the measures required to meet those objectives.

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; what agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30563]

Sir Paul Beresford: None.

Tree Planting

25. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to continue and expand initiatives to encourage tree planting in towns and the countryside. [29797]

Mr. Clappison: In the recent White Paper, "Rural England", we said that the Government would like to see a doubling of the woodland in England over the next half century. To this end we support directly the national forest in the east midlands and the 12 community forests. In addition to the £35 million the Forestry Commission will provide in forestry grants this year, Government-funded regeneration grants and agri-environment schemes can also support tree planting. My Department has spent over £1 million since 1992 on research into more cost effective tree planting and management methods.

In 1995 my Department established the national urban forestry unit to promote good practice in the planting and management of trees and woodlands in urban areas. The unit will work in partnership with local authorities, groundwork trusts, English Partnerships and other public, private and voluntary sector interests. Urban forestry will be an important element of the greening the city initiative which I launched last October. This initiative is drawing together information, experience and expertise on the greening of our towns and cities and we will make this available as a good practice guide, to be launched at a national conference in the autumn. We are also assisting local authorities to develop tree strategies for their areas and to encourage the planting of trees when land is developed.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30547]

Sir Paul Beresford: The following information covers non-industrial staff in my Department as at 1 April 1996:

Consultants

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the (a) contracts with and (b) work carried out for (i) his Department, (ii) its agencies, (iii) development corporations and (iv) housing action trusts by (1) Paddington Consultancy Partnership Ltd. or its directors, (2) Millbank Consultants, (3) Mr. Neale Coleman, (4) Mr. Stephen Hilditch and (5) Mr. Peter Bradley; and if he will indicate the total fees paid to (1) to (5). [30661]

Sir Paul Beresford: Stonebridge housing action trust currently has a contract with Paddington Consultancy Partnership Ltd. to advise on the market test of its housing management function and to assist with the tender process. The contract was tendered competitively and is worth £42,350 including VAT.

Right to Buy

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many dwellings have been bought under (a) the right-to-buy and (b) the rent-to-mortgage schemes; and if he will make a statement. [30042]

Mr. Clappison: Between the introduction of right-to-buy legislation in October 1980 and the end of December 1995, local authorities and new towns in England reported total sales under RTB of 1.25 million homes. In the same period, housing associations reported right-to-buy sales of 28,000.

Between the introduction of the rent-to-mortgage scheme in October 1993, and the end of December 1995, there have been 16 completed sales.

Water Leakages

Mr. Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much of the domestic water supply was lost in leakage and what was the shortfall in supply last year; and what estimate he has made of the shortages in summer 1996. [29777]

Mr. Clappison: Leakage figures for the year 1995–96 are not yet available. For 1994–95 about 30 per cent. of the water put into the domestic supply system was lost due to leakage, including leakages from customers' supply pipes.

There were no supply cuts last year despite one of the hottest and driest summers for over 200 years. The Environment Agency has confirmed in its recent report to my right hon. Friend on the water resource and supply situation for this summer, that, although there is no room for complacency, the measures water companies are taking should be sufficient to enable essential supplies to be maintained in all areas even through a hot, dry summer.

Highways Maintenance, Lincolnshire

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what consultations he had with those delivering services and those involved in taking the decision to award the contract before ordering Lincolnshire county council to re-tender its highways maintenance contract; [30581]

(2) what assessment he has made of the recommendations by Touche Ross in respect of the tendering of the highways maintenance contract by Lincolnshire county council. [30582]

Sir Paul Beresford: Following a complaint from the Federation of Civil Engineering Contractors, officials of the Department undertook an investigation of the way in which Lincolnshire county council decided to carry out highways maintenance work. In considering the authority's response to a notice served on it, my right hon. Friend took account of the authority's possible externalisation of the work, but decided to give a direction as it appeared to him that the authority had acted anti-competitively. Since then, officials have met officers of the authority, and discussed externalisation plans, including the Touche Ross report. The authority has been told that when its externalisation plans are firm, the Secretary of State will consider any request it might make to carry the direction so that it does not cut across those plans. Ministers and officials have regular meetings with the FCEC to discuss the ability of the private sector to undertake highway work.

Repossessions

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to collate figures on repossession by region. [30757]

Mr. Clappison: The Government do not collect figures on repossessions. These figures are collected by the Council of Mortgage Lenders and are not available by region.

Fisheries Service

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what responsibility his Department has for the funding of the fisheries service. [31007]

Mr. Clappison: None.

House Prices

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average house price in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands in each year since 1990; and if he will express the figures (i) as a percentage change on the previous year and (ii) as a percentage change on 1990. [30754]

Mr. Clappison: Figures for the west midlands region are as follows:

	Average house price			Mix adjusted house price index
	Average price £	Annual percentage change	Percentage change on 1990	Annual percentage change	Percentage change on 1990
1990	54,700	10	n/a	2	n/a
1991	58,500	7	7	0	0
1992	57,900	–1	6	–3	–3
1993	58,300	1	7	–1	–4
1994	59,100	1	8	1	–4
1995	60,500	2	11	–1	–4

Source:
Department of the Environment, Survey of Mortgage Lenders (5 per cent. sample of mortgage completions).

The figures in the first three columns of the table show changes in the prices of a sample of properties sold in each year without adjustment for changes in the mix of properties sold. The Department's mix adjusted house price index included in the fourth and fifth columns overcomes this limitation.

Reliable figures of average house prices for Coventry are unavailable.

House Building, Lancaster

Sir Mark Lennox-Boyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what body is responsible for determining the Lancaster target of 8,300 new homes in the period 1991 to 1996 as set out in the Lancashire structure plan. [30794]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Lancashire county council is responsible for preparing the Lancashire structure plan. Lancaster city council was involved in the wide consultation process which took place.

Homelessness

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people are homeless in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands. [30755]

Mr. Clappison: Local authorities in England report to my Department, on their quarterly P1E return, the number of households for whom they accept responsibility to secure accommodation under the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act 1985.

The latest estimate for the west midlands appears in table 2 of "Households found accommodation under the homelessness provisions of the 1985 Housing Act 1985: England. Statistics for the fourth quarter of 1995".

The latest reported figure for Coventry appears in the associated supplementary table.

House Sales

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many house sales there were in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands in each year since 1990; and if he will express the figures (i) as a percentage change on the previous year and (ii) as a percentage change on 1990. [30756]

Mr. Clappison: Information for the west midlands region is as follows:

	Number of residential transactions	Annual percentage charge	Percentage change on 1990
1990	125,000	–13	n/a
1991	119,000	–5	–5
1992	91,000	–24	–27
1993	97,000	7	–22
1994	109,000	12	–13
1995[1]	98,000	–10	–22

Educational Needs Funding

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the decision was made to ignore the change in income support claimants since 1994–95 in respect of the additional educational needs index weighting within the education standard spending assessment for 1996–97; and if he will list for each local education authority the effect on the funding for additional educational needs if the change in income support claimants since 1994–95 had been taken into account. [30810]

Sir Paul Beresford: Final decisions on the distribution of standard spending assessments for 1996–97 were taken during January this year, following consultation with the local authority associations and the consideration of representations from local authorities.

The table shows the effect on the education block of SSAs of using numbers of income support claimants since 1994–95 in place of the numbers actually used in SSAs for 1996–97.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures. [30771]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Department currently employs a total of 91 disabled people of whom 60 are registered and 31 are non-registered. This constitutes 2 per cent. of the total number of staff employed in the Department and its agencies.

Gloucestershire County Council

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the debt figure for Gloucestershire county council for each of the last 10 years. [30799]

Mr. Paul Beresford: The information for Gloucestershire county council is as follows:

Outstanding debt at end of financial year[1]

	£ million
1985–86	45.9
1986–87	53.4
1987–88	66.8
1988–89	92.4
1989–90	104.4
1990–91	121.1
1991–92	124.5
1992–93	129.9
1993–94	136.3
1994–95	150.8

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, columns 44–45, how many (a) unconditional on-demand bonds, (b) performance bonds, (c) parent company guarantees, (d) advance payment bonds and (e) retention bonds were required by his Department in the last five years. [31230]

Sir Paul Beresford: The information requested is not held centrally and is available only at disproportionate cost.

Alport Dale

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding Forest Enterprise's proposals for Alport dale in the Peak District national park. [31158]

Mr. Clappison: We have received 11 representations concerning Forest Enterprise's harvesting and replanting proposals for Alport dale, including one petition.

Mrs. Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will intervene to prevent the extension of forestry plantation in Alport dale in the Peak District national park. [31159]

Mr. Clappison: I understand there are no plans to extend the woodlands at Alport dale.

Water Additives

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what reports he has received from the drinking water inspectorate on the addition of aluminium sulphate to remove discolouration from drinking water supplies. [31137]

Mr. Clappison: The drinking water inspectorate has made no reports about the use of aluminium sulphate in drinking water treatment.

Aluminium compounds have long been established in most parts of the world as coagulants in water treatment and their use is considered unobjectional on health grounds.

Smoke Control

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many fuels are now authorised to be burnt in smoke-controlled areas. [31107]

Mr. Clappison: There are currently 47 fuels authorised for use in smoke control areas by the Smoke Control Areas (Authorised Fuels) Regulations 1991 and by subsequent amendments.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to deregulate smoke control legislation. [31104]

Mr. Clappison: As announced in "Cutting Red Tape" in January 1994, the Government intend to repeal certain sections of the Clean Air Act 1993, including section 4 which enables local authorities to approve the design and installation of industrial furnaces in order to ensure smokeless operation. These are no longer necessary in light of changes in fuel use and the provisions of the Environment Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many fuels currently on the market cannot be burnt in smoke controlled areas. [31105]

Mr. Clappison: The Department does not maintain a list of all such fuels. The use of a fuel, other than one authorised by the Secretary of State in the Smoke Control Areas (Authorised Fuels) Regulations 1991 and subsequent amendments, may constitute an offence under the Clean Air Act 1993. Some unauthorised fuel, such as coal and wood, may be used in smoke control areas when burnt in fireplaces exempted by order of the Secretary of State.

Waste Management, Plymouth

Mr. Jamieson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authority will be responsible for all aspects of waste management after unitary status is granted to Plymouth. [31101]

Mr. Clappison: Once a shire district has become a unitary authority, it is both waste collection authority and waste disposal authority for its area. Waste regulation, however, is not a local authority function; instead it is exercised by the Environment Agency.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about local government auditors in Lancashire. [29773]

Mr. Curry: I have had no such representations, although we receive representations about a range of audit issues in Lancashire, as in other parts of the country.

Song Birds

Mr. Lord: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies he is carrying out into song bird conservation and sparrowhawk predation; and if he will make a statement. [31194]

Mr. Clappison: The nature conservation agencies are participating in a number of studies and action plans related to the conservation of a variety of song bird, and other, species. Contracts with the British Trust for Ornithology support the breeding bird survey, common bird census, nest record card system, and the constant effort ringing scheme—which assesses annual productivity and survival. No specific work is presently being funded into predation by sparrowhawks. Earlier studies have indicated that this is not a significant factor causing decline in national song bird populations.

Fluoroaceteamid

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further research has been undertaken since 24 October 1995 into the use of the pesticide fluoroaceteamid on farming land in Kent in 1963 and the subsequent removal of contaminated soil from the farm. [29484]

Mr. Clappison [holding answer 14 May 1996]: None.

Concessionary Travel

Sir Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the cost of complying with the Atkins v. Wrekin district council and Department of Transport decision by the advocate general of the European Court of Justice (a) in the current financial year, (b) in future years and (c) for each year between 1984 and 1995. [30134]

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply.

I refer to the reply by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 16 May, Official Report, columns 571–72.

TRANSPORT

Concessionary Travel

Sir Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to amend the London Regional Transport Act 1984 and Transport Act 1985 to include men aged 60 years or over as a further eligible class of person for transport concessions following the Atkins v. Wrekin district council and Department of Transport case considered by the European Court. [30026]

Mr. Norris: I refer to my reply to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 10 May, Official Report, column 275.

Sir Andrew Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) in what circumstances men aged 60 to 65 years since December 1984 will be able to claim compensation from their local authority as a result of the Atkins v. Wrekin district council and Department of Transport case considered by the European Court; [30025]

(2) if he will estimate the cost of complying with the Atkins v. Wrekin district council and Department of Transport case decision by the advocate general of the European Court of Justice (a) in the current financial year, (b) in future years and (c) for each year between 1984 and 1995. [30134]

Mr. Norris: I have been asked to reply.

I refer to the reply by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office to the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) on 16 May, Official Report columns 571–72.

Oil Pollution

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total cost to public funds in 1995 of treating oil pollution at coastal resorts. [30205]

Mr. Norris: No costs were incurred by central Government in 1995 on the treatment of oil pollution at coastal resorts. Information on local authority expenditure on oil pollution response activities is not collected centrally.

Airworthiness

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what advice in relation to airworthiness safety is provided by the Civil Aviation Authority to the Jamaican Government. [30492]

Mr. Norris: The Civil Aviation Authority contract with the Government of Jamaica lists the general airworthiness matters on which it shall advise in a two-page technical appendix. A copy has been placed in the Library.

Heavy Vehicle Licensing

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list those vehicles exempt from goods vehicle operator licensing regulations and the reasons for exemption. [30471]

Mr. Norris: The classes of vehicle for which a heavy goods vehicle operator licence is not required are listed in schedule 3 of the Goods Vehicles (Licensing of Operators) Regulations 1995.

There is a variety of reasons for the exemptions but, generally, it is either because the vehicles are not widely used on public roads and are not therefore a significant road safety hazard, or because they do not carry goods commercially. We are currently carrying out a review of these exemptions.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each of the last five years the total income generated by (a) the heavy goods vehicle operator licensing fee, (b) the public service vehicle operator licensing fee and (c) bus registration fees. [30461]

Mr. Norris: The figures are:

Year	HGV operator licencing	PSV operator licensing	Bus registration
1991–92	14,588,537	2,819,169	673,826
1992–93	15,424,930	2,561,242	633,550
1993–94	19,093,817	5,487,195	668,594
1994–95	21,442,222	3,855,768	779,667
1995–96	26,751,672	4,834,615	720,712

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to introduce legislation relating to the impounding of illegally operated vehicles; and if he will make a statement. [30489]

Mr. Norris: We are currently considering possible schemes for the impounding of illegally operated heavy goods vehicles.

Traffic Area Offices

Mrs Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each of the last five years the total running cost budgets for (a) the Vehicle Inspectorate's enforcement activities and (b) the traffic area office network. [30462]

Mr. Norris: (a) The budgets agreed with the Vehicle Inspectorate for its enforcement activity in respect of heavy goods and public service vehicle were as follows:

Total HGV and PSV traffic and roadworthiness enforcement budgets including operator licence support work

Year	£ million
1991–92	13.492
1992–93	13.651
1993–94	13.230
1994–95	13.109
1995–96	13.344

(b) The traffic area network running costs budgets were:

	£ million
1991–92	11.360
1992–93	12.385
1993–94	13.045
1994–95	11.754
1995–96	11.125

Roadside Checks

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list by police force area the number of roadside checks undertaken by the Vehicle Inspectorate which have had to be cancelled over the last 12 months due to lack of police resources. [30490]

Mr. Norris: I have asked the chief executive of the Vehicle Inspectorate to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ron Oliver to Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, dated 4 June 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question on the number of roadside checks cancelled due to lack of police resources.

The information requested was not collected prior to 1 October 1995.

However, out of a total of 2113 roadchecks carried out, the number cancelled by police during the period 1 October 1995 to 31 March 1996—by police force area—was as follows:

	Number of roadchecks
Staffordshire	3
Kent	14
Lincolnshire	5
West Yorkshire	3
South Yorkshire	1
North Yorkshire	3
Devon and Cornwall	3
Dorset	1
Thames Valley	7
Sussex	3
Surrey	4

Large Goods Vehicle Licences (Exemptions)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the reasons for the prohibition of people with diabetes subject to insulin treatment from holding a large goods vehicle driver's licence. [30538]

Mr. Norris: The prohibition is based on authoritative medical advice about the risk of a hypoglycaemic attack, which may occur suddenly and unpredictably and can cause loss of consciousness. A significant proportion of collapses at the wheel have been found to be associated with insulin treatment.

M1

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when was the last time the central reservation and verges of the M1 in Northamptonshire and Hertfordshire were cleaned; and what is the programme for cleaning and collecting rubbish from motorways. [30682]

Mr. Watts: The central reservation and verges of the M1 in Northamptonshire were last cleaned at the junctions and service areas, these being the areas suffering most from litter, in the first week of April 1996. In Hertfordshire, the grassed sections of the central reservation were last cleaned during the winter programme which started in November 1995 and finished in March 1996; the hardened central reservation between junctions 8 and 10 was last cleaned in March; and the verges were cleaned approximately two months ago.

Cleaning and collecting rubbish on motorways is undertaken as part of the Highways Agency's routine maintenance programme which, in respect of grassed central reservations, includes gully and drain clearing, grass cutting, safety inspection, litter picking and other detailed inspections. In respect of hardened central reservation, it involves sweeping, cleaning, channel and gully clearing and detailed inspections. For verges, it involves sweeping the hard shoulder and litter picking.

The level of funding available for routine maintenance this year has been reduced and all activities have been carefully reviewed to maintain downward pressure on costs. Activities such as cleaning and collecting rubbish are being limited to the minimum necessary for safety.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to widen the M1 from junction 1 to the Luton-Dunstable exit. [30681]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. James Pawsey, dated 4 June 1996:

The Minister for Railways and Roads has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary question about plans to widen the M1 from Junction 1 to the Luton/Dunstable exit.

Proposals to widen the motorway between Junctions 6A and 10 were the subject of a public inquiry towards the end of last year. The Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport are currently considering their decision and will make an announcement in due course.

The junction serving Luton and Dunstable forms part of the widening scheme between Junctions 10 and 15. This scheme was identified in the recent programme review as having potential for smaller scale improvement. We are currently reviewing the scheme, for which statutory proposals were published in November 1994, with a view to meeting the overall objective of the scheme at a reduced cost. In the meantime the published proposals remain on the table but the proposed public inquiry has been suspended. We expect an announcement later this financial year on the outcome of the scheme review and the way forward.

There are no plans to widen the M1 from Junction 1 to where it joins the M25 (Junction 6A).

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; which agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30570]

Mr. Norris: The Department of Transport and its agencies have used detective agencies: Appointed through the Treasury Solicitor's Department, in connection with seeking evidence for possible legal proceedings against trespassers on road construction sites and for processing legal documents.

1994–95: 344,217

1995–96: 477,774

To establish the whereabouts of people believed to have caused damage to the Highways Agency's roads and structures for the purpose of making claims against them. Approximately 300 to 400 cases are pursed each year at an average cost of £50 to £100 each.

To assist in the recovery of overpayments of salary to Department of Transport staff.

1994–96: four cases, total cost £190

1995–96: nil cases

To hand serve summonses for unlicensed vehicle use and to carry out a debt collection trial, in unlicensed vehicle use cases, to recover outstanding out of court settlements.

1994–95: £373,206

1995–96: £133,953

To obtain evidence in a personal injury case.

1994–95: £5,000

1995–96: nil

M25 (Noise Data Errors)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the reasons for the errors in the noise data presented in the non-technical summary of the environmental statement for the proposed widening of the M25 motorway between junctions 12 and 15; how many (a) of the original leaflets were issued, (b) letters were issued explaining the mistake and (c) of the corrected, environmental effect leaflets issued; what was the cost in each case; and if every objector to the scheme will receive a copy of the corrected leaflet. [30539]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Graham Allen, dated 4 June 1996:

The Minister for Railways and Roads has asked me to reply to your recent question about the errors in the noise data recently published in the Environmental Statement for our proposals to widen the M25 between Junctions 12 and 15.

The non-technical summary (NTS) of the Environmental Statement containing the incorrect noise information was issued to approximately 17,000 people and we sent them all a letter explaining and correcting the error. Our consultants delivered 4,500 of these letters on 9 and 10 May to people living close to the motorway. The remaining 12,500 were sent by post. The reason for the errors was an inputting mistake by our consultants into the computerised noise model for the scheme.

We also made copies of the amended NTS available to everyone who attended the exhibitions held between 10 and 22 May. We have placed copies at 13 deposit points and will send a copy to anyone who requests one. The final costs for correcting the errors have yet to be determined but they will all be met by our consultants. I am sorry if this mistake caused any confusion or inconvenience to anyone with an interest in the proposals, but we took the earliest opportunity to ensure the correct information was available.

Light Dues

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which types of vessel are obliged to pay light dues and which are not in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) France, (c) Spain, (d) Greece and (e) Germany. [30576]

Mr. Norris: Some other European countries charge light dues, but details could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. In the UK, commercial vessels and pleasure craft over 20 tons and tugs and fishing vessels over 10m in length pay light dues. Full details of all liabilities and exemptions are contained in the light dues regulations.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what is his policy in respect of light dues on fishing vessels; and what changes he is evaluating; [30575]

(2) if he will make a statement on the rationale for the light dues system; [30577]

(3) for what reason fishing vessels are obliged to pay light dues. [30578]

Mr. Norris: The Government support the user pays principle and have concluded that the costs of navigation aids to shipping are a proper charge on those who use the services. It would not be acceptable to transfer the costs to the general taxpayer. Fishing vessels make use of all types of navigation aids, so they should contribute to the operating costs. Light dues are reviewed on a regular basis, but we are not currently considering any changes to the charges levied on fishing vessels.

Ramsgate Harbour Access Road

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he had received the inspectors' report on the public inquiry held into the compulsory purchase orders and side road orders related to the Ramsgate harbour access road. [31037]

Mr. Norris: We still await the report.

Rail Freight Terminal (Central Lancashire)

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures he is taking to bring forward the development of an international rail freight terminal in central Lancashire. [31021]

Mr. Watts: None. This is a matter for the private sector.

Decca Navigator System

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the future of the Decca Navigator radio-navigational system. [30597]

Mr. Norris: We are currently awaiting formal recommendations from the general lighthouse authorities regarding the future of the Decca Navigator system.

No decisions have yet been made.

Driving Licences

Mr. Keith Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 21 May, Official Report, column 134, relating to plastic photocard driving licences, who carried out the preliminary and subsequent public consultations; how many members of the public were consulted on each occasion; and how many (a) supported and (b) opposed plastic photocard driving licences. [31135]

Mr. Norris: The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency conducted both consultation exercises.

In the preliminary exercise, 150 consultation documents were issued to organisation representing motorists and interested organisations. Forty-four written responses were received, of which 38 were in favour of proposals to include photographs on driving licences.

In the subsequent exercise, some 1,500 consultation document were issued. There were 49 written responses, of which 46 support photocard licences.

Sir Peter Fry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now allow the grandfather rights of current public service vehicle and heavy goods vehicle licence holders to continue until retirement. [30798]

Mr. Norris: Following my right hon. Friend's announcement on 25 April, Official Report, column 248, that implementation of certain provisions of the second EC directive on driving licences is to be deferred until 1 January 1997, we are giving consideration to the precise arrangements to be introduced in respect of eyesight requirements for driving lorries and buses.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures. [30769]

Mr. Norris: The number of registered disabled people in my Department is 143, which is 1.2 per cent. of the total number of staff.

Rail Privatisation

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 24 April, Official Report, column 150, if he will make an announcement on the total costs of the Railtrack flotation including the amounts paid to consultants. [31260]

Mr. Watts: The costs to the Government of the Railtrack share offer are estimated to be as follows:

	£ million
Advisers fees and expenses	9.4
Marketing (including prospectus production and distribution)	4.9
Receiving bank and share shops	1.3
Overseas costs	2.1
Commissions	24.8
Total (UK and overseas offer)	42.5

These costs represent some 2.2 per cent. of the estimated total proceeds due from the sale of shares. The costs exclude stamp duty and VAT on services provided to the Government, which are not net costs to the Exchequer. There will be some further expenditure in respect of the instalment collection and the issue of bonus shares.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Live Animal Transport

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 15 February 1996, Official Report, column 675, by what date his Department has requested that the costs awarded to it should be paid. [19836]

Mrs. Browning: The matter is being pursued by the usual legal means.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many prosecutions have been brought, or are pending, in respect of animals rejected as unfit to travel prior to export in (a) 1992, (b) 1993, (c) 1994, (d) 1995 and (e) the four months of 1996. [30722]

Mrs. Browning: This information could be collected centrally from the local authorities only at a disproportionate cost.

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 29 April, Official Report, column 412, when the temporary derogations expire for the 160 slaughterhouses yet to meet the requirements of the Fresh Meat (Hygiene Inspection) Regulations 1992. [27875]

Mrs. Browning: Under the Fresh Meat (Hygiene and Inspection) Regulations 1995, which replaced the 1992 Regulations, the temporary derogations expired on 31 December 1995 for 136 slaughterhouses. The remaining 24 premises were granted extensions to their temporary derogations of between one and 12 months.

Surplus Calves

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what methods are used to slaughter surplus calves seven to 10 days old; and what checks are made to ensure that these methods are humane. [30245]

Mrs. Browning: The welfare of calves at slaughter is protected by the Welfare of Animals (Slaughter or Killing) Regulations 1995 (SI 1995 No. 731). The permitted methods of slaughter are stunning, by use of a captive bolt, concussion stunner or by electronarcosis—electrical stunning—which must be followed, without delay, by bleeding or pithing. The regulations lay down specific requirements for these operations. Slaughter of surplus calves under the calf processing aid scheme must take place in a licensed slaughterhouse registered under the scheme and under the supervision of the Meat Hygiene Service. An official veterinary surgeon must be at the premises when calves are handled.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the latest statistics available to him of the number of steers infected by BSE in England and Wales. [25576]

Mrs. Browning: Since 1986 and up to 2 May 1996, the number of steers confirmed as suffering from BSE in England and Wales is 21.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the incidence of BSE in other member states of the European Union. [27876]

Mrs. Browning: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Members for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) and for Angus, East (Mr. Welsh) on 29 April 1996, Official Report, column 408.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cases of BSE there have been in the United Kingdom and in each other European Union country in each year since the disease was first recognised; and what assessment he has made of the reasons for the differences in incidence. [29246]

Mrs. Browning: The following number of BSE cases have been recorded in the United Kingdom and other European countries in each year since the disease was first recognised.

The reason for the difference in incidence is the exposure of cattle in the United Kingdom to infected animal feed which in exported form may have been a factor in some of the countries reporting cases in indigenous animals.

Summary of BSE cases in UK and other European countries as at 10 May 1996

[1] Cases recorded all in cattle imported from UK. With the exception of the UK and Swiss figures, all figures are based on figures reported to the OIE which may not always be accurate. Statistics given for European countries other than UK should be used as guide only.

Mr. Peter Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure prompt payment of claims for compensation from cattle head deboners who had stocks of meat in store at the time when the ban on cattle head products for human consumption was announced. [31136]

Mr. Baldry: Cattle head deboners whose businesses are licensed under the Fresh Meat (Hygiene and Inspection) Regulations 1995 can apply for financial assistance under the beef stocks transfer scheme which is operated by the Intervention Board executive agency on behalf of the agriculture Departments. The IBEA aims to make payments under this scheme as soon as possible, and in any case within 28 days of the receipt of the necessary verification documentation.

Market Testing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for each of his Department's agencies, what market testing has been carried out into the services they provide and what were the results. [30114]

Mr. Boswell: The Veterinary Medicines Directorate and the Meat Hygiene Service will reply to the hon. Member through agency chief executive letters. The information for the Department's other agencies is as follows:

Agricultural Development and Advisory Service (ADAS)

ADAS has market tested document creation services, banking services, welfare services and debt recovery services. Contracts have been awarded to private sector firms. ADAS is currently market testing insurance services and has short-listed four brokers. In the normal course of its business ADAS procures a wide range of local and central services from the private sector including, for example, office cleaning, maintenance, security and legal services.

Central Science Laboratory (CSL)

Whilst the scientific services provided by CSL have been subject to market testing by the core-Department, CSL has not market tested any of its scientific work with a view to contracting out. In terms of non-scientific work, CSL has not carried out any strategic market testing as such. However, the agency is relocating to a new purpose-built laboratory near York in the late summer and services such as catering, operation of the day nursery and facilities management for the site will all be contracted out and bids are currently being evaluated.

Pesticides Safety Directorate (PSD)

The directorate market tested a part of its residue monitoring work and awarded a three year contract to a private contractor starting in 1995–96. This was a pilot exercise which if successful would lead to further work being market tested. The successful contractor decided after the first year to withdraw from the contract for commercial reasons. This work and the further work will be market tested in 1996–97.

Veterinary Laboratories Agency (VLA)

The services of the VLA have been subject to one market test. This was in the area of analysis of samples collected under the national surveillance scheme for the presence of veterinary residues in meat. The work is conducted for the Veterinary Medicines Directorate. This market test was won by the in-house team at the VLA following competition with the private section.

Letter from John FitzGerald to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996.

In the absence of the Chief Executive on business, the Minister has asked me to reply on behalf of the Veterinary Medicines Directorate (VMD) to your question about the market testing of services provided by his Department's Agencies.(30114)

The VMD is responsible for the issue of marketing authorisations for veterinary medicines, for controls on their manufacture and distribution, for post authorisation surveillance of suspected adverse reactions to veterinary medicines and for the provision and implementation of policy advice to Ministers. The Agency is also responsible for the statutory and non-statutory surveillance for residues in meat and other animal products.

The analytical work undertaken as part of the statutory National Surveillance Scheme for residues in meat has been market tested and a contract was awarded to the Veterinary Laboratories Agency, with an annual cost saving of almost 12 per cent.

Letter from Johnston McNeill to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 4 June 1996.

As Chief Executive of the Meat Hygiene Service, your question to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food concerning the market testing of services has been passed to me for reply with regard to this Executive Agency.(30114)

The Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) was launched on 1 April 1995 as an Executive Agency of MAFF. It took over from local authorities responsibility for the enforcement of the hygiene and welfare at slaughter legislation in licensed fresh meat premises in England, Scotland and Wales. The Government decision to set up the MHS was taken to meet the long-standing requests of a majority of representative organisations in the meat industry, who has criticised the uneven standards and varying costs of the service operated by local authorities.

In the first year of its operation the MHS created the Hygiene Advice Team (HAT) project to visit and assess animal welfare conditions in all licensed slaughterhouses and hygiene in all fresh meat premises. Each visit was undertaken so as to assess the operation of the plant under normal working conditions. The purposes of the HAT project were to assess the overall character of hygiene and welfare and provide a common criteria of assessment and scoring against which improvements can be judged, but also to plan the optimum use of MHS resources and achieve maximum cost effectiveness in the delivery of its services, and to provide a uniform and equitable service for all customers.

A considerable proportion of the Official Veterinary Surgeons (OVSs) of the MHS are veterinary practises engaged by contractual arrangements. As a full cost recovery service and in line with government policy towards the extension of competition to public services in the form of tendering and Market Testing, the MHS seeks to ensure that the work of OVSs is conducted at optimum proficiency and price. Furthermore, the MHS undertakes a statutory consultation exercise with all plant operators about its proposed charges for meat inspection. Plant operators have the opportunity under the Meat (Hygiene, Inspection and Examination for Residues) (Charges) Regulations 1995 to make representations about the proposed charges.

In setting up the MHS great care was taken to avoid imposing additional costs on the industry and the agency's organisation, structure and overheads are the minimum consistent with providing an effective service. The MHS is also subject to challenging annual financial and performance targets to ensure that it delivers its services in the most cost effective way.

Correspondence

Mr. Olner: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the hon. Member for Nuneaton will receive a reply to his letter dated 17 April regarding issues raised by his constituent, Mr. M. Hewitt. [30355]

Mrs. Browning: I replied to the hon. Member's letter on 16 May.

"Rural England" White Paper

Sir David Steel: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made on the Government's review of rural training provision referred to on page 54 of the Government's "Rural England" White Paper. [30674]

Mr. Boswell: The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is responsible for reviewing the support for training provided through ATB-Landbase referred to in the "Rural England" White Paper.

The Ministry has placed a further contract with ATB-Landbase. The contract, worth nearly £2 million, runs to 31 March 1997 and covers strategic industry training organisation, ITO, and lead body activities for the agricultural and commercial horticulture industries, together with funding to maintain a quality-assured training instructor register. The contract also includes funding for projects embracing training promotion and the development of local initiatives. In the longer term, we believe that our funding should be channelled through a competition process to ensure that support meets the industry's training support requirements at a reasonable cost. In deciding how to take matters forward, we shall be taking into consideration the Department for Education and Employment's recent proposals for the ITO network.

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95, which agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30571]

Mr. Boswell: The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has made no use of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30554]

Mr. Boswell: The information requested for permanent non-industrial staff in my Department including executive agencies on 1 April 1996 is as follows:

(a) Total male staff 5,776; total female staff 4,460.

(b)

Grade	Total officials	Women employed	Percentage women
2	4	1	25
3	20	1	5
4	13	0	0
5	102	12	12
6	185	22	12
7	831	168	20
SEO	1,083	267	25
HEO	1,589	462	29
EO	2,360	896	38

(c)

Grade	Total officials	Women employed	Percentage women
AO	2,472	1,607	65
AA	1,550	998	64

These figures are provisional and more precise information will be published later this year in "Civil Service Statistics" copies of which are available in the Library. Information is not separately available for executive agencies. Casual and seasonal staff are excluded. Figures for total numbers at some grades are not directly comparable with 1995 figures because of reorganisations within MAFF.

Animal Feed

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effects of the routine use of antibiotics in farm animal feed; and if he will make a statement. [30725]

Mrs. Browning: The use of additives in animal feedingstuffs is subject to directive 70/524/EEC, as amended. No feed additive is permitted unless, at the level permitted in feedingstuffs, it does not adversely affect human or animal health or the environment. The EC Commission is advised on these matters by the independent Scientific Committee on Animal Nutrition—SCAN—and each approval is subject to agreement by the Standing Committee for Feedingstuffs.

In the UK, the possible development of antibiotic resistance in humans and animals from the use of antibiotics in animals is kept under review by the independent, scientific Veterinary Products Committee. The VPC has consistently followed the principles established in 1969 by the report of the joint committee on the use of antibiotics in animal husbandry and veterinary medicine—the Swann report. The VPC's policy has been that new antimicrobials should not necessarily be precluded from therapeutic use in animals but that their prophylactic use should be discouraged.

Against this background, the committee continues to consider each case on its merits. The committee reviewed its policy last year and confirmed that it did not require amendment. In doing so, it recognised that many antibiotics are effective against both human and animal disease and a number licensed in human medicine are also authorised for therapeutic use in animals. Their use in human medicine, however, far outweighs any animal use.

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the animal feed products into which his Department has conducted research in respect of the spread of BSE; what measures have been undertaken as a result of this research; and what measures he has undertaken to monitor their effectiveness. [29578]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 21 May 1996]: Epidemiological investigations identified meat and bone meal of ruminant origin as the vehicle of transmission of BSE. Evidence from transmission experiments suggests that meal derived from central nervous tissue presented the greatest risk, although other tissues defined as specified bovine material—SBM—could not be excluded. Experiments recently published tested the effectiveness of the rendering processes within the EU in inactivating the BSE agent. These showed that some rendering systems in use in the 1980s did not inactivate the BSE agent fully.

As a result of our understanding of BSE, largely resulting from various research programmes, a number of control measures were introduced:

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy Order 1988 prohibited the feeding of ruminant protein to ruminant animals on 18 July 1988.

The Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy (No2) Order 1990 extended the ban on the use of specified bovine offals to any animal feed.

The Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy Order 1991 consolidated existing BSE legislation and introduced new provisions to prevent the use of meat and bone meal produced from SBOs as a fertiliser.

In June 1994 a procedure of on farm sampling of animal feed from premises visited as a result of reported BSE suspect cases was introduced.

The Spongiform Miscellaneous Encephalopathy (Amendments) Order 1994 extended the ruminant protein feed ban to include all mammalian protein in ruminant feedingstuffs.

Validation of all rendering plants handling animal waste by the end of 1994, in accordance with Commission decision 94/382 on the approval of alternative heat treatment systems for processing animal waste of ruminant origin. The requirements of the decision were included in the Specified Bovine Offal Order 1995.

The Specified Bovine Offal Order 1995 strengthened the controls in rendering plants handling SBOs by requiring them to operate dedicated rendering lines for the processing of SBO.

The random sampling of animal feed in feed mills commenced in February 1996 in accordance with Commission Decision 95/287.

The Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy (Amendment) Order 1996 extended the mammalian protein feed ban to the feeding of mammalian protein to all farm animals, including horses and farmed fish.

The Fertilisers (Mammalian Meat and Bone Meal) Regulations 1996 prohibit the use of meat and bonemeal as, or in, fertiliser used on agricultural land. It is only permitted for use in private gardens, and within greenhouses and glass or plastic structures.

An enzyme linked immunoassay—ELISA—test has been developed to identify the presence of mammalian protein in animal feed. This has been used to monitor compliance with the ruminant feed ban.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many fishing vessels that were ejected from the register in 1988 are eligible to reapply and how many are not; what gross registered tonnage these vessels represent; and what kilowatts of power they have; [30579]

(2) under what circumstances fishing vessels ejected from the register in 1988 may be reinstated; and if, following reinstatement, they are eligible for licences to fish for United Kingdom quotas. [30580]

Mr. Baldry: Fishing vessels refused registration under the nationality provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 can be admitted to the British register only if they meet the current registration eligibility requirements. In order to be eligible owners must be:

(a) British citizens or persons who are nationals of a member state other than the United Kingdom and are established, within the meaning of article 52 of the EEC treaty, in the United Kingdom;

(b) bodies corporate incorporated in a member state with a place of business in the United Kingdom;

(c) European economic interest groupings, which are groupings formed in pursuance of article 1 of Council regulation (EEC) No. 2137/85 and registered in the United Kingdom;

(d) a local authority in the United Kingdom.

Reinstated vessels are granted licences only if they held one prior to deregistration and it has not been used to licence another vessel in the meantime. If the licence has been used in this way, owners of reinstated vessels can obtain licences to fish only by transfer from other licensed vessels. Tonnage and engine power figures for vessels refused registration in 1989 are not readily available.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many notices were issued in respect of animals destined for export under articles 15 and 16 of the Welfare of Animals During Transport Order 1994 (a) between 23 January 1995 and 31 December 1995 and (b) in the first four months of 1996; [30720]

(2) how many notices were issued in respect of animals destined for export under articles 11 and 12 of the Welfare of Animals During Transport Order 1992 in (a) 1993, (b) 1994 and (c) since 1 January 1995. [30719]

Mrs. Browning: Animals may begin journeys to other member states from many locations. Notices may be served for a variety of different circumstances, and there is no collection of information on a central basis. The figures requested could be gathered only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) cattle, (b) sheep and (c) pigs were rejected as unfit to travel prior to export in each of the first four months of 1996. [30721]

Mrs. Browning: The reported number of farm animals inspected prior to export during 1996 and rejected as unfit for transport have been as follows:

	Bovine	Ovine	Porcine
January	103	471	128
February	251	204	60
March	28	131	69
April	n/a n/a = not yet available.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what guidance he has issued to (a) his staff of local veterinary inspectors and (b) local authorities as to the bringing of prosecutions in respect of animals rejected as unfit to travel prior to export; and if he will make a statement. [30723]

Mrs. Browning: Officials of the Department maintain regular contact with local authorities on enforcement issues. Local authorities are familiar with the considerations pertaining to offences under the order, and will prosecute if they consider the evidence to be strong enough to warrant this. The position relating to LVIs is as set out in my reply to the hon. Member on 13 May 1996, Official Report, columns 379-80.

Decommissioning

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is the Government's policy towards regulation COM (95) 55; [30763]

(2) what proposals he has for additional payments supplementary to decommissioning awards for shore fishermen who lost their jobs when their vessels were laid up. [30791]

Mr. Baldry: Document COM (95) 55 concerned a proposal which has now been adopted as Council Regulation 2719/95. It amends Council Regulation 3699/93 to allow member states to use funds allocated to them from the financial instrument for fisheries guidance to part-fund an early retirement scheme for fishermen and a compensation scheme for fishermen from decommissioned boats. The Government have always made it clear that they consider that such measures should be covered by national social security policies and are not an appropriate use of FIFG funds. The measures have not been included in those introduced in the UK under FIFG. The Government's view is that the needs of the industry are best served by using limited FIFG funds for decommissioning, vessel safety improvements, and improving marketing and processing and port facilities.

Unlike other self-employed persons, share fishermen have access to contributory unemployment benefits. This gives them special access to unemployment benefit and, from October 1996, to contribution-based jobseeker's allowance.

Cattle Cull

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he is taking to ensure that meat and livestock commissioners, Meat Hygiene Service and Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce officials observe his Department's rules on documentation, teeth and ear tags for cattle proposed for the 30-month culling scheme. [30803]

Mrs. Browning: Instructions are circulated to all officials involved in the operation of the scheme. Officials are required to observe the rules as they are for any other scheme.

Fisheries Service

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when his Department last undertook a detailed review of the funding of the fisheries service; and what plans he has for a further review. [31010]

Mr. Baldry: The Department recently completed a fundamental expenditure review which included expenditure on fisheries. We also regularly examine our requirements for fisheries as part of the Department's financial planning arrangements.

Cattle Birth Registration

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from the British Veterinary Association about vets' signatures on cattle birth registration documents. [28869]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 10 May 1996]: The British Veterinary Association has made representations to the Chief Veterinary Officer about the role of local veterinary inspectors in facilitating cattle birth record documents which were introduced at the request of the industry after consultation with the British Veterinary Association and the British Cattle Veterinary Association.

We shall be making some minor changes to the present arrangements following further discussion with the relevant veterinary associations.

Council of Europe Meetings

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many meetings of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995 have been attended by Ministers or officials of his Department; and if he will make a statement. [29357]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 17 May 1996]: No Minister from my Department has attended any meeting of, or organised by, the Council of Europe since January 1995, but officials have attended 17 meetings over this period.

Scientists and Engineers

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 12 March, Official Report, column 578, how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed at each grade in each of his Department's agencies in each year since 1991. [29834]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 20 May 1996]: Responsibility for this matter is delegated to agency chief executives and I have asked them to reply to the hon. Member direct.

Letter from Johnston McNeill to Mr. Adam Ingram, dated 4 June 1996:

As Chief Executive of the Meat Hygiene Service, your question to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food concerning the number of professional scientists and engineers employed at each grade in each of the Department's agencies has been passed to me for reply with regard to this Executive Agency. (29834)

The Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) was launched on 1 April 1995 as an Executive Agency of MAFF. It took over from some 300 local authorities responsibility for enforcement of the hygiene and welfare at slaughter legislation in licensed meat premises in England, Scotland and Wales. Consequently the MHS employed no scientists or engineers before that date.

The MHS headquarters are based in York where Chief Executive and the supporting functions of Operations, Finance, Human Resources and Information Technology are based. MHS services are managed by six regional offices. The Head of Operations as well as two of the regional Managers are qualified Veterinary Surgeons. The MHS also employs Official Veterinary Surgeons to supervise meat inspection staff working in plants. The MHS directly employs 22 Principal Official Veterinary Surgeons and 16 Official Veterinary Surgeons. In addition it contracts out work to 110 full time equivalent vets to supplement them. 5 vets are also utilised on a casual basis.

Letter from John FitzGerald to Mr. Adam Ingram, dated 4 June 1996:

In the absence of the Chief Executive on business, I have been asked by the Minister to reply on behalf of the Veterinary Medicines Directorate to your question about the numbers of professional scientists and engineers employed at the Veterinary Medicines Directorate in each year since 1991 as this is an operational matter for which the Chief Executive is responsible. (29834)

The number of full time equivalent staff employed as professional software engineers within the Veterinary Medicines Directorate in each year since 1991 is as follows:

	At 1 April
	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996
Senior Executive Officer	1	1	1	1	—	—

Research Officer	4	8	7	7.5	6.5	9.4
Senior Research Officer II	6	6	5	4	4	3

For open structure grades of grade 7 and above, the following numbers of staff hold scientific degrees or equivalent qualifications and are engaged in the assessment of applications for marketing authorisations for veterinary medicines:

	At 1 April
	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996

The Director of Licensing (Grade 5) and the Chief Executive also hold scientific qualifications.

Letter from Phillip Needham to Mr. Adam Ingram, dated 4 June 1996:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary question in which you asked how many professional scientists and engineers of each category were employed at each grade in each of his Department's agencies in each year since 1991.[29834]

ADAS was formed as an Executive Agency of MAFF and the Welsh Office in 1992.

Most of the following posts are held by staff with scientific or engineering qualifications. We are unable to supply figures on a comparable basis before 1994.

Letter from Mr. T. W. A. Little to Mr. Adam Ingram, dated 4 June 1996:

The Minister has asked me to reply to your question on the number of professional scientists employed in the Veterinary Laboratories Agency (VLA).

The VLA was established on 1 October 1995, from the merger of the existing Central Veterinary Laboratory with the Veterinary Investigation Service which was part of the State Veterinary Service. The following information therefore includes figures for the former Veterinary Investigation Service from October 1995.

No engineers are employed at the VLA. Professional scientists, by grade, employed since 1991 are as follows:

Letter from P. I. Stanley to Mr. Adam Ingram, dated 4 June 1996:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply to your question about the number of professional scientists and engineers employed in his Department's Agencies since 1991 in respect of his Central Science Laboratory (CSL) Agency, as this is an operational matter for which I am responsible.

CSL was first launched as an executive agency of MAFF on 1 April 1992. Prior to that date staffing numbers were included as part of the departmental total. CSL does not employ engineers. The number of professional scientists employed during the Agency's first year of operation, 1992–93, was not recorded by grade, however the overall average figure for the year was some 312 out of a total of 443 staff. CSL was relaunched as an enlarged agency on 1 April 1994 following its merger with the MAFF Food Science Laboratories at Norwich and Aberdeen. The number of professional scientists employed at the start of each subsequent financial year was:

Grade	1 April 1994	1 April 1995	1 April 1996
Assistant Scientific Officer	103	115	122
Scientific Officer	136	137	145
Higher Scientific Officer	101	115	113
Senior Scientific Officer	69	74	62
Principal Scientific Officer	41	38	30
Grade 6	10	11	13
Grade 5	2	2	2
Grade 3	1	1	1

These figures include those employed on a fixed-term and casual basis.

Letter from G. K. Bruce to Mr. Adam Ingram, dated 4 June 1996:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply to your question about how many professional scientists and engineers have been employed in the Pesticides Safety Directorate (PSD) since 1991, as this is an operational matter for which I am responsible.

PSD has only been in existence as an Agency since April 1993. Since 1993 the following number of scientific staff have been employed:

Grade	Number in post
1993

All scientific staff within the Agency from Scientific Officer and above hold a bioscience degree or equivalent.

There are not qualified engineers within the Agency.

Goosanders

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the published scientific studies evaluated by his Department into damage to fisheries in England caused by Goosanders. [29841]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 21 May 1996]: We are not aware of any scientific studies on the damage to fisheries by Goosanders in England. Investigations into such damage for selected sites in England are part of the current three-year research and development programme commissioned in 1995 by this Ministry, the Department of the Environment and the Environment Agency. The results of the research will be published as they become available.

Food Retail Outlets (Lighting)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures control the use of artificial light in the display of (a) meat and (b) other foodstuffs in retail outlets; what plans he has for further regulations in this area; and if he will make a statement. [29630]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The Food Safety (General Food Hygiene) Regulations 1995 (SI 1995/1763) require "adequate natural and/or artificial lighting" in all food premises covered by these regulations, to help ensure hygienic handling.

This Department has no plans to introduce further controls.

Horticultural Research

Mr. Atkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the extent of funding for horticultural research from his Department (a) in each year of the last five years and (b) planned for each of the next two years. [30017]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 22 May 1996]: The Department's expenditure on horticultural research in each of the last five years and planned expenditure for the present year are:

Year	£ million
1991–92	[1]10.5
1992–93	[1]11.1
1993–94	[1]11.4
1994–95	13.4
1995–96	13.6
1996–97	13.6

[1] Excludes some work on pesticides for horticultural crops.

Subject to the usual constraints of public expenditure planning, present expectations are that in 1997–98 expenditure will be at a similar level to 1996–97.

Public Bodies

Dr. Wright: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, if he will list those of his Department's advisory non-departmental public bodies which (a) the Government are required to consult prior to legislative proposals and (b) the Government are required to publish their response to advice supplied. [21852]

Mr. Boswell [pursuant to his reply 22 April 1996, Official Report, column 51]: Agriculture Ministers are required, under section 62 (3) of the Medicines Act 1968, to consult the Veterinary Products Committee before making an order and, under section 16(9)(a) of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985, to consult the Advisory Committee on Pesticides before making an order. There is no requirement to consult our other advisory non-departmental public bodies prior to legislative proposals or to publish our response to advice supplied by them, or the Veterinary Products Committee.

DEFENCE

United Nations

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the advantages of establishing a standby military headquarters unit within the UN department of peacekeeping operations in New York; [30732]

(2) what is his policy in respect of developing and strengthening the ability of the United Nations to undertake effective and detailed military planning; and if he will make a statement; [30733]

(3) what proposals he has in respect of the development of (a) generic and (b) specific contingency plans for the UN for future peacekeeping operations; and if he will make a statement. [30734]

Mr. Soames: The proposal to establish a standby headquarters unit is a natural extension of earlier work by the Secretary-General which identified the need to strengthen the UN's capacity to conduct and plan peacekeeping operations and which the UK has fully supported. The Secretary-General has already taken important steps to improve the UN's capabilities, in particular by the development of a mission planning service. Increasing the operational effectiveness of the UN is one of the Government's principal foreign policy objectives and both the Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are involved in discussions aimed at continuing to take these initiatives forward. To give practical help, we currently attach nine military officers and one civil servant to the department of peacekeeping operations, and we continue to co-operate fully with the UN standby forces planning team.

Defence Evaluation and Research Agency

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what targets he has set for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency in 1996–97. [31518]

Mr. Soames: The targets set for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency in 1996–97 are as follows:

(a) Consistent with achieving an average of at least 6 per cent. return on capital employed over a period of three years, the target for 1996–97 is 4 per cent.

(b) Increase DERA overall utilisation target from 57 per cent. in 1995–96 to 62.4 per cent. in 1996–97.

(c) Increase DERA overall milestone delivery target from 84 per cent. in 1995–96 to 89 per cent. in 1996–97.

(d) Increase DERA overall customer satisfaction as measured by the annual survey from 27 percentile points above average in 1995–96 to 30 percentile points in 1996–97.

(e) To establish an effective capability measurement system through technical assessment and to measure an improvement in the DRA sectors and two protection and life sciences division sectors.

(f) To have met by 31 March 1997 all the 1996–97 rationalisation project milestones.

(g) To achieve a non-MOD income of £117 million.

(h) To achieve formal quality certification to ISO 9000 for all DRA and DERA support services division sectors, plus the centre for defence analysis and the chemical and electronics sector and centre for human sciences sectors of PLSD.

(i) All division except the defence test and evaluation organisation to demonstrate an improvement in staff satisfaction, and to demonstrate improvements in the working environment, career development and training, and reward and recognition. DTEO to participate to form a baseline.

(j) To establish a methodology for measuring technology transfer.

MV Kapitan Mezentsyev (Defects)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 560, if he will list the minor defects identified on the merchant vessel Kapitan Mezentsyev. [30731]

Mr. Soames: The following defects were identified: A fractured starboard fibreglass lifeboat; inoperable davit switches; badly maintained winch falls and davit; a repair required on a fire station in the after steering compartment and an inoperable watertight door.

All these were remedied at once, and the vessel inspected to the satisfaction of the US authorities.

Defence Police and Guarding Structure

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he will issue a further consultative document on the Defence police and guarding structure. [31598]

Mr. Soames: This consultative document was issued on 29 May. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

HEALTH

Committee on Safety of Medicines

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the scientific information that has been made available to the Committee on Safety of Medicines since November 1995; and on what dates the committee considered that evidence. [31287]

Mr. Malone: Proceedings of meetings of the committee are confidential.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what dates the National Audit Office most recently examined the Medicines Control Agency; and what assessment the National Audit Office made of expenditure relating to the sub-committees of the Committee on Safety of Medicines. [31288]

Mr. Malone: The National Audit Office audit of the Medicines Control Agency's 1995–96 accounts is currently in progress. The audit of the 1994–95 account was completed in May 1995. In the course of that audit the National Audit Office reviewed MCA expenditure generally. No comment was received with regard to expenditure relating to the sub-committees of the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

GP Fundholders

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of general practitioner fundholders saving in each region has been spent other than by fundholders themselves, in each of the last four years. [29666]

Mr. Malone [holding answer 16 May 1996]: Fundholders may choose to return savings for wider use in the national health service. Information about savings returned in this way will be placed in the Library.

Oral Contraceptives

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 11 December 1995, Official Report column 521, which advisers were given the elements of the data on desogestrel and gestodene; and on which dates. [31289]

Mr. Malone: Communications between the Licensing Authority and its independent safety advisers are confidential.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 11 December 1995, Official Report, column 521, on what dates in 1989, 1991 and 1995 the Committee on Safety of Medicines reviewed the safety of oral contraceptives containing desogestrel and gestodene. [31286]

Mr. Malone: The safety of oral contraceptives containing gestodene or desogestrel was reviewed in March 1989, February 1991, May 1995 and October 1995.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the estimates made by the Medicines Control Agency of the incidence of venous thromboembolism associated with, (a) desogestrel, (b) gestodene and (c) levonorgestrel both in June 1995 and on 13 October 1995. [31276]

Mr. Malone: In June 1995, information on the incidence of venous thromboembolism with specific combined oral contraceptives preparations was not available. By 13 October 1995 new information had become available which provided the following estimates of the incidence of venous thromboembolism: for oral contraceptives containing levonorgestrel approximately 15 cases per 100,000 women each year, for oral contraceptives containing gestodene or desogestrel approximately 30 cases per 100,000 women each year.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health from what location the 190,000 letters relating to oral contraceptives containing desogestrel or gestodene were dispatched. [31277]

Mr. Malone: Horndean, Hampshire.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate his officials made prior to despatch of the "Dear Doctor" letter of 18 October 1995 relating to oral contraceptives of the proportion of letters that would be received by doctors prior to the public announcement scheduled for the afternoon of Thursday 19 October 1995. [31278]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the statement my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made on 23 October 1995 at columns 701–2. The letters were posted by first class post on Wednesday 18 October 1995. Officials expected that most doctors would receive a copy of the letter, by means of at least one of the three mechanisms of communication used, prior to the public announcement scheduled for Thursday 19 October 1995.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the dates on which Ministers received updates regarding the analysis of the World Health Organisation study; and whether Ministers asked the Medicines Control Agency to seek the advice from the Committee on Safety of Medicines on 13 October 1995. [31279]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him on 7 March at column 321. Ministers were not updated regarding the analysis of the World Health Organisation's study between July and October since there was no material change in the findings of the study.

It is normal practice for the Medicines Control Agency to seek the committee's advice on all safety issues with medicines which have important public health implications. Ministers did not ask the MCA to seek the advice of the Committee on Safety of Medicines on this issue.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what date, and at what time, the press conference as originally scheduled was made known to the media; and on what date and at what time the revised timing of the public announcement was made available to the media. [31280]

Mr. Malone: The public announcement last year about the safety of certain oral contraceptives was originally planned as a press notice, to be issued in the afternoon of 19 October, having allowed time for doctors and pharmacists to receive the information already sent to them. As a result of inquiries from the electronic media, which were received from 9 am that day, it was decided to bring the announcement forward to 12 noon so that it could inform lunchtime news coverage on radio and television. The Department does not keep records showing the precise times at which the media are informed of forthcoming press conferences.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) of 19 December 1995, Official Report, column 1153, what steps his officials took to establish that data collection for the transnational study had been completed and if the stage in the recruitment process was communicated to the Committee on Safety of Medicines prior to or during its meeting on 13 October 1995.[31281]

Mr. Malone: Officials from the Medicines Control Agency asked the investigators of the transnational study what stage had been reached in recruitment for their study. They were informed that the data on venous thromboembolism were complete but identification of cases of myocardial infarction was still in progress and it was understood that substantive data would not be available for one to two years. The Committee on Safety of Medicines were informed of this at the meeting on 13 October 1995.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his officials contributed to the drafting of a letter attributed to the chairman of the Committee on Safety of Medicines which was published in the British Medical Journal of 4 November 1995. [31282]

Mr. Malone: The letter was written by the chairman of the Committee on Safety of Medicines, who discussed its contents with officials before finalising it.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) of 19 December 1955, Official Report, column 1149, if he will list the United Kingdom representatives on the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products in October 1995. [31283]

Mr. Malone: The two members of the Committee representing the United Kingdom competent authority are Dr. Susan Wood and Dr. David Jefferys.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) of 19 December 1995, Official Report, column 1149, which of the United Kingdom representatives on the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products made the formal request that the safety of oral contraceptives containing desogestrel and gestodene be placed on the agenda for the meeting of the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products on 17 and 18 October 1995. [31284]

Mr. Malone: Dr. Susan Wood, representing the United Kingdom competent authority.

Mr. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 11 December 1995, Official Report, column 522, if Professor John Guillebaud attended the meeting on 10 October 1995 relating to desogestrel and gestodene. [31285]

Mr. Malone: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 19 December 1995 at column 1151.

PRIME MINISTER

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals there are to change the 1996–97 cash limit or running costs limit for the Cabinet Office other services vote. [31583]

The Prime Minister: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for the Cabinet Office other services, class XVIII, vote 1, will be increased by £741,000 from £36,941,000 to £37,682,000 and the running costs limit will be increased by £741,000 from £39,845,000 to £40,586,000.

This is to reflect the transfer from the Home Office, class VII, vote 1, of provision for certain Government car service costs; and the transfer from the Office of Public Service, class XVIII, vote 1, of provision for Admiralty house and other central service costs.

The increases are offset by interdepartmental transfers and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proposals there are to change the 1996–97 cash limit or running costs limit for the Office of Public Service and Her Majesty's Stationery Office. [31597]

Mr. Freeman: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary and revised estimates, the cash limit for the Office of Public Service, class XVII, vote 1, will be increased by £434,000 from £173,540,000 to £173,974,000 and the gross running cost limit will be decreased by £14,411,000 from £88,512,000 to £74,101,000. The cash limit for stationery and printing payments to Her Majesty's Stationery Office, class XVII, vote 4, will be reduced by £1,091,000 from £2,282,000 to £1,191,000. The changes reflect the transfer from HMSO to the Office of Public Service, from the expected date of its sale, of the subsidy to public libraries on Government and other publications, and the supply of publications to United Kingdom members of the European Parliament together with the costs of the HMSO residual body; the transfer of provision for central services to the Cabinet Office: other services, class XVIII, vote 1; and the transfer of the Recruitment and Assessment Services Agency and Occupational Health and Safety Agency from gross to net running costs. The increase in the cash limit for the Office of Public Service will be offset by a transfer and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed to the Treasury's running costs and cash limits in 1996–97. [31737]

Mr. Jack: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary revised estimate, the running costs limit for class XVI, vote 1 will be reduced by £804,000 from £58,122,000 to £57,318,000. The cash limit remains unchanged. The reduction reflects savings which will meet the cost of advisers fees in connection with the privatisation of certain Paymaster functions, which is still subject to ministerial decision.

Mr. Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed to the Registry of Friendly Societies' cash and running costs limits in 1996–97. [31738]

Mrs. Angela Knight: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class XVI, vote 9, the Registry of Friendly Societies will be increased by £1,330,000 from £6,340,000 to £7,670,000. The increase is required for additional capital expenditure in respect of the registry's relocation to Victory house in 1996–97.

The increase will be offset by savings on class XVI, votes 1 and 16, and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Buying Agency

Mr. Booth: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what targets he has set for the Buying Agency. [31592]

Mr. Freeman: Following the transfer of the agency from the Department of the Environment on 1 January, I have set targets for 1996 as follows:

Financial

1. To generate a return on capital employed of 8 per cent.—this was applied to the last six months of 1995 and was achieved.
2. To achieve a growth in sales of the core business of 20 per cent.—the outturn for 1995 was £137 million.

Productivity

3. To reduce the basic cost per £ of core business sales to 2.6p—the outturn for 1995 was 2.8p, additional development costs in 1996 will not be included in this target.
4. To retain all existing utilities business and achieve a 4 per cent. increase in the number of customers—this is a new target.

Customer satisfaction

5. To deliver 93 per cent. of all direct orders by the due date—the outturn for 1995 was 92 per cent.
6. To resolve 95 per cent. of all customer complaints in one month and the rest within three months—the outturn for 1995 was 94 per cent.

Internal quality

7. To gain accreditation as "Investors in People"—this is a new target.

Environmental

8. To create an environmental effects register of TBA's activities as described in the BS 7750 standard—this is a new target.

TREASURY

Mortgage Interest Tax Relief

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the cost of mortgage interest tax relief would have been in each year since 1994–95 if relief had been available at 25 per cent. [30193]

Mr. Jack: The total cost of mortgage interest relief and the estimated cost if relief was available at 25 per cent., for the years 1994–95 to 1996–97 for the UK as a whole, are as follows:

£ million

	Cost of mortgage interest relief	Cost of relief if available at 25 per cent.
1994–95	3,500	4,400
1995–96	2,700	4,500
1996–97[1]	2,500	4,200

[1] Estimates for 1996–97 are provisional. They are based on the assumption, by convention, of no change from the current estimated average building society interest rate of 7.03 per cent.

The rate of relief in 1994–95 was 20 per cent. From 1995–96 onwards it has been 15 per cent.

Factor 8

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons the medical aid recombinant factor 8 is not zero-rated; and if he will now zero rate it. [31088]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In 1977 the then Government agreed with other member states, under the terms of the EC sixth VAT directive, not to extend the scope of our existing VAT zero rates and so it is not now possible to zero rate these products.

Human blood and substances derived from it, including plasma-derived factor 8, are exempt from VAT under items 6 and 7 of group 7 of schedule 9 to the Value Added Tax Act 1994. However, recombinant factor 8, being synthetic and not derived from human blood, does not fall within this exemption and so is subject to VAT at the standard rate.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Terry Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the number of people who pay income tax on invalid care allowance; and how much was received in tax on invalid care allowance in 1995–96. [30713]

Mr. Jack [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The estimated revenue yield for 1995–96 is about £5 million. This is an estimate of the income tax attributable on the benefit, by applying the recipients' average rate of income tax on the whole of their income to the amount of benefit received. About 100,000 individuals who receive invalid care allowance were liable to income tax.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Bodies

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir S. Chapman) of 15 May, Official Report, column 489 on the future of the Commission for the New Towns, what representations he has received on the need for an overarching body to control the sale of assets by (a) his Department, (b) the Ministry of Defence and (c) other Departments of State, with particular reference to the impact of sales of land on land values in new town areas. [31016]

Sir Paul Beresford: We see no case for setting up an overarching body. The announcement on 15 May concerned the assets, rights and liabilities of new towns, urban development corporations and housing action trusts only. We believe that this proposal provides the best way of maximising returns to the Exchequer from sales of land in new town areas and for handling residual matters from the urban development corporations and housing action trusts effectively and economically. The general policy on disposing of Government land is a matter for my right hon. Friend and the learned Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Development Plans

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements he is putting in place for the consideration of further changes to the system of development plans prepared under the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. [31792]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: On 13 March I published proposals to amend the code of practice on development plans and the development plan regulations in order to help speed up the process of adoption by local authorities of area-wide local plans and unitary development plans. The changes proposed in those documents have been broadly welcomed and, subject to consideration of the detailed comments received, will be implemented as soon as possible. I also indicated that I had not ruled out further changes, if these were wanted by the users of the development plan system. Meetings are now being held with a range of organisations representing those with an interest in the operation of the system, including the local authorities, developers and environmental groups. Suggestions for change can also be submitted in writing to: The Secretary, Development plans review, room C13/20, 2 Marsham street, London SW1P 3EB, to arrive not later than 30 June. If it is decided to bring forward further firm proposals for changes to the system, these will be subject to consultation in the usual way.

Blight Working Group

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the interdepartmental working group on blight will issue a paper summarising the main issues for consideration. [31793]

Sir Paul Beresford: A paper has been published today, and copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House. The paper, which covers the whole of Great Britain, seeks views on whether any practical changes can be made to the existing arrangements for property purchase and compensation, bearing in mind the particular concerns of the Select Committee on the Channel Tunnel Rail Link Bill about those whose properties decline in value because of the perception of potential purchases rather than because of any physical effects.

Comments are invited by 31 July from all those with an interest in generalised blight.

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he has to change his Department's cash and running costs limits for 1996–97. [31802]

Mr. Gummer: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary revised and summer supplementary estimates, the following cash limit changes will be made.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 1—housing and construction, England—covering sections A, D to G and J to L of that vote, will be decreased by £10,950,000 from £341,518,000 to £330,568,000. This change reflects transfers of £2,000,000 to provide for a new asylum seekers' special housing grant which will not be cash limited; £5,200,000 to class VI, vote 2—regeneration, countryside and wildlife—and a transfer of £4,300,000 within the rough sleepers initiative from current to capital expenditure, the latter of which falls within the DOE/HC non-voted cash limit. The decreases are partially offset by an increase of £550,000 in Housing Corporation administration provision.

The DOE/HC—Housing Corporation—cash limit will be increased by £4,300,000 from £1,030,199,000 to £1,034,499,000 because of the transfer of provision for the rough sleepers initiative from current to capital expenditure.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 2—regeneration, countryside and wildlife—will be increased by £6,656,000 from £1,452,787,00 to £1,459,443,000. This reflects a transfer of £5,200,000 from class VI, vote 1—housing and construction—to the Docklands light railway and the London docklands development corporation to cover repair costs following the bombing at south quay in February 1996. An increase of £1,456,000 is also required to pay European regional development fund claims not accepted for payment by the European Community. The increase will be met by a transfer from the DOE/ERDF non-voted cash limit and will therefore not add to the planned control total of public expenditure.

The DOE/RCW—regeneration, countryside and wildlife—non-voted cash limit will also be increased by £6,656,000 from £1,434,387,000 to £1,441,043,000 for the reasons given in paragraph 4.

The DOE/ERDF—European regional development fund—non-voted cash limit will be reduced by £1,440,000 from £184,222,000 to £182,782,000. This reflects a transfer of £16,000 from the Department of Health for the St. Gabriel's church scheme and a transfer of £1,456,000 to DOE/RCW for the new ERDF sections to cover gross payments in place of European Community receipts.

The external financing limit for urban development corporations will be increased by £5,200,000 to £207,050,000 to cover repair costs for Docklands light railway and London docklands development corporation following the bombing at south quays. The external financing limit for the Urban Regeneration Agency, English Partnerships, will be increased by £13,652,000 for provision for current spending which was incorrectly omitted from the introduction to the 1996–97 supply estimates.

The cash limit for class VI, vote 4—local government and planning, England—covering sections A to F of that vote, will be reduced by £80,000 from £31,128,167,000 to £31,128,087,000 to reflect reductions in the payments made to the Valuation Office Agency in section A valuation services. The savings will be used within vote 4, to cover a payment in South Yorkshire fire and civil defence authority under the Bellwin scheme in section H, other grants, which is outside the cash limit on the vote.

All the increases will be offset either by savings or transfers from other Government Departments and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Nuclear Power

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what comparative studies he had initiated of the policies and principles informing the time scale for full dismantling of nuclear power generating plants in (a) the USA, (b) France and (c) Germany; and if he will make a statement. [31084]

Mr. Lang: None.

All UK nuclear power generating plants but one are gas cooled, whereas almost all the plants in the three countries identified are water cooled. There would, therefore, be little purpose in conducting such studies.

Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the advertising budget for nuclear privatisation in the current year; and what it has been in each of the last two years. [31142]

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 4 June 1996]: There was no expenditure on advertising for the privatisation of the nuclear industry in the year 1994–95. Actual expenditure on privatisation of the nuclear industry, including advertising, will be reported to Parliament in the normal way.

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what changes will be made to his Department's cash and running costs limits for 1996–97. [31801]

Mr. Lang: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary revised estimate, the cash limit for class IV, vote 1—programmes and administration—will be reduced by £8,416,000 from £1,310,071,000 to £1,301,655,000. This net reduction results from:

(i) the transfer on to the vote of the external financing limit of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority (–£5,600,000);

(ii) a reduction of expenditure on both international subscriptions (–£2,461,000) and consultancy (–£210,000) the sum of which will be used to find a non-voted increase in the external financing limit of Companies House; and

(iii) the transfer of responsibility for Southampton buildings to the Department of National Heritage (–£145,000).

Within this total, the gross running cost limit for the Department of Trade and Industry is being increased by £4,800,000 from £3,359,237,000 to £364,037,000. This change comprises:

(i) an adjustment in Insolvency Service fee income required for accounting purposes (£5,000,000); offset by transfers of provision to:

(ii) the Department of National Heritage (£145,000); and

(iii) the non-cash-limit agency and central services area of the vote (£55,000).

On a net basis, the Insolvency Service adjustment sums to zero as a fully compensating increase in receipts is also required.

Additionally; subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class IV, vote 12—Office of Gas Supply—will be increased by £2,000,000 from £5,743,000 to £7,743,000 and the running costs limit by £825,000 from £7,627,000 to £8,452,000.

The requirement for an increase results from the necessary costs associated with introduction of domestic competition and the transfer of the gas measurement branch from class IV, vote 1. This will involve expenditure on consultancy and staff related costs together with urgent expenditure on accommodation to comply with health and safety requirements.

The increase will be offset by savings or charged to the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Radiocommunications Agency

Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what targets he has set his Department's Radiocommunications Agency for 1996–97. [31799]

Mr. Lang: I have set my Department's Radiocommunications Agency the following quality of service targets for 1996–97 in respect of its licensing work and enforcement activities. These are in addition to achieving an overall efficiency improvement of 6 per cent. over 1995–96 and to continue to recover the full costs of its activities from customers.

Licensing

Category A: Licences that involve no frequency assignment, site clearance or international co-ordination; 100 per cent. of applications and amendments to be processed and despatched within five working days.

Category B: Licences that involve frequency assignment but no site clearance or international co-ordination; 90 per cent. of applications and amendments to be processed and despatched within 15 working days, with the remainder to be processed and despatched within 25 working days or an explanation for the delay provided to the applicant.

Category C: Licences that require frequency assignment and site clearance and/or international co-ordination, 90 per cent. of applications and amendments to be processed and despatched within 40 working days and the remainder to be processed and despatched within 60 working days or an explanation for the delay provided to the applicant.

Category D: Renewals of all licences in category A to be processed and despatched within 5 working days, renewals of licences in categories B and C to be processed and despatched within 10 working days.

Enforcement

100 per cent. of safety of life services complaints to be investigated within 24 hours;

98 per cent. of business complaints to be investigated within five days;

98 per cent. of domestic interference complaints to be investigated within one month.

I also expect the agency's enquiry point to improve its response rate to calls within 30 seconds to 92 per cent. and for 95 per cent. and for 95 per cent. of all invoices to be paid within 30 days, or within the timescale agreed with suppliers. In addition, the chief executive will continue to reply within 10 working days to all letters from Members of Parliament delegated to him for reply.

Worker Information and Consultation

Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will report on the consultation exercise recently undertaken by his Department in relation to the European Commission's communication on worker information and consultation. [31803]

Mr. Lang: I have today placed a summary of the responses to the consultation in the Library of the House, together with a copy of the Government's response to the European Commission's communication.

National Weights and Measures Laboratory

Mr. Dunn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what targets he has set his Department's National Weights and Measures Laboratory for 1996–97. [31800]

Mr. Lang: I have set National Weights and Measures Laboratory the following targets for 1996–97:

- to ensure that external fee-earning activities remain self-financing;
- to reduce the real cost of a programme hour by 1 per cent.;
- to complete 85 per cent. of European type approvals within 10 weeks;
- to complete 95 per cent. of all calibration jobs—including preparation of certificates—within 18 working days.

On moving to net running costs control, I expect NWML to meet its net vote target in 1996–97.

In addition, I expect the chief executive of NWML to continue to reply within 10 working days to all letters from Members of Parliament delegated to him for reply.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to visit the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement. [30259]

Mr. Lang [holding answer 22 May 1996]: Diary commitments preclude my visiting the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in the foreseeable future.

Information Society Initiative

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the operation of the two pilot schemes running in Manchester and Harlow under the information society initiative. [30728]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The information society initiative pilot local support centres at Manchester and Harlow are both open. The Manchester centre, based at the national computing centre, was formally opened on 13 February and the Harlow centre, which is based at the Harlow information and technology training centre, ITEC, was opened on 19 March 1996.

Both have facilities for businesses to get "hand-on" experience of using the Internet, world wide web, etcetera for commercial purposes, to encourage electronic commerce, and provide advice sessions and training courses for small businesses. Both are working with local business link partnerships in the development of services. The Manchester centre has been running training course for business link advisers and counsellors.

A countrywide network of local support centres will be established over the course of the information society initiative.

SOCIAL SECURITY

State Pensions

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the gross annual cost of increasing the basic state pension by (a) £5, (b) £10 and (c) £20 a week; what would be (x) the annual savings in means-tested benefits and (y) increased Treasury receipts from income tax if the basic state pension was increased by (i) £5, (ii) £10 and (iii) £20 a week; and what increase in national insurance contributions would be needed to meet the net cost from increasing the basic state pension by (1) £5, (2) £10 and (3) £20 a week. [30165]

Mr. Heald: The information is in the tables:

Cost and benefit effects of increases to basic state pension

1996–97 prices

£ billion

	Gross cost to national insurance fund	Saving in income related benefits	Increase in treasury income tax receipts
Basic retirement pension increased by £5	2.7	0.7	0.2
Basic retirement pension increased by £10	5.4	1.5	0.5
Basic retirement pension increased by £20	10.8	2.9	1.1

1. Estimates of cost to the national insurance fund are supplied by the Government Actuary's department.

2. Calculations are based on increasing basic retirement pension only and assume that increases are applied to all recipients of any basic RP.

3. Savings in income-related benefits are calculated using the policy simulation model 1996–97, based on the family expenditure surveys 1991, 1992 and 1993.

4. Income tax effects have been calculated by the Inland Revenue using a projection of the 1994 family expenditure survey and are provisional.

5. All cost are rounded to the nearest £100 million, 1996–97 prices.

Effects of increasing basic state pension on class 1 national insurance contribution rates

Percentage

	Employee main rate	Employer main rate
Current rates	10.0	10.2
Basic retirement pension increased by £5	10.8	10.7
Basic retirement pension increased by £10	11.6	11.3
Basic retirement pension increased by £20	13.4	12.4

1. Rates are rounded to the nearest 0.1 per cent.

2. The new contribution rates are derived by maintaining equity between the burden of extra contributions borne by the employee and the employer for an employee on average earnings.

Child Benefit

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the types of non-advanced courses which are recognised for the purpose of claiming child benefit for a child aged between 16 and 19 years. [30240]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of child benefit is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Peter L. Pike, dated 4 June 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking if he will list the types of non-advanced courses which are recognised for the purpose of claiming child benefit for a child aged between 16 and 19 years.

There are nearly 90 courses of education which are classed as non-advanced. They include GCE "A" level, GCSE and SCE Higher Grade or equivalent, GNVQ/NVQ levels 1,2 and 3, B/TEC National Diploma, SCOTVEC National Certificate of 6th Year Studies, Foundation art course and secretarial course with GCSE entry. Others, such as Pathway, Horizon and Gateway, can be grouped together under "Special Needs" courses. The remainder can be grouped together as "Job Specific".

This would include courses such as Hotel and Catering, Travel and Tourism.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Child Support Agency

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what monitoring the Child Support Agency undertakes (a) of the number of its clients who become insolvent following its intervention and (b) of the change in the number of clients becoming insolvent; and what procedures the agency adopts to avoid a client becoming insolvent following its intervention. [30692]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the chief executive, Miss Ann Chant. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Miss Ann Chant to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 4 June 1996:

I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Child Support Agency clients.

No formal records are kept of the number of clients who report that they have become insolvent following contact with the Agency, nor does the Agency petition for bankruptcy.

Absent parents are always left with at least 70% of their income (67% if paying arrears) after a child maintenance assessment has been made. It should also be remembered that it could be the parent with care who has been made insolvent because legally due child maintenance has not been paid.

The Agency has a legal liability to enforce maintenance payments in suitable cases even if it reaches the stage of court proceedings, to protect the interest of the taxpayer and the parent with care.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the numbers and percentages of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the numbers and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30555]

Mr. Burt: The information is set out in the tables:

Permanent staff in post at 1 April 1996

	Number
Male	31,709
Female	65,797

Principal grades

Grade	Total staff	Total women	Percentage women

Staff numbers in grades not regarded as either principal or administrative, e.g. support grade bands 1 and 2

Total staff	Total women	Percentage women
3,089	1,896	61.4

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures. [30772]

Mr. Burt: The Department employs 1,675 registered disabled people. This represents 1.8 per cent. of the total number of staff employed by this Department.

Benefits Agency

Ms Coffey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the savings to the Benefits Agency of the arrangements whereby mail hand-delivered to the agency in Stockport is re-delivered to that agency by the Royal Mail via Crewe. [31054]

Mr. Roger Evans: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Ms Ann Coffey, dated 4 June 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what assessment he has made of the savings to the Benefits Agency (BA) of the arrangements whereby mail hand-delivered to the Agency in Stockport is re-delivered to that Agency by the Royal Mail via Crewe.

As part of the 'Competing for Quality' initiative the BA has market tested its accommodation and office services, which includes arrangements for the collection, sorting and opening of post. The in-house team won the contract and sub-contracted the post opening service for the Greater Manchester Area to Royal Mail.

This means that as District Office staff are no longer involved in the post opening process they can now concentrate on the core business of the Agency, which is the processing of benefits.

All BA offices in Manchester have external boxes where our customers can hand-deliver items of post. All post is opened by Royal Mail and distributed across the District within 24 hours. There are notices on the external boxes telling customers at what times the boxes are emptied.

The post opening arrangements are just one of a whole package of services delivered under the accommodation and office services contracts and therefore it is not possible to attribute a financial saving to one specific task within the package.

However, it is estimated that savings of 29 per cent. will be made for the whole of the Greater Manchester area in respect of accommodation and office services, which include post opening, over the duration of the contract.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks) of 15 May, Official Report column 451 (1) how many home visits were made by Benefits Agency staff for the periods (a) April 1980 to April 1984, (b) April 1985 to April 1989, (c) April 1990 to April 1991 and (d) April 1992 to April 1994; [31089]

(2) if he will make a statement on the discrepancy between the figures quoted in the answer and the answer given to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) on 19 July 1995, Official Report, column 1503. [31090]

Mr. Evans: The information is not available in the format requested as figures on some areas of work are not collated nationally. Such information as is available is set out in the table:

The error in the written answer given to the hon. Member for Garscadden related to the number of effective supplementary benefit visits for April 1979 to March 1980. This was due to a clerical error and resulted from double counting of data.

The table also includes data on effective contributory benefit visits in 1979–80 and 1984–85 which were erroneously omitted from my written answer of 15 May to the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Banks).

	Effective supplementary benefit/income support visits	Effective contributory benefit visits
18 April 1979—15 April 1980	—	428,784
16 April 1980—14 April 1981	3,490,320	309,094
15 April 1981—13 April 1982	3,554,302	220,495
14 April 1982—12 April 1983	3,385,476	180,068
13 April 1983—10 April 1984	3,515,234	128,778
11 April 1984—9 April 1985	—	129,627
10 April 1985—8 April 1986	2,356,203	129,664
9 April 1986—7 April 1987	1,578,038	352,728
8 April 1987—8 April 1988	1,228,694	174,653
11 April 1988—31 March 1989	960,746	n/a
April 1990—March 1991	580,900	n/a
April 1992—March 1993	509,722	n/a
April 1993—March 1994	505,507	n/a

1. The table includes supplementary benefit and income support visits for all the periods requested and contributory benefits visits for April 1980 to April 1988.

2. The contributory benefits figures include visits made to employers in relation to national insurance contributions.

3. Information is not available for contributory benefits for 1988–89, 1990–91, 1992–93 and 1993–94 as there were no figures collated for this period.

4. Data in respect of periods prior to 1989 may not be directly these comparable with one in respect of later periods as the Benefits Agency no longer holds detailed guidance on interpretation of the earlier data.

5. Contributory benefit data were not collected for the period April 1990 to March 1994.

6. Data are provisional and subject to amendment.

Access Committee for England

Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he plans to make a statement on the review of the role of the Access Committee for England. [31735]

Mr. Burt: I am pleased that the review acknowledged the valuable work undertaken by the Access Committee for England in providing a forum for discussion that involves all interested parties and in fostering local access groups. The review also found that the committee's ministerial advisory role had worked less well. This finding, allied with the setting up of the National Disability Council to advise the Government on issues relating to discrimination against disabled people, has persuaded me and my hon. Friends the Minister for Construction, Planning and Energy Efficiency and the Under-Secretary for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Bowis), that this aspect of ACE's work should cease. We have therefore agreed to offer funding for the committee for two years from April 1996 to allow time for it to continue to develop those areas where it has proved most effective. These arrangements will be reviewed before the end of that period.

This revised remit will enable ACE to focus more clearly on promoting the accessibility to disabled people of buildings and of indoor and outdoor environments—including housing—by:

- actively promoting the formation of local access groups and providing them with advice and support;
- providing a focal point for information on access matters for individual disabled people and others, referring them where appropriate to other agencies;
- consulting and offering practical advice on access matters to local government associations, industrial and commercial representative organisations, professional bodies, voluntary organisations and other interested groups; and
- advising local authorities and other agencies which may be considering the designation of access officers.

In view of the committee's changed role, I shall no longer have any responsibility for appointing members or determining its constitution.

Family Credit

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he proposes to implement the measure he announced in November 1995 to terminate payment of family credit when the last remaining dependent child in a family leaves full-time education. [31736]

Mr. Roger Evans: I am today laying before the House the Family Credit (General) Amendment Regulations 1996, which will give effect to that measure, and the associated report of the Social Security Committee with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's response to it. The regulations, subject to negative resolution, will come into effect from 2 July 1996.

Lone Parents

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish the Social Security Advisory Committee's report about his proposals to restructure benefits for lone parents and his response to it. [31796]

Mr. Lilley: I am today publishing the committee's report and my response to it, together with draft regulations. From April 1997, the lone parent premium in the income-related benefits will be replaced by an additional element to be incorporated into the family premium. One parent benefit will be replaced by an additional element to be incorporated into the main child benefit rates. The benefits system is relatively more generous to lone parents than to couples. The regulations will provide a more flexible mechanism for adjusting the relative level of support provided to these different types of households. I intend, over time, and without cash losses to individuals, to narrow the gap between benefits that go to lone parents and those that go to couples.

Housing Benefit Fraud

Mr. Bernard Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish a response to the third report of the Social Security Committee of Session 1995–96 on housing benefit fraud HC 90. [31797]

Mr. Lilley: I have today laid copies of the Government's response to the Social Security Select Committee's report "Housing Benefit Fraud" before the House and copies have been placed in the Library. I am also announcing two new measures to reinforce our anti-fraud initiatives. First, we will be setting up a ministerial group on countering benefit fraud, which will focus on cross-Government action and include all Departments with a role in tackling benefit fraud.

Secondly, there will be an improved flow of information from Inland Revenue to DSS officials under section 122 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992. The development of data matching to combat serious social security fraud means that the undertaking to limit the transfer of information, given on 22 April 1986, Official Report, column 1603, should be relaxed.

Taken together with other measures, these represent a further considerable step forward in our fight to stop benefit fraud.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Housing Benefit Fraud

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals have been successfully prosecuted for fraudulent claims relating to housing benefit in each year since 1991; what assessment he has made of the correlation between the number of criminal prosecutions for fraudulent claims of housing benefit and the total amount of housing benefit fraud; and what joint initiatives he has undertaken with the Department of Social Security on the matter. [29970]

Mr. Maclean: It is not possible from the information held centrally by my Department to identify offences relating to fraudulent claims of housing benefit from other summary offences.

There are no joint initiatives between the Home Office and the Department of Social Security on this matter.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence he has evaluated of links between organised crime and systematic abuse of the housing benefit system. [30450]

Mr. Maclean: Organised criminals have been involved in serious fraud against the benefit system, including housing benefit. The National Criminal Intelligence Service and the police are working closely with other agencies to identify and tackle this type of crime.

Police Morale

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to improve the morale of Britain's police officers. [30451]

Mr. Maclean: Morale is high, and will continue to improve as a consequence of the Government's effective policies to combat crime and deter criminals, and the continued significant investment in the police service.

Domestic Burglaries

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the clear-up rate of recorded domestic burglaries in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands for each year since 1990; and for each year what was the percentage change on (i) the previous year and (ii) 1990. [30647]

Mr. Maclean: Information for Coventry is not collected centrally. Figures for the west midlands are given in the table.

Clear-up rate for offences of burglary in a dwelling recorded by the police in the west midlands

Year	Clear-up rate (percentage)	Percentage point change on previous year	Percentage point change over 1990
1990	39	[1]—	[1]—
1991	31	–8	–8
1992	24	–7	–15
1993	31	+7	–8
1994	32	+1	–7
1995	38	+6	–1

[1] Not applicable.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average value of items stolen in recorded domestic house break-ins in 1995 in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands. [30648]

Mr. Maclean: Information for Coventry is not collected centrally. The available information for the west midlands is for 1994. For offences of burglary in a dwelling where property was stolen, the average value was £1,054.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many recorded domestic burglaries there were in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands in each year since 1990; and for each year, what was the percentage change on (i) the previous year and (ii) 1990. [30659]

Mr. Maclean: Information for Coventry is not collected centrally. The available information for the west midlands is given in the table.

Offences of burglary in a dwelling recorded by the police in the west midlands

Year	Number of offences	Percentage change on previous year	Percentage change over 1990
1990	35,613	[1]—	[1]—
1991	41,624	+17	+17
1992	52,202	+25	+47
1993	51,815	–1	+45
1994	48,241	–7	+35
1995	46,368	–4	+30

Private Investigators

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what use his Department has made of private detective agencies or investigators during 1995–96 and 1994–95; what agencies have been employed; for what purposes; and at what cost to his Department. [30561]

Mr. Howard: The Home Office and its agencies did not employ private detective agencies or investigators for detective or investigative work during 1995–96 and 1994–95. However, during 1995–96, three companies were employed by the Prison Service to carry out pre-occupation searches of establishments following construction work etc. It is understood that these companies carry out private investigative work for other organisations.

The companies in question are:

Network Security Management

Pinkerton Consultancy and Investigation

Sigma Projects

Payments made to these companies by the Prison Service for search activities during 1995–96 total £188,000.

Car Theft

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the clear-up rate for recorded car theft in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands in each year since 1990; and for each year, what was the percentage change on (i) the previous year and (ii) 1990. [30655]

Mr. Maclean: Information for Coventry is not collected centrally. The available information for West Midlands is given in the table.

Clear-up rate for offences of theft of a vehicle recorded by the police in the west midlands

Year	Clear up rate (percentage)	Percentage point change on previous year	Percentage point change over 1990

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average value of items recorded as stolen from cars in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands for the latest available year.[30658]

Mr. Maclean: Information for Coventry is not collected centrally. The available information for the west midlands is for 1994. For offences of theft from a motor vehicle where property was stolen, the average value was £279.

Mr. Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average age of people convicted of (a) car theft and (b) burglary in the west midlands in the latest year for which statistics are available. [30649]

Mr. Maclean: Information for 1994 on the number of offenders convicted at all courts in the West Midlands police force area by age is given in the table.

Data for 1995 will not be available until the autumn.

Buckley Hall Prison

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff have left the employment of Group 4 at Buckley Hall since the prison opened. [30677]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 5 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Question about the numbers of staff who have left the employment of Group 4 at Buckley Hall prison since it opened.

Since the prison opened there have been twenty eight resignations and two redundancies.

Trooping of the Colour

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will request (a) the Metropolitan police and (b) Buckingham palace authorities to move the trooping of the colour ceremony on 15 June to 16 June to avoid a clash with the England v Scotland Euro 96 cup match at Wembley. [31026]

Mr. Maclean: Arrangements for both events, including appropriate security measures, are far advanced and I am confident that the Metropolitan Police Commissioner will allocate resources in the most appropriate way in order to ensure that any problems of crime and disorder in London will be dealt with.

Prison Escapes

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) escapes and (b) attempted escapes there have been at each male category C prison since 14 December 1994. [30807]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Ms Liz Lynne, dated 5 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question asking how many (a) escapes; and (b) attempted escapes there have been at each male category C prison since 14 December 1994.

The following table shows the position as at 18 May 1996.

Civil Defence Grant

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the total expenditure in 1996–97 approved as eligible for civil defence grant aid for (a) London FCDA, (b) Hounslow London borough, (c) Newham London borough, (d) Hull unitary authority, (e) North Lincoln unitary authority, (f) North East Lincoln unitary authority and (g) East Riding of Yorkshire unitary authority. [31087]

Mr. Sackville: The information is as follows:

London fire and civil defence authority	388,000
Hounslow London borough council	35,000
Newham London borough council	35,000
East Riding unitary authority	266,000
Hull unitary authority	East Riding acts as host authority
North Lincolnshire	East Riding acts as host authority
North East Lincolnshire	East Riding acts as host authority

Sexual Offences Against Children

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of prisoners convicted of sexual offences against children were re-convicted for a sexual offence against a child within two years of their discharge from prison in each year since 1980 for which figures are available. [30783]

Miss Widdecombe: Offenders who are convicted of sexual offences against a child can be charged with any one of a number of offences. The legal categories of sexual offence do not always differentiate between child and adult victims. This means that the information requested is not centrally available.

Driving Offences

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the average fine levied for drivers in the last year who (a) do not have insurance and (b) have not stopped after an accident; what assessment he has made of the desirability of a review of the penalties for such offences; and if he will make a statement. [31163]

Mr. Maclean: The average fine imposed for the offence of using a motor vehicle uninsured against third party risks at all courts in England and Wales in 1994—the latest year for which figures are available—was £209. For the offence of failing to stop after an accident it was £133.

For both offences the maximum fine is £5,000, accompanied by obligatory licence endorsement and discretionary disqualification. In addition, for failing to stop after an accident, a sentence of up to six months' imprisonment can be imposed. The Government are satisfied that these penalties adequately reflect the seriousness of the two offences, but remain committed to keeping all penalties under review to ensure that they remain appropriate.

Mr. Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases in each of the last five years there have been where a motorist is found not to have the legal insurance required. [31164]

Mr. Maclean: The available information relates to the number of findings of guilt for using a motor vehicle uninsured against third party risks in England and Wales, and is as follows:

Findings of guilt for using a motor vehicle uninsured against third party risks in England and Wales

Year	Number
1990	209,463
1991	225,910
1992	246,054
1993	281,136
1994	286,252

Figures for 1995 are not yet available.

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for changes to the 1996–97 cash and running costs limits within his responsibilities. [31593]

Mr. Howard: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary revised and supplementary estimates, the cash limit for class VII, vote 1—Home Office administration, police, probation, immigration and other services, England and Wales—will be decreased by £14,447,000 from £4,611,752,000 to £4,597,305,000 and the cash limit on class VII, vote 2—prisons, England and Wales—will be increased by £589,000 from £1,521,081,000 to £1,521,670,000. This decrease in the cash limit for vote 1 is the net effect of transfers to the Department for National Heritage, the Cabinet Office and the Prison Service Agency, class VII, vote 2. The increase in provision for vote 2 is the net effect of the delegation from Home Office central services, class VII, vote 1, of office support services, reclassification of some refunds of value added tax for business activity and of the running cost element of the Parole Board's costs when it becomes an executive non-departmental body.

The Home Office running cost limit will be decreased by £584,000 from £1,802,065,000 to £1,801,481,000.

Passport Agency

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how the United Kingdom Passport Agency performed against its targets in 1995–96; and what performance targets he has set for the agency in 1996–97. [27769]

Mr. Kirkhope [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1996, column 431]: I am pleased to say that the United Kingdom Passport Agency achieved all its targets in 1995–96. The targets for processing properly completed straightforward applications were met despite a 20 per cent. increase in demand for passport services with an average turnround time for the whole year of 6.1 working days, well within the average target of seven working days. The Passport Agency's financial target was to reduce its unit cost by 5 per cent. in real terms. The latest indications are that the agency has achieved a 7.25 per cent. real terms reduction in its unit cost. Another notable achievement was the re-award of the Chartermark in December 1995.

During 1996–97, I shall expect the Passport Agency to continue to improve its standard of service to the public, while seeking further efficiency savings in its operations.

I have set the agency the following key targets:

1. to process properly completed straightforward applications within a maximum of 15 working days between April and October 1996, and 10 working days from 1 November 1996 onwards.
2. to reduce unit costs by a further 3 per cent. in real terms in comparison with the outturn for 1995–96.

The chief executive will remain directly accountable to me for the performance of the Passport Agency. An advisory board, including two private sector members with experience of delivering services to the public, will continue to provide me with an independent assessment of the agency's performance.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 20, how many (a) unconditional on-demand bonds, (b) performance bonds, (c) parent company guarantees, (d) advance payment bonds and (e) retention bonds were required by his Department in the last five years. [31235]

Mr. Howard [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The information required to answer this question is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost to the Metropolitan police of kennelling dogs detained under the terms of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 in each year since 1991. [31075]

Mr. Maclean [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The following is the information requested:

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

China

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what discussions her Department had with the Chinese Minister for the State Family Planning Commission during her visit to Britain on 17 and 18 May on (a) the male to female birth ratio and (b) covert abortions and sterilisations in China; [30758]

(2) what assurances were sought from the Chinese Minister for the State Family Planning Commission during her recent visit to Britain that there would be a halt to coercive birth control policies in Tibet and China. [31092]

Mr. Hanley: In her meeting with Mrs. Peng Peiyun, Chinese State Councillor with responsibilities that include family planning, Baroness Chalker of Wallasey discussed UK concerns about human rights abuses, such as forced sterilisations and abortions, in the implementation of Chinese family planning policy. In order that such informal contacts continue to be constructive, ODA believes that it is not appropriate to release details of these discussions.

HIV and AIDS Funding

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which United Kingdom based non-governmental organisations have been allocated funding for HIV and AIDS programmes for (a) 1993–94, (b) 1994–95 and (c) 1995–96. [30229]

Mr. Hanley: UK-based NGOs receiving funding for specified HIV/AIDS programmes in developing countries 1993–94 to 1995–96 are as follows:

1993–94

Agency for Cooperation and Research in Development (ACORD)
Action Aid
Appropriate Health Resources and Technology Action Group (AHRTAG)

Many other UK NGOs receive funds to implement community development and health programmes which will influence the well-being of people exposed to or affected by HIV.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proportion of the £39.3 million allocated specifically for HIV/AIDS in 1995–96 was distributed through (a) multilateral agencies, (b) bilateral agencies and (c) non-governmental organisations. [30230]

Mr. Hanley: The table gives a breakdown of the £39.3 million allocated to HIV/AIDS–related activities in 1995–96 by spending channel.

Spending channel	HIV/AIDS spend £ million	Per cent. of spend
Bilateral	33.815	86.0
Multilateral	5.035	12.8
Non-governmental organisations	0.450	1.2
Total expenditure	39.3	100.0

In addition, a significant number of reproductive health projects approved during this period include prevention of HIV transmission as one of several objectives.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Exports and Imports

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the value of (a) exports from and (b) imports to Northern Ireland in each of the last five years for which figures are complete. [30828]

Mr. Ancram: Statistics on Northern Ireland's exports are currently available only for the financial years 1991–92, 1992–93, 1993–94 and 1994–95 and are provided. These are taken from a survey undertaken on behalf of the Department of Economic Development and the Industrial Development Board by the Northern Ireland Economic Research Centre and published on 1 May 1996.

Statistics on imports to Northern Ireland are not available.

Year	Exports £ million (excluding sales to GB)
1991–92	1,784
1992–93	1,980
1993–94	2,175
1994–95	2,637

Nursery Voucher Scheme

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which standards which apply to the provision of nursery education will be relaxed under the voucher scheme. [30476]

Mr. Ancram: I do not propose to relax any standards applying to the provision of nursery education.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate he has made of (a) the number of children who will qualify for nursery vouchers and (b) the lengths of time they will be qualified. [30481]

Mr. Ancram: I estimate that approximately 19,500 children annually will be eligible for a voucher. The length of time for which they will be eligible will depend on the date of their fourth birthday. For planning purposes we have assumed the following distribution:

Three terms: 4,400 children

Two terms: 8,600 children

One term: 6,500 children

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many inspectors are competent and qualified to investigate provision under the nursery voucher scheme; and what proposals he has to increase these numbers. [30482]

Mr. Ancram: At present five inspectors of the Department of Education's inspectorate are competent and qualified to inspect provision under the nursery voucher scheme.

Arrangements are being made for the recruitment of up to five additional specialist inspectors of pre-school education.

Pre-five Services

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he collates on the provision on (a) public and (b) private provision of pre-five services apart from those in state nursery schools and nursery classes. [30480]

Mr. Moss: The Department of Health and Social Services collates information on the number of day nursery, play group and child-minding places available in public facilities provided by health and social services boards and private facilities registered with health and social services trusts.

At 31 March 1995, the latest date for which figures are available, the position was as follows:

Type of facility	Number of premises	Average available places
Day nursery
Public	4	81
Private	104	3,083
Total	108	3,164
Play group
Public	10	270
Private	624	15,539
Total	634	15,809
Child-minding
Private	4,225	16,564

School Meals

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he has taken to improve the nutritional value of schools meals since receiving the report of the school meals project in December 1995; and if he will make a statement on his proposals for future action. [30477]

Mr. Ancram: Following consultation with the Department of Health and Social Services and the Health Promotion Agency, the Department of Education has accepted that the existing nutritional guidelines for school meals should be reviewed having regard to the guidelines issued by the Committee on the Medical Aspects of Food Policy. A working group has been set up to take this review forward. The Department for Education and Employment is in the process of preparing voluntary nutritional guidelines for school meals in England and Wales and the working group will be liaising closely with DfEE to ensure that all available information is taken into account before final guidelines are issued.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has for education expenditure under the private finance initiative. [30478]

Sir John Wheeler: Two PFI projects for the provision of new accommodation at the North West Institute for Higher and Further Education and for the development of a new visitors centre at the Ulster Folk and Transport Museum have been advertised in the Official Journal of the European Community. The Department of Education is also considering projects under the PFI for schools, other further eduction colleges, higher education institutions, libraries and its periphery activities.

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the numbers involved in the youth training scheme, the completion rate, the qualifications achieved and the numbers who are in or moved on to full-time work. [30379]

Mr. Ancram: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Ian Walters. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Ian Walters to Mr. Tony Worthington, dated 5 June 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me, as Chief Executive of the Training and Employment Agency to reply to your question.

In the year ended 31 March 1996, a total of 10,543 young people aged 16 and 17 years entered the Agency's Jobskills training programme which was introduced in Northern Ireland on 3 April 1995 to replace the Youth Training and Job Training Programmes. During that period 3,534 left without completing their programme, of whom 1,620 (46%) entered employment, full-time education or another form of training.

Training periods in the new programme range from 39 weeks to 156 weeks depending on the occupational area and level of qualification being followed. The large majority of young people did not join the programme until after 30 June 1995, the single school leaving date in Northern Ireland. More than 90% of the trainees are in training programmes lasting 52 weeks ore more and will not complete their training until 30 June 1996 at the earliest. Information on completion rates, qualifications achieved and numbers of trainees moving into employment will be available in due course.

However, I can provide data from the Jobskills pilot programme which operated in two areas of Northern Ireland from 1 September 1992 to 31 March 1995. A total of 7,311 people, including 4,417 young people started training in the pilot programmes. In excess of 50% of those who joined these programmes achieved a full National Vocational Qualification at Level 2 or above. To date, 68% of those who left the pilot programmes have found employment.

The figures for residual trainees in the Youth Training Programme for the year ended 31 March 1996 show that 29.8% of leavers achieved a NVQ at Level 2 or above. 7,089 young people left the programme during this period of whom 3,312 (65%) entered employment and 210 (4%) full-time education.

I hope you find this helpful.

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about the 1996–97 running costs limit for the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments. [31798]

Sir John Wheeler: The gross running cost limit for 1996–97 for the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments is £787,695,000. Details of the provision for individual Northern Ireland Departments are set out in the Northern Ireland estimates published today and are available in the Library.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his Department's policy on the use of performance bonds; in what circumstances they are used; what was the total sum paid by bond in each of the last five years; and if his Department requires bonds from businesses with fewer than (a) 100, (b) 50 and (c) 20 employees. [29500]

Sir John Wheeler [holding answer 20 May 1996]: The Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments' policy on the use of performance bonds is in accordance with HM Treasury central unit on procurement's guidance on bonds and guarantees.

The potential exists for demanding performance bonds in the allocation of construction contracts. The facility has been used by the Department of the Environment's roads service, which requests performance bonds for all contracts costing £200,000 or more which are awarded by open contract. For contracts less than £200,000, bonds may be requested where there is concern about the capacity of the lowest tenderers to perform the contracts. The roads service has had no occasion to receive payments by bond in the last five years.

The number of staff employed by businesses is not a factor in deciding whether a bond is necessary.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cattle Slaughter Scheme

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the capacity of incinerators in the United Kingdom to dispose of culled cattle. [30412]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced in the House on 16 April that cull cows would be rendered and the resultant material disposed of by the best practical environmental option. At present there are 10 incinerators approved to burn suspect BSE cases, with an estimated capacity of 40,000 carcases per annum. Some of the limited spare capacity available in these incinerators is being used to be dispose of casualty over 30-month animals which are slaughtered on-farm.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the alternatives his Department has assessed other than incineration, for the disposal of culled cattle, indicating the reasons for their rejection. [30413]

Mr. Boswell [holding answer 21 May 1996]: The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food announced in the House on 16 April, Official Report, columns 513-16, that cattle over 30 months would be rendered and the resultant material disposed of by the best practical environmental option. The Government have since been working intensively with the trade to examine means of disposal of the material derived from rendered carcases. A number of options for the eventual disposal of meat and bonemeal are under active consideration and in all cases full weight will be given to protection of the environment. These options include incineration, use as fuel in power generation and eventual landfill.

Agriculture Council

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Luxembourg on 3 and 4 June; and if he will make a statement. [31740]

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I represented the United Kingdom at the Agriculture Council on 3 and 4 June in Luxembourg. I was accompanied by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Welsh Office, and my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Scottish Office.

The Council considered the proposal by the Commission to lift the EU-wide export ban on United Kingdom produced gelatine, tallow and bull semen. This proposal had failed to attract a qualified majority in the EU Standing Veterinary Committee on 20 May, and the Commission therefore submitted it to the Council for a decision. The proposal was supported in the Council by nine member states but as this did not amount to a qualified majority, the Agriculture Commissioner announced that the Commission would implement the proposal under its own powers. It is likely that this will take effect from 10 June.

I presented to the Agriculture Council the United Kingdom's comprehensive eradication programme for BSE, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. I expect that the programme will be examined in detail by EU veterinary experts in the near future.

The Council also discussed a proposal from the Commission to increase the payments to EU beef producers by way of top-ups to the 1995 beef special premium and suckler cow premium schemes in order to give some urgent income support to those affected by the BSE crisis. The proposal envisages in addition an allocation of Community funds to member states, based on the size of the national beef herd, to provide further assistance to beef producers according to national priorities. The proposal also provides for an increase in the age limit for calves brought forward under the calf processing scheme. Ministers in the Council welcomed the Commission's proposal, though recognised that, pending an opinion from the European Parliament, it could not be formally adopted. It will be discussed further at the Agriculture Council meeting on 24 and 25 June.

The Presidency also undertook further bilateral contacts with member states on the reform of the EU fruit and vegetable regime. It is expected that, in the light of these discussions, a compromise proposal will be put before the late June Agriculture Council meeting.

Set-aside Land

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how he proposes to implement the EU Commission regulation authorising the United Kingdom to permit cattle aged over 30 months to graze on set-aside land. [31741]

Mr. Baldry: I welcome the Commission's agreement to our request to allow cattle to graze set-aside land in view of the difficulties currently facing our cattle farmers. The relevant Commission regulation, which is expected to come into force shortly and will run until 31 August, requires the United Kingdom authorities to take the measures necessary to ensure that only cattle aged over 30 months are permitted to graze set-aside and that the existing rules restricting lucrative use of set-aside land are observed. We shall therefore be laying before Parliament a statutory instrument subject to negative resolution procedure which will require those farmers wishing to take advantage of this facility to return a simple form to their agriculture departments. The instrument will also enable authorised persons to inspect cattle on set-aside land to ensure compliance with the regulations.

Producers may allow another farmer's cattle to graze their set-aside, but they may not receive any payment in cash or kind for the use of the set-aside as grazing.

We will be writing to all cattle farmers early next week explaining how they can take advantage of this provision. Farmers should not begin to graze cattle on set-aside until receipt of their notification form has been acknowledged by their agriculture departments as to do so would jeopardise set-aside payments and associated crop area aid payments.

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what changes are proposed to his Department's running costs and cash limits for 1996–97. [31831]

Mr. Baldry: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate the cash limit for the Intervention Board Executive Agency (class III vote 1 section B) will be increased by £9,388,00 from £47,429,000 to £56,817,000. The increases are to cover the administration costs associated with the implementation of emergency measures to protect against bovine spongiform encephalopathy in the United Kingdom. Capital will be increased by £370,000 to £1,979,000 and agents' services by £6,715,000 to £18,427,000.

The running cost cash limit for the Intervention Board executive agency will be increased by £2,303,000 from £34,515,000 to £36,818,000 to reflect the additional costs of operating BSE measures in the UK.

The increase will be charged to the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimate, the cash limit for class III, vote 2—Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food: departmental research, advisory services and administration, executive agencies and certain other services—will be increased by £206,700,000 from £704,618,000 to £911,318,000. The £206,700,000 all relates to additional responsibilities arising in response to the BSE crisis. The gross running costs limit for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be increased by £50,066,000 from £304,702,000 to £354,768,000.

The increase will be charged to the reserve and will not, therefore, add to the planned total of public expenditure.

SCOTLAND

Vandalism and Burglary (Shops)

19. Mr. Congdon: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps are being taken to protect shopkeepers and shops in Scottish cities and towns from vandalism and burglary. [30090]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Two key steps are "Operation Shopkeep", which is a campaign specifically against crime facing small shopkeepers, and our £4 million closed circuit television challenge competition, which will extend closed circuit television to more communities in Scotland.

Housing, Glasgow

20. Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whn he intends to meet Glasgow city council to discuss housing conditions. [30092]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: I last met representatives of Glasgow city council on 21 March 1996 to discuss housing. In addition, I met a number of hon. Members representing Glasgow constituencies on 14 February to discuss housing matters.

Education Assistance

21. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assistance he can give to ensure that children aged 16 years or over are not discouraged from staying on in full-time education. [30093]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: We are already developing a new system of courses and assessment, Higher Still, to give all young people from age 16 the opportunity to study and gain relevant qualifications to the highest standard they can reach.

Financial support is available for this age group through child benefit and bursaries amounting to over £91 million.

Primary Schools

22. Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was spent per pupil in primary schools in Scotland in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what was the figure in 1978–79 at constant prices. [30094]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Current expenditure per primary pupil in 1993–94 was £1,773. That is 58 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1978–79.

Party Conferences

23. Mr. Robert Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland who is responsible for meeting the cost of security for political party conferences. [30095]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Under section 170 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 my right hon. Friend may contribute towards the cost of security at each qualifying party's main annual conference. Policing costs incurred on all party conferences are met from the budget of the police authority or joint board concerned, with the assistance of police specific grant, normally at 51 per cent. of the budget, from the Scottish Office.

Inward Investment

26. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to attract inward investment to Scotland. [30098]

Mr. Kynoch: Locate in Scotland will continue to promote Scotland's advantages as a business location, working in partnership with the local enterprise companies and other bodies in both the public and private sectors. Its resources will be targeted on those markets which generate the strongest flows of outward investment and where Scotland's competitive strengths make it an attractive location.

28. Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact of Scottish inward investment on Scotland's economy. [30100]

Mr. Kynoch: Inward investment has been—and continues to be—a very important element in the Scottish economy. Not only does it create new jobs but it helps introduce new technologies and new management practices, generates wealth, contributes significantly to our exports and creates opportunities for subcontractors and suppliers, many of which are indigenous companies.

30. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about inward investment into Scotland. [30103]

Mr. Kynoch: 1995–96 was another very successful year for inward investment in Scotland. Locate in Scotland and the Scottish Office Education and Industry Department helped to attract to Scotland 84 inward investment projects involving planned investment of nearly £1 billion and the expected creation or safeguarding of over 12,500 jobs.

Homelessness

27. Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of homeless people in Scotland in 1996; and what was the equivalent figure in 1986. [30099]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: In 1994–95, the most recent year for which figures are available, 25,100 households were assessed as homeless by Scottish local authorities following applications under the homeless persons legislation. The corresponding figure for 1986–87 was 10,600.

Nursery Education

29. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children aged three to five years are currently in education; at what cost; what were the equivalent figures in (a) 1976 and (b) 1986; and if he will make a statement. [30102]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: At September 1994, the total number of children in education in Scotland aged three to five years, inclusive, was 125,720. The equivalent figures for 1976 and 1986 were 118,455 and 117,428 respectively. Information on costs is not available in the form requested.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

31. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received about the Scottish beef industry; and if he will make a statement. [30104]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my noble Friend the Minister with responsibility for agriculture, forestry and environment have received many representations about the state of the Scottish beef industry from all sectors, including the National Farmers Union, the Scottish Association of Meat Wholesalers, the Auctioneers Association, Transport haulier associations, individual companies and farmers affected by the BSE crisis.

33. Mr. Michael J. Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement regarding compensation to those companies which have lost business in the meat industry. [30106]

Mr. Robertson: The Government have not sought to provide compensation for any individual or company that has lost business. The package of measures introduced is designed to provide support to the vital parts of the beef chain to help restore consumer confidence, and to get the whole sector moving again.

Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 23 April, Official Report, column 129, on the incidences of BSE within East Kilbride and Lanarkshire, when he plans to place the information requested in the Library. [31229]

Mr. Robertson [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The information was placed in the Library of the House on 23 May 1996.

Tenants' Rights

32. Mr. Norman Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on tenants' rights; and if he will make a statement. [30105]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: The Government are committed to protecting and strengthening the rights of tenants through legislation and through the implementation of the commitments made in the tenants charter for Scotland.

National Health Service

34. Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to reduce bureaucracy in the NHS; and if he will make a statement. [30107]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: NHS trusts and health boards in Scotland have been asked to reduce their administration costs by at least 5 per cent. in 1996–97 and to contain their total management costs to £10 per head of weighted population in 1997–98. This is expected to release around £25 million a year for investment in patient care.

Local Government Finance

16. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the benefits of the current block grant system for the public finances in Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [30087]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The block and formula arrangements have resulted in a spending level over 35 per cent. higher per head than England.

35. Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average expenditure per head by local authorities in Scotland in 1995–96; and what was the United Kingdom average figure. [30108]

Mr. Kynoch: Comprehensive outturn data for 1995–96 are not yet available. However, on the basis of budgeted expenditure data, the relevant Scottish figure is £1,270 and that for Great Britain is £970. A figure for the UK as a whole would not be meaningful because local authorities in Northern Ireland provide a far narrower range of services.

Sir Irvine Patnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about his review of local authority spending. [30101]

Mr. Kynoch: Our current timetable is to award a contract, or contracts, for the study of local government current expenditure later this month. We hope that the study will be completed by the end of the year and that the results will inform a more rational debate about the levels of local authority expenditure.

Health and Social Services

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make an official visit to the Scottish borders to discuss health and social services. [30089]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I would be very happy to receive an invitation to do so.

Scottish Record Office

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the targets he expects the Scottish Record Office to achieve in 1996–97. [31594]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have set the Scottish Record Office the following key targets for 1996–97:

- to reduce the unit cost of preserving and making available the records of Scotland by 10 per cent. in real terms;
- to increase the number of catalogue entries available for public scrutiny on the electronic system by 46,000;
- to produce material for readers in 92.5 per cent. of cases in 30 minutes or less for material from the same building and in two days or less for material from elsewhere;
- to answer 85 per cent. of correspondence within 10 days, absorbing up to a 2 per cent. increase in demand; and
- to publish the "Guide to the Records of Scotland".

Pensioners (Home Ownership)

36. Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the estimated number of senior citizens who are home owners in Scotland. [30109]

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: Almost 241,000 household heads of pensionable age were identified as owner occupiers in the 1991 census of population, the latest date for which complete information is available.

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes he intends to make to the cash limits and running costs provision for 1996–97 within his responsibility. [31596]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, I intend to make changes to three voted cash limits and two non-voted cash blocks.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 2, local government, housing, transport, other environmental services and European funds, Scotland, will be increased by £23,075,000 from £5,545,508,000 to £5,568,583,000. The increase will be offset by savings of £12,000,000 from cash limit Scottish Office European regional development fund; £5,000,000 from cash limit SO/LA1 and £6,075,000 from class XIII, vote 3.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 3, education, industry, arts, and libraries, Scotland, will be reduced by £6,075,000 from £1,602,605,000 to £1,596,530,000. The reduced cash limit takes account of the transfer of £75,000 to class XIII, vote 2, in respect of consultancies in relation to European Community structural funds and the transfer of £6,000,000 to class XIII, vote 2, in respect of increased support for local authorities. Provision for self-governing schools in respect of annual recurrent grant has been increased by £540,000. This has been offset by a corresponding amount taken as appropriations in aid.

The cash limit for class XIII, vote 5, law, order and protective services, police grant and social work services, Scotland will be decreased by £810,000 from £625,209,000 to £624,399,000. This reduction takes account of a transfer of £500,000 to the non-voted SO/LA1 cash limit to meet the costs of a Scottish DNA database; and a reduction of £310,000 in police capital grant. The reduction in the grant will result in a corresponding increase in net capital allocations.

The non-voted cash limit SO/LA1, which covers non-housing capital expenditure by local authorities, will be decreased by £4,500,000 from £431,120,000 to £426,620,000. This reflects a reduction of £5,000,000 transferred to class XIII, vote 2 and an increase of £500,000 transferred from class XIII, vote 5.

The non-voted cash limit SO/ERDF which covers European regional development fund payments in Scotland will be decreased by £12,000,000 from £109,079,000 to £97,079,000. This reflects the transfer to class XIII, vote 2.

These increases will be offset by savings and will not therefore added to the total of planned expenditure.

Officials (Meetings)

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what meetings have taken place between officials of the Scottish Office and Scottish hon. Members during the past three months without Ministers present. [25771]

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 24 April 1996]: Officials of the Scottish Office have met hon. Members without Minister present on the following occasions in the last three months:

19 January 1996: The chief executive of the Student Awards Agency for Scotland met the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Dr. Strang).

22 January 1996: Two senior officials from the Education and Industry Department met the hon. Members for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) and for Monklands, East (Mrs. Liddell).

4 April 1996: The chief medical officer met the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson).

Severe Weather Working Party

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects the report of the working party, which he established to review the experiences of the severe weather at the end of 1995, to be published. [31595]

Mr. Kynoch: I have received the severe weather working party's report and have today placed copies of the report in the Library of the House.

Unemployment

24. Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on unemployment levels in Scotland. [30096]

Mr. Kynoch: The seasonally adjusted level of unemployment in Scotland has fallen by more than 53,000 since December 1992. The unemployment rate in Scotland is well below the European Union average.

Cairngorms Funicular Railway

25. Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will call in the planning application for the Cairngorms funicular railway. [30097]

Mr. Kynoch: The relevant considerations remain as described in my reply to the hon. Member on 14 March, Official Report, column 730.

WALES

Mobile Snack Bars

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what objections he had received to the proposal to introduce clearway orders which would result in a trading ban over the length of the A55 in north Wales in respect of mobile snack bars. [31027]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: None. The draft orders have not yet been advertised.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received concerning the provision of snack bar facilities in lay-by areas along the A55 in north Wales. [31028]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There have been 14 such representations about the proposed ban on lay-by trading along the A55 trunk road, nine against and five in favour.

Hospital Care

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he proposes to enable hospital doctors to participate in decisions about hospital care; and if he will make a statement. [31003]

Mr. Hague: All NHS hospital services in Wales are provided by NHS trusts. To achieve such status all applicants were required to demonstrate the full involvement in management of their senior professional staff, especially clinical consultants. It is also a statutory requirement that the executive directors of each hospital trust should include a medical practitioner.

UK Forum of Mobility Centres

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what further assistance he plans to give the United Kingdom forum of mobility centres to promote and develop its work. [31020]

Mr. Hague: There are no members of the UK forum in Wales. I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) by my hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People on Wednesday 14 February, Official Report, column 650.

Wind Turbines

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the gross output of electricity produced from wind turbines in Wales in each year since 1993; and if he will make a statement. [30737]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Electricity generated by wind schemes in Wales in each of the years since 1993 was approximately as follows:

Year	GWh
1993	110
1994	167
1995	171

I expect the output to continue to rise year by year as more wind farms come into operation.

Tai Cymru

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of Tai Cymru's annual budget is spent on central administration; and if he will make a statement. [30738]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: In the current year, I expect Tai Cymru's administration costs to be less than 2 per cent. of its total programme.

Electricity Consumption

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the gross consumption of electricity in Wales in each year since 1993; and if he will make a statement. [30739]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Gross electricity consumption in Wales in each of the financial years since 1993 was as follows:

Year	GWh
1992–93	16,363
1993–94	16,589
1994–95	15,869

Eisteddfodau

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what evaluation he has made of the attraction to tourists of the annual international eisteddfod at Llangollen; and if he will make a statement. [30741]

Mr. Hague: The Wales tourist board has made no evaluation of the international eisteddfod specifically as a tourist attraction.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what evaluation he has made of the attraction to tourists of the (a) annual national eisteddfod and (b) national Urdd eisteddfod; and if he will make a statement. [30743]

Mr. Hague: The national eisteddfod and Urdd national eisteddfod are important culture festivals which annually attract upwards of 150,000 and 80,000 visitors respectively. It has been estimated that the national eisteddfod brings over £3 million to the local economy of the area it visits.

Vaccination and Immunisation

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many children have been vaccinated in schools as part of the school health service; and if he will make a statement. [30742]

Mr. Hague: The information requested is not collected in this format.

Pontypool Bypass

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the name of the contractor currently working on the Pontypool bypass; and if financial penalty clauses were included in the contract. [30808]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Shepherd Hill Civil Engineers Ltd. is the contractor for the A4042 Cwmbran roundabout improvement.

The contract allows for liquidated damages to be applied in the normal way for late completion.

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when roadworks on the Pontypool bypass, A4042, will be completed. [30979]

Mr. Jones: The roadworks on the A4042 Cwmbran roundabout are currently scheduled to finish on 15 June 1996.

Prostate Cancer Screening

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to improve prostate cancer screening; and if he will make a statement. [30780]

Mr. Hague: I have no plans at present to introduce a NHS screening programme for prostate cancer in Wales. They key aim of any screening programme must be to secure a demonstratable improvement in health by increasing length of life and enhancing quality of life. There is, as yet, no evidence that this would be achieved in relation to prostate cancer. Although screening is not routinely available to NHS patients, individual patients can be tested on request. This may be of benefit where there is a family history of the disease.

The Government remain interested in assessing the value of prostate cancer screening programmes.

Unitary Authorities

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the age profile and employment status of the current unitary authority councillors in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [30752]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is not held centrally.

Care and Repair Cymru

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what changes his Department is evaluating in respect of the existing funding arrangements for Care and Repair Cymru; and if he will make a statement. [30760]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There are currently no proposals to change the funding arrangements for Care and Repair Cymru.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future of Care and Repair Cymru. [30750]

Mr. Jones: Care and Repair Cymru has been developing and monitoring roles for new and existing schemes respectively. Its future roles will be considered in the light of responses to the consultation paper "The Welsh Office and Local Government: Redefining the Relationship" and the plans of local authorities.

Open Heart Surgery

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the present waiting list for open heart surgery in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [30762]

Mr. Hague: About 400 patients are currently waiting for open heart surgery in Wales and will be treated within 12 months.

Dental Services

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what steps he is taking to safeguard NHS dentistry services in (a) Torfaen, (b) Gwent and (c) Wales; [30981]

(2) what measures he is taking to increase the number of NHS dentists in Wales; [31006]

(3) what steps he is taking to increase the number of dentists in (a) Torfaen, (b) Gwent and (c) Wales. [30982]

Mr. Hague: On 21 September last year, my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, North-West (Mr. Richards) announced details of a £3 million initiative to attract more dentists into Wales. The initiative enabled Welsh health authorities to offer grants of up to £50,000 to attract new dentists into their areas. Grants of £25,000 were available for most parts of the Torfaen area.

By the end of April, nearly £2 million has been offered in grants for:

	Wales	Gwent	Torfaen
New practices	20	2	1
Existing practices being expanded	12	2
New community dental service posts	16	3	1

School Inspections

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list (a) pre-school, (b) primary, (c) secondary and (d) special school registered inspectors and their teams who are currently involved in school inspections, and, using the same categories, those registered inspectors and their teams who are not currently involved in inspections; [30840]

(2) if he will list the current (a) levels and (b) types of other full or part-time employment of registered inspectors and their teams, and, in the case of retired inspection personnel, their last paid employment. [30841]

Mr. Hague: These are matters for Her Majesty's chief inspector of schools in Wales. I have asked him to write to the hon. Member, and a copy of his reply will be placed in the Library of the House.

Welsh Language

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much additional finance has been provided to teach Welsh as a second language to students of constituent colleges of the university of Wales for each year since 1989; and if he will make a statement. [30747]

Mr. Hague: The Higher Education Funding Council for Wales has made the following allocations to the constituent colleges of the university of Wales under its Welsh for adults programme:

1993–94: £304,500

1994–95: £431,600

1995–96: £1,116,255

1996–97: £1,179,500.

Colleges are also able to use the general funding made available to them by the funding council to increase the resources for teaching Welsh to their students. In addition, the allocations in 1993–94 and 1994–95 were supplemented by the colleges from the funding for extra mural activities made available by the funding council.

Comparable information for the period prior to 1993–94 is not available.

Rental Housing

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he will take to increase the number of affordable homes for rent; and if he will make a statement. [31004]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Some £85.390 million is being made available during the current year to housing associations enabling the provision of at least 3,500 additional homes, some 80 per cent. of which will be for rent.

Departmental Property

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what properties are owned or leased by his Department for the use of Ministers; what was the total running cost for each property for the latest year available; and if he will make a statement. [30748]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office has no properties for the sole use of Ministers. Ministers have rooms in properties in Cardiff and London. The cost of these properties are included in the running cost expenditure published in the Welsh Office departmental report 1996, Cm 3215.

Teachers

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many full-time teachers were employed by Welsh local education authorities in (a) 1993, (b) 1994 and (c) 1995; and if he will make a statement. [30749]

Mr. Hague: Information on full-time qualified teachers is given in the following table:

Number of full-time qualified teachers employed by each LEA in Wales[1]

Local education authority	1993[2]		1994[3]		1995
	Schools[3]	Further education institutions[4]	Schools[3]	Further education institutions[4]	Schools[3]	Further education institutions[4]
Clwyd	3,315	686	3,006	0	2,898	0
Dyfed	3,341	364	3,241	14	3,171	15
Gwent	3,743	414	3,710	8	3,674	7
Gwynedd	2,053	203	1,987	0	1,928	0
Mid Glamorgan	5,138	508	5,078	1	5,138	1

General Practitioners

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he proposes to recruit more general practitioners. [31001]

Mr. Hague: Government policy is to secure an adequate supply of appropriately trained doctors in each sector and specialty, including general practice. This is achieved through advisory and planning mechanisms at a UK and Wales level.

The medical work force standing advisory committee considers the longer-term need for doctors and makes recommendations on the intake of medical schools. In 1995, the committee recommended an increase of 11 per cent. in UK medical school intakes by the year 20000 to a total of 4,970. The Government have accepted that recommendation.

The Welsh Office is involved in UK work force planning through its representation on the advisory group on medical education and staffing. This group is examining the issue of recruitment and retention of GPs. The Welsh Office also has regular discussions with education providers in Wales to ensure that there are appropriate training opportunities to potential GPs.

Home Ownership

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to make mortgages more affordable for young people; and if he will make a statement. [31005]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: We already have schemes which make home ownership more affordable for those on lower incomes, including young people, who cannot raise a sufficient mortgage to buy a home of their own. The successful homefinder and homebuy option schemes, operated by councils and housing associations respectively, allow people to buy a home for 70 per cent. of its value. The remaining 30 per cent. is held as a charge on the property and does not have to be repaid until the home is sold.

Rural Railways

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received during the last 12 months on the future of rural railway services; and if he will make a statement. [30746]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Fifteen representations were received in the 12 months ended 30 April 1996.

Public Bodies

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what progress he is making on the elimination of bureaucracy, waste and maladministration in the conduct of non-departmental public bodies in Wales; and if he will make a statement; [30744]

(2) what new measures he will introduce to make quangos democratically accountable; and if he will make a statement. [30745]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office continues to remind public bodies of the need for the highest standards of propriety in the conduct of public affairs in Wales. We have developed the arrangements previously introduced for monitoring and controlling the performance of public bodies in Wales. This work has meant that the Welsh Office has already been able to put into effect a number of recommendations of the first report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life.

My right hon. Friend and I hold regular meetings with each Welsh executive public body to consider targets and performance; and they are provided with clear statements of their responsibilities, the roles of the board and staff and of the Welsh Office. Each pubic body is also expected to adopt, with such adaptations as are appropriate to its circumstances, the code of best practice for board members of public bodies published by HM Treasury in June 1994. This requires public bodies and their boards to:

observe the highest standard of impartiality, integrity and objectivity in relation to their stewardship of public funds; comply with Government policy on openness and to respond to all reasonable requests for information;

be accountable to Parliament, individual citizens and staff for the activities of the bodies concerned, their stewardship of public funds and the extent to which key performance targets have been met;

maximise value of money by ensuring their activities are carried out in the most efficient and economical way.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Travel-to-interview Scheme

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people, eligible for assistance under the travel-to-interview scheme, were unemployed for (a) longer than four weeks and (b) longer than 13 weeks in each year since 1993–94. [30541]

Mr. Forth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mike Fogden to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 5 June 1996:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your questions on how many people, eligible for assistance under the Travel to Interview Scheme (TIS), were employed for longer than four weeks and longer than 13 weeks in each year since 1993–94.

I am unable to provide the information you ask for, as my Jobcentres do not record how long people who apply for TIS have been unemployed. However, in the sample taken for a recent study, 26% of applications were from people unemployed for less than 13 weeks.

I am sorry I cannot be more helpful.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what research she has (a) undertaken and (b) evaluated into the potential benefits to trainees of encouraging TECs to award longer-term contracts to training providers; and if she will make a statement; [31216]

(2) what measures she plans to introduce to encourage TECs to extend longer-term contracts to local, regional and national training providers; and if she will make a statement. [31217]

Mr. Paice: There has been no research specifically into this issue.

The precise nature of training and enterprise councils' contracts with their providers is a matter for individual TECs. However, we hope that the greater stability afforded by three-year TEC licensing arrangements will lead TECs to offer greater stability in turn to their providers. Some TECs are already starting to do so. We will be encouraging others, via the TEC National Council, to also consider the opportunities for this.

Social Affairs Council

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Social Affairs Council of 3 June. [31734]

Mr. Forth: I attended the Social Affairs Council in Luxembourg on 3 June.

In the light of the Prime Minister's statement on BSE to the House on 21 May, I was unable to agree to four items on the agenda: a Council recommendation on balanced participation of men and women in decision making; a resolution on the transparency of training certificates; a resolution on a European year against racism; and Council conclusions on a Commission report no the demographic situation. It is likely that, in other circumstances the United Kingdom would have been able to agree to the adoption of these proposals.

An interim report on employment was forwarded to the Florence European Council with no discussion.

There was a short orientation debate on a Commission communication on information and consultation, on which the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry leads. I made clear that the UK does not believe that there is any need for legislation in this area, either at national or at European level.

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans she has to announce changes to cash limits and running costs on votes within her responsibility for 1996–97. [31739]

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, the cash limits for class IX, vote 1, Department for Education and Employment; programmes and central services; class IX, vote 3, Employment Service; class IX, vote 4, office of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools in England will be amended as follows:

Class	Vote	Existing cash limit	Change	New cash limit
IX	1	8,751,429,000	–6,484,000	8,744,945,000
IX	3	1,287,560,000	1,417,000	1,288,977,000
IX	4	117,600,000	5,067,000	122,667,000

The cash limit for class IX, vote 1 will be reduced by £6,484,000 from £8,751,429,000 to £8,744,945,000. This is as a result of transfers to Ofsted of £5,055,000 for work in connection with inspection of providers of under-fives education, and £12,000 for the inspection of careers education. An additional £1,500,000 has been transferred to the Employment Service to increase the provision for the access to work programme. This transfer has been partially offset by a transfer of £83,000 from the Employment Service in respect of salary costs of staff transferred from the Employment Service to the Department of Education and Employment.

The cash limit for class IX, vote 3 will be increased by £1,417,000 from £1,287,560,000 to £1,288,977,000. This is the result of a transfer of £1,500,000 from the Department for Education and Employment in respect of additional provision for the access to work programme, which is partially offset by a transfer of £83,000 to the Department for Education and Employment in respect of salary costs of staff transferred from the Employment Service to the Department for Education and Employment.

The running costs provision for class IX, vote 1 will be increased by £83,000 from £366,622,000 to £366,705,000 and the running costs provision for class IX, vote 3 will be decreased by £83,000 from £910,234,000 to £910,151,000. There is no change to the overall DfEE gross running costs limit.

The cash limit for class IX, vote 4 will be increased by £5,067,000 from £117,600,000 to £122,667,000. The running costs limit will be increased by £2,185,000 from £27,429,000 to £29,614,000. These increases are to enable Ofsted to undertake work in connection with the inspection of providers of under-fives education and the inspection of careers education. The increase in the cash limit will be offset by the reduction to the cash limit for class IX, vote 1 mentioned above.

The increases will be offset by savings elsewhere or charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the total of planned public expenditure.

TRANSPORT

Railway Stations

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many railway stations have been (a) opened and (b) re-opened since 1993 on the initiative of (i) local government, (ii) British Rail Railtrack and (iii) central Government. [31130]

Mr. Watts: It is for train operators, and local authorities or passenger transport executives, to decide which stations they wish to open or re-open for the benefit of the local travelling public. Since 1993 14 new stations have been opened and 28 stations have been re-opened as a result of close co-operation between those organisations and British Rail and/or Railtrack. In addition, Waterloo and Ashford International stations were opened by European Passenger Services for international passenger traffic.

Airworthiness

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the countries receiving advice from the Civil Aviation Authority on (a) airworthiness and (b) other issues. [30493]

Mr. Norris: The following have current agreements for the provision of airworthiness advice by the UK CAA.

Bahrain
Falklands
Cyprus
Hong Kong
Brunei
Fiji
Solomons
Kiribati
Malaysia
Bahamas
Cayman Islands
Jamaica
Turks and Caicos
Belize
Trinidad and Tobago
Guyana
Suriname
British Virgin Islands
Anguilla
Antigua
Dominica
Grenada
Montserrat
St. Christopher and Nevis
St. Lucia
St. Vincent
The Grenadines.

In addition, 109 nations have now attended the UK CAA airworthiness course and many others seek advice on an ad hoc basis.

Advice on other aspects of civil aviation regulation, operation and development has been provided to more than 150 countries in the past 25 years.

MV Derbyshire

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will initiate an up to date report into the arrangements to undertake the second survey of the MV Derbyshire wreckage field; [31270]

(2) for what reasons his Department has refused to form a formal partnership with the technical advisers to the Derbyshire Families Association. [31271]

Mr. Norris: The return expedition to the wreck of the Derbyshire will take place in two phases. The first phase will be a limited sonar and photographic survey of the wreckage field, to be carried out in late June or early July by Oceaneering Technologies, who undertook the initial expedition in 1994. It is expected that the main expedition will take place early next year. The Department of Transport and the European Commission are sharing the costs of both phases.

The first phase will involve a detailed survey of the wreckage field with the aim of identifying individual parts of the ship and, in particular, to establish the location and accessibility of the ship's stern. The material collected is intended to assist in the detailed planning of the main expedition.

The purpose of the return to the Derbyshire is to see what lessons can be learnt from the loss of this particular ship which could help avoid future bulker losses and the continuing loss of life such losses involve. Planning and control of both phases rests with the three independent technical assessors. Ministry of Defence officials will act as project managers overseeing the activities of the appointed contractor or contractors.

On completion of the second phases, they will prepare a report on their findings and conclusions which will be submitted to Ministers and the European commission. Their report will be published and, following its completion, the data recovered will be made available to interested parties.

It is possible that this report may lead to the reopening of the formal Investigation into the loss of the Derbyshire and the taking forward of specific safety initiatives through the International Maritime Organisation.

We have given sympathetic consideration to the request from the Derbyshire Families Association that they should be represented on, or have a degree of control over, the return to the ship. We have concluded that this would not be appropriate. The association is one of a number of parties with an interest in the outcome of the return expedition. For one of these parties, but not the others, to be represented on the return expedition could lead to suggestions that the findings lacked balance or objectivity., For all the parties to be represented on the return would be impractical given the nature of the operations to be undertaken. To allow the independent assessors to complete their task, without any risk that they could be considered to have been influenced in any way, it has also been decided that the Department of Transport, Marine Safety Agency and Marine Accident Investigation Branch will not be represented on either phase of the return.

We continue to welcome the advice and involvement of all parties in the planning of the return. The independent technical assessors stand ready to discuss matters with any interested party.

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the names of each technical expert who has been engaged to take part in the second survey of the MV Derbyshire wreckage field. [31272]

Mr. Norris: The following are expected to be on board the survey vessel carrying out phase 1 of the return expedition.

Dr. Remo Torchio: EU technical assessor

Robin Williams: UK technical assessor

Professor Douglas Faulkner; UK technical assessor

Morgyn Davies: Ministry of Defence salvage officer and project manager

Steve Quin: Ministry of Defence, salvage officer.

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to change his Department's cash limits for 1996–97. [31923]

Sir George Young: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary revised estimate, the cash limit for class V, vote 5 will be amended as follows:

> the cash limit for class V, vote 5—roads and local transport—is reduced by £3,382,000 from £392,962,000 to £389,580,000. The reduction is one of a number of revisions to realign entries in the main estimates with the published local transport settlement.

The Department's local authority capital cash limit covering supplementary credit approvals for local authority spending on public transport programmes will be increased by £3,382,000 from £304,732,000 to £308,114,000, all of which is derived from the transfer from the transport supplementary grant, class V, vote 5.

The increase to the Department's local authority capital cash limit will not add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Railway Stations (Disabled Parking)

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what evaluation he has made of the practice at railway stations of charging severely disabled orange badge holders for parking; what is his policy in this regard; what action he is taking; and if he will make a statement. [30228]

Mr. Watts: Car parking charges at railways stations are matters for individual station operators. The Rail Regulator is responsible for protecting the needs of disabled passengers and has required all station operators to produce and comply with a disabled people's protection policy as a condition of their licence. The Rail Regulator will consider taking action if operators introduce any measures which result in a reduction in present levels of access for disabled passengers across the rail network.

Accidents (Failure to Stop)

Mr. David Young: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many cases in each of the last five years there have been where drivers involved in reported accidents have failed to stop. [31162]

Mr. Norris: The information requested is shown in the following table. Figures for 1995 should be available in July.

Injury road accidents in Great Britain in which one or more vehicles failed to stop after a collision: 1990–94

Year	Total reported injury road accidents	Injury road accidents in which one or more vehicles failed to stop	(b) as a percentage of (a)
1990	258,441	19,354	7.5
1991	235,798	18,360	7.8
1992	233,025	18,114	7.8

Injury road accidents in Great Britain in which one or more vehicles failed to stop after a collision: 1990–94

Year	Total reported injury road accidents	Injury road accidents in which one or more vehicles failed to stop	(b) as a percentage of (a)
1993	228,865	17,358	7.6
1994	234,101	17,980	7.7

1. Police reports of injury accidents may include vehicles not physically involved in the collision if they are deemed to have contributed to the accident. These vehicles are not included in this analysis, as their drivers may have been unaware of the accident.

Collisions at Sea (Liability)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what international conventions govern liability for (a) private shipping and (b) Government-owned vessels in cases of accidental collisions with oil industry installations in United Kingdom waters. [31207]

Mr. Norris: There is no international liability and compensation regime that applies specifically to collision damage caused by ships involved in accidental collisions with oil industry installations. Following such a collision, the shipowners may generally limit liability to an amount determined in accordance with the convention on the limitation of liability for maritime claims 1976. There are also two international conventions which could govern the shipowners's liability for damage caused by the ship's cargo following such a collision. The civil liability convention 1992 makes shipowners liable for pollution damage caused by oils spills from tankers, whatever the cause of the spill. When it enters into force, the hazardous and noxious substances convention 1996 would extend the liability of shipowners to damage caused by all hazardous and noxious cargoes carried on ships. All three international conventions apply to all commercially operated ships, whether owned by a private individual, by a private company or by a Government.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Running Costs and Cash Limits

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what changes she proposes to make to her Department's cash limits and running costs limits for 1996–97. [31794]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Subject to parliamentary approval of the necessary supplementary estimates, the cash limit for class X, vote 1 will be increased by £17,519,000 from £931,241,000 to £948,760,000. The increase will be to transfer responsibility for the voluntary services from the Home Office to the Department of National Heritage, and for a building from the Department of Trade and Industry to the British library and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Indemnity Undertakings

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list (a) the number of indemnity undertakings given by Departments under section 16 of the National Heritage Act 1980 for the six-months period ended 31 March 1996 and (b) the value of any contingent liabilities in respect of such undertakings given under that section which remained outstanding as at 31 march. [31795]

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information is as follows:

(i) in the six-month period ended 31 March 1996 the following undertakings to indemnify were given by the relevant Departments for items on loan to national and non-national institutions:

	Number
Department of National Heritage	452
Scottish Office Education Department	52
Welsh Office Education Department	30
Department of Education for Northern Ireland	12

(ii) the value of contingent liabilities in respect of such undertakings given at any time under section 16 and outstanding at 31 March are:

Department of National Heritage	1,366,004,790
Scottish Office Education Department	75,901,633
Welsh Office Education Department	81,430,000
Department of Education for Northern Ireland	4,186,274

Underwater Archaeological Sites

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she expects English Heritage to take over responsibility for the protection of underwater archaeological sites. [31015]

Mr. Sproat: The Department published, on 22 May, the consultation paper "Protecting Our Heritage" which includes details of the proposed transfer of underwater archaeology to English Heritage. The proposed transfer will be considered in the light of comments on the Government's proposals. It will require legislation.

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what funding her Department provides for the protection of underwater archaeological sites. [31013]

Mr. Sproat: The Department's expenditure on underwater archaeology for 1995–96 was £220,000. This provided for the cost of marking historic wrecks on land and at sea and for the archaeological diving unit based at St. Andrews university to provide advice in relation to wrecks of historical, archaeological, or artistic interest. The Department also meets the costs of the Advisory Committee on Historic Wreck Sites.

In addition, two voluntary organisations were given grants from the Heritage grant fund 1995–96 for underwater archaeology projects. The Hampshire and Wight Trust for Maritime Archaeology received £16,000 and the Nautical Archaeological Society received £18,000.

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many officials in her Department are involved with the protection of underwater archaeological sites. [31014]

Mr. Sproat: Three officials spend part of their time on the protection of underwater archaeological sites. The percentage of time spent by the three officials on underwater archaeology is the equivalent to approximately one full-time member of staff.

Angling

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what responsibility her Department has for the funding of angling. [31011]

Mr. Sproat: My Department does not fund any sports directly. The majority of Government money specifically allocated to sport and active recreation is channelled through the Sports Council. While operating within a policy framework set by Government, the Sports Council has a degree of independence under its royal charter. In 1994–95, Sports Council grants to the governing bodies of angling totalled £54,125. The Department also funds Sportsmatch, the business sponsorship incentive scheme, which provided £42,250 in awards for angling schemes in 1994–95.

Television Licence Fees

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage (1) if she will estimate the additional cost of reducing the level of the colour TV licence fee to the same level as the black and white TV licence fee for pensioners in receipt of means-tested state support; [30839]

(2) what plans she has to increase the concessions available to retired people for colour television licences. [30838]

Mr. Sproat: The Government have no plans to extend the existing concessionary television licence scheme. This would lead to a reduction in television licence revenue, on which the BBC depends for its home broadcasting grant. To make good the shortfall, we would have to increase the licence fee for all other licence payers, regardless of their means. The additional cost of providing colour licences at £30—the current black and white licence fee—for all pensioners in receipt of one or more means tested benefit would be approximately £165 million.

White Paper

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage when she now expects to publish a Heritage White Paper. [31012]

Mr. Sproat: The consultation document, "Protecting Our Heritage" was published on 22 May. Copies are available in the Libraries of the House.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many registered disabled people are employed by her Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures. [30773]

Mr. Sproat: A central record of disabled people in the Department of National Heritage shows that there are nine currently in employment. This represents 2.7 per cent. of the total staff in post in the Department. We no longer differentiate between registered and non-registered disabled people in our central records.

Television Violence

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consultations her Department held with the Home Office in preparing the provisions of the Broadcasting Bill concerning the depiction of violence on television. [30508]

Mr. Sproat [holding answer 4 June 1996]: Policy responsibility for broadcasting issues rests with my Department. Consultations were held with a number of other Government Departments in the course of preparing the provisions of the Broadcasting Bill; there was no policy matter in the Bill in respect of the depiction of violence on television requiring consultation with the Home Office.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what action he intends to take to reduce the length of time prisoners are held on remand in custody awaiting trial. [30269]

Mr. Streeter: I have been asked to reply.

The question concerns a specific operational matter on which the chief executive of the Court Service is best placed to provide an answer and I have accordingly asked the chief executive to reply direct.

Letter from Michael Huebner to Mr. Bill Michie, dated 6 June 1996:

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, has asked me to reply to your Question about what action has been taken to reduce the delays in arranging the trials of defendants in custody.

In the financial year 1995/96, the Crown Court sat a record number of 88,775 days, an increase on the previous year of 648 days, and although the number of outstanding cases had fallen substantially by the end of the year, it is planned to maintain this level and to sit 88,318 days in 1996/97.

Since January 1996, all cases committed to the Crown Court by magistrates' courts are automatically given a date for a plea and directions earing (and when the defendant is in custody, this is within four weeks of committal). This procedure ensures that all cases are subject to judicial management at an early stage. This enables the parties immediately to raise with the judge, any problems which might cause delay. At this hearing, the defendant has the opportunity to enter a plea. Defendants who pleads guilty, are sentenced immediately thus reducing the time spent on remand; if a plea of not guilty is entered, the court is required to bear in mind the statutory custody time limits which require that a date for trial be fixed within sixteen weeks of the date of committal unless the judge extends that period. The prosecution and the defence are expected to be able to tell the court what dates their witnesses are available to give evidence so that the trial can begin on the date arranged. In general, cases where the defendant is in custody have priority over cases where defendants are on bail. When a trial date cannot be arranged within sixteen weeks from committal—for example if key witnesses are not available within that time—the reasons for this are recorded and a further hearing is fixed to review progress and to fix a date for trial.

In August 1995, a new system of collecting information n the reasons for delay in cases where the defendant is in custody was introduced in all Crown Court centres. Detailed information is reported to regional managers monthly and senior managers receive reports on individual cases that are not heard within sixteen weeks. Senior managers also discuss their courts performance in reducing delay at regular reviews with me. In addition to the administrative action to the monitors delays, senior judges in the courts and the Circuit Presiding Judges are provided with details on a monthly basis of custody cases which have not been dealt with within 16 weeks of committal.

The combined effect of these initiatives has been to reduce waiting times for all cases, but particularly those for defendants in custody. The average waiting time for custody cases is now 11.4 weeks compared with 13.4 weeks for the financial year 1994/95 and the Court Service expects waiting times to continue to fall. In addition to maintaining the high level of sittings mentioned above, the target level for the key performance indicator of 70% of all defendants to be dealt with within 16 weeks of committal, has been increased to 75% for 1996/97.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Supplies

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what voluntary leakage reduction target each water company has set over the next five and 10 years. [27164]

Mr. Clappison: Pursuant to his reply 30 April 1996, Official Report, c. 420: The leakage target shown in the table for Dwr Cymru should read: "Aim to achieve a reduction of 17 per cent. by 2000 and over a third by 2010".

Environment Agency

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance his Department has given to the Environment Agency in respect of (a) action to deal with foul water flooding, (b) abandoned mines water discharges, (c) flood alleviation and (d) unsatisfactory storm overflows; and what is the regional distribution of (a) (b) and (d). [30001]

Mr. Clappison: No guidance in respect of action to deal with foul water flooding has been issued by the Department to the Environment Agency. I understand that Ofwat holds information about the distribution of foul water flooding.

No specific guidance has been given to the Environment Agency regarding discharges from abandoned mines. The regional distribution of such discharges was described in detail in "Abandoned Mines and the Water Environment," a report issued by the National Rivers Authority in March 1994.

My right hon. and learned Friend, the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, are responsible for policy on flood alleviation. The published "Strategy for Flood and Coastal Defence in England and Wales" provides a comprehensive framework for the Environment Agency to work within.

Guidance is being prepared to assist both dischargers and the Environment Agency in implementing the Urban Waste Water Treatment (England and Wales) Regulations 1994. It will include guidance on the limitation of pollution from storm water overflows. Information about numbers and location of unsatisfactory storm overflows will be held by the regional offices of the Environment Agency.

Sharks

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if the recent change in status of the basking shark under the International Union for the Conservation of Nature and Natural Resources red list will affect the proposal to protect the species under section 9 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 currently under review; and if he will make a statement. [31334]

Mr. Clappison: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 8 May 1996, Official Report, column 134.

The Joint Nature Conservation Committee, the Government's statutory conservation adviser, will take account of all relevant conservation data, including the IUCN red list where appropriate, when considering which species should be protected under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 as part of the third quinquennial review. The committee's recommendations to the Secretary of State are due to be submitted in October 1996.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what programme of action his Department has to protect the basking shark under the EU habitats and species directive; and if he will make a statement. [31335]

Mr. Clappison: The basking shark is not listed in the annexes to Council directive 92/43/EEC—the habitats and species directive. Nor is it included in the list of species for which action plans will be prepared over the next three years under the United Kingdom biodiversity action plan.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what work has been undertaken by the Joint Nature Conservation Committee to assess the threats to the basking shark in United Kingdom waters over the last five years. [31337]

Mr. Clappison: The joint nature conservation committee and the Government's statutory conservation agencies have contributed funds to a number of research projects concerned with the status of the basking shark in British waters in the last five years.

These projects include acoustic tagging of basking sharks for tracking and monitoring, plankton and water quality sampling, and funding for a basking shark watch scheme. The JNCC has also supported several workshops which have brought together expertise and existing knowledge on basking sharks.

Housing Points

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to modify the Housing Corporation's advice on the granting of points for a local connection in line with amendments to homeless persons legislation. [30975]

Mr. Clappison: The Housing Corporation will be revising its guidance to registered social landlords about access to social housing in the light of the legislative changes currently before Parliament.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the Housing Corporation ending the practice of associations awarding additional points for a local connection. [30976]

Mr. Clappison: The Housing Corporation has not changed its guidance on allocations. We have received no representations on this matter.

Pennington Sewage Treatment Plant

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that the secondary biological treatment plant at Pennington is equipped with ultra-violet disinfection equipment by Southern Water Services. [31168]

Mr. Clappison: UV disinfection equipment is not required for secondary treatment. Secondary biological treatment when installed at Pennington will significantly improve the microbiological quality of the receiving water. Water quality in the area will be re-assessed once the new scheme comes into effect.

Unitary Authorities

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the amount of standard spending assessment per person for each of the new unitary authorities created on 1 April. [31169]

Sir Paul Beresford: The standard spending assessments requested are as shown in the table.

	SSA £ per head
Bath and north-east Somerset	664.62
Bristol	699.88
South Gloucestershire	622.56
North Somerset	647.33
Hartlepool	815.36
Middlesborough	862.89
Redcar and Cleveland	805.25
Stockton on Tees	772.02
East Riding of Yorkshire	668.03
Kingston upon Hull	813.89
North-east Lincolnshire	760.06
North Lincolnshire	718.32
York	629.64

Building Research Establishment

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the current key performance targets for the Building Research Establishment. [31805]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 2 April 1996 his proposals for transferring the Building Research Establishment to the private sector by February 1997. While it remains an executive agency, BRE is working to the following key targets for 1996–97:

net vote cost of £545,000;

deficit on trading account no greater than £119,000;

gross non-Exchequer income of £3.56 million;

an increase of less than 4 per cent. in the average unit cost of research commissions.

Cement Kilns

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will issue the Government's response to the second report of the Environment Committee on the burning of secondary liquid fuels in cement kilns, HC497 of Session 1994–95. [32086]

Mr. Clappison: The Government have today published their response to the Select Committee and copies have been placed in the Library.

Water (Pesticides)

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the working party on the incidence of pesticides in water will publish its report. [31804]

Mr. Robert B. Jones: The working party on the incidence of pesticides in water has today published its review on the monitoring of pesticides in water in the United Kingdom. I am placing a copy in the Library. It concludes that:

there is a basically sound system of monitoring and investigation that has emerged out of a long established intention to control pesticides effectively.

However, it has identified some gaps in monitoring and it has made some recommendations for improvements.

This report provides a comprehensive summary of the data which is available on pesticides in water. A group, led by the Environment Agency, will be formed to ensure that there is an ongoing review of monitoring requirements and that monitoring efforts are most effectively directed.

Rack Marsh, Bagnor

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he has been given in relation to the creation of a site of special scientific interest at Rack marsh, near Bagnor in Berkshire. [31362]

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 5 June 1996]: I understand that English Nature's Council has approved the notification of Kennet and Lambourn floodplain, Berkshire/Wiltshire as a site of special scientific interest. The area known as Rack marsh forms a component part of this composite site. English Nature is now notifying owners and occupies of the council's decision.

Vertigo Moulinsiana Snail

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he has been given in relation to the creation of a special area of conservation for the vertigo moulinsiana snail in the Kennet and Lambourn valleys. [31363]

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 5 June 1996]: English Nature, through the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, has formally recommended that eight separate locations in the Kennet and Lambourn valleys be considered as a possible candidate for designation in due course as a special area of conservation under the European directive 92/43/EEC—the habitats directive—following the discovery in the area of large populations of the species Vertigo moulinsiana, Desmoulin's whorl snail. All the relevant survey material has been placed in the Library. The Government have accepted this recommendation and public consultation on this proposal is now under way.

The JNCC has also recommended that parts of the Avon valley appear to qualify for possible designation, subject to more detailed survey work to determine boundaries. If this recommendation is confirmed and accepted, public consultation on a site in this area will be undertaken in due course.

Another possible site, Chilbolton common, on which public consultation has already taken place, is, in the light of recent survey material, not now considered by the JNCC to be of sufficiently high quality to qualify for SAC status and is withdrawn from further consideration.

The recommendation of parts of the Kennet and Lambourn floodplains and part of the Avon valley as possible SACs for this species seems to me to be consistent with the requirements of article 4 and annex III of the habitats directive and with the United Kingdom approach to selection of possible SACs for other habitat types and species. The JNCC's advice is that these two sites would complement the selection of three other sites for this species in East Anglia which have already been submitted as candidate SACs to the European Commission following consultation.

The implications of the JNCC's advice for the Newbury bypass are explained in a separate answer given today to my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir D. Mitchell) by my hon. Friend the Minister for Railways and Roads.

I consider that, subject to the outcome of public consultation, a proposal for five high quality sites would comply with the obligations under the habitats directive to make a contribution to the Natura 2000 network in proportion to the representation within this country of the habitat of the species. The course of action announced today in respect of the safeguarding of Vertigo moulinsiana is also consistent with my general endorsement on 15 May of the biodiversity steering group's report which recommended an action plan for the species.

HEALTH

Lariam

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on adverse drug reaction to the anti-malarial drug Lariam (Mefloquine); and if he will indicate the number and type of reactions reported. [31322]

Mr. Malone: None.

The Medicines Control Agency monitors adverse reactions reported with Lariam and evaluates potential safety issues in the light of any new evidence that emerges. The MCA received 956 reports of 2,678 suspected adverse reactions associated with Lariam between 1990, when the product was launched in the United Kingdom, and 1 June 1996. During this time in excess of half a million patients have received Lariam. The reports received are consistent with the known safety profile of Lariam as described in the authorised product information.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 515, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31460]

Mr. Horam: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Health Authorities (Severance Costs)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to hold centrally information in respect of severance costs incurred by health authorities to achieve management cost reductions targets; and if he will make a statement. [31425]

Mr. Malone: No.

Cash Limits and Running Costs

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what changes will be made to the cash limits and running costs limit of his Department in 1996–97. [31969]

Mr. Dorrell: The cash limit for class XI vote 1—hospital community health, family health and related services, England—will be reduced by £4,000,000 (from £27,686,304,000 to £27,682,304,000). This allows for a transfer to class XI, vote 2—Department of Health, administration, miscellaneous health and personal services, England—in respect of a re-apportionment between health votes.

The cash limit for class XI, vote 2—Department of Health, administration, miscellaneous health and personal social services, England—will be increased by £35,984,000, from £1,173,472,000 to £1,209,456,000. This allows for an increase of £36,000,000; £25,000,000 for services for people seeking asylum; £7,000,000 for a grant to the Thalidomide Trust, and £4,000,000—running costs—for a transfer from class XI, vote 1 as mentioned. The overall increase is partially offset by a transfer of £16,000 to class VI, vote 2—regeneration and countryside and wildlife, England—in respect of a project requiring assistance from the European regional development fund.

The Department's gross running costs limit will be increased by £4,002,000 from £276,202,000 to £280,204,000 reflecting the transfer. Also the original running cost limit published in the "Public Expenditure Statistical Analyses", Cm 3201, table 3.8a was understated by £2,000.

All increases will either be offset by foregoing the take-up of end year flexibility, transfer to or from other votes or charged to the reserve and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Youth Treatment Service Group

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will publish the fourth report of the youth treatment service group; and if he will make a statement. [32062]

Mr. Bowis: Copies of the report have been placed in the Library today. I have accepted the recommendations in the report and charged the management of the Glenthorne youth treatment centre with its implementations. Following this report and the closure of the St. Charles YTC, the group has now completed its task.

I am grateful to Mrs. Winifred Tumim and her colleagues on the group for the valuable work they have done over the years. Mr. Tom White, who was a member of the group, has agreed to continue to make independent visits to the Glenthorne youth treatment centre.

Mental Health Review Tribunal

Ms Jowell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the waiting times by section, between applications being received by the mental health review tribunal service and the hearings taking place; and what assessment he has made of the scope for reducing the waiting times. [30444]

Mr. Bowis: The tables give details of the waiting times for the last quarter of 1995. The tribunal offices are currently working to an eight week deadline for non restricted cases outside the special hospitals and 20 weeks for restricted cases outside the special hospitals. Deadlines for section 2 cases are determined by legislation and are required to be heard within one week of application. Delay times are continuously being monitored and options considered to improve the overall waiting times.

Waiting times last quarter of 1995
Non-restricted cases

	Under 8 weeks	9–12 weeks	Over 12 weeks
NHS hospitals (665 cases)	303	293	69
Special hospitals (44 cases)	0	14	30

Restricted cases

	Under 20 weeks	21–24 weeks	Over 24 weeks
NHS hospitals (171 cases)	102	29	40
Special hospitals (95 cases)	6	38	51

Edgware General Hospital

Sir John Gorst: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the reappraisal he initiated six months ago of the provision of accident and emergency services at Edgware general hospital. [30583]

Mr. Dykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the future provision of accident and emergency services at Edgware general hospital. [31368]

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. Friends have made sure that I am fully aware of the strong local representations on this matter. Barnet health authority is discussing future medical involvement in the casualty services at Edgware hospital with local clinicians. A working group is expected to meet in early July to consider its recommendations. I will write to my hon. Friends following that meeting.

Elective Surgery

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the annual administrative costs of cancelling and re-scheduling elective surgery in the NHS. [31215]

Mr. Horam: The information needed for such an estimate is not available centrally.

NHS Waiting Lists

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the annual cost of administering waiting lists in the NHS. [31214]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

General Practitioners

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the number of forms completed by GPs annually. [31365]

Mr. Malone: The average general practitioner currently submits just over 600 claim forms per year. From 1 July 1996 approximately 30 per cent. of claim forms will be abolished and completion of the remainder may be delegated to practice staff. Doctors will also have to complete 400 fewer prescriptions per year and simplified patient registration forms mean that GPs benefit from a 34 per cent. reduction in the number of such forms to be signed.

Referrals

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of extra-contractual referral requests for secondary referrals are refused. [31366]

Mr. Malone: This information is not available centrally.

NHS Appointments

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the total number of "did not attends" for (a) out-patient appointments and (b) in-patient appointments in the NHS in the last available year. [31367]

Mr. Horam: The total number of "did not attends" for out-patient appointments during 1994–95 was 5,131,405. In the calendar year 1995, there were 209,082 "did not attends" for in-patient or day case admissions.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Zambia

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken following the announcement by the Zambian authorities of the disqualification of ex-President Kenneth Kaunda from the current year's elections. [31170]

Mr. Hanley: We have already made clear to the Government of Zambia our concern that measures to restrict eligibility of candidates for president damage Zambian democracy and risk undermining the multi-party system.

Bosnia

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what ways the British Government are working with (a) the Bosnian Government and (b) other European countries to conduct a survey of the needs and locations of amputees needing prostheses in Bosnia. [31119]

Mr. Hanley: We are not currently participating in any survey of the needs and locations of amputees in Bosnia. However, ODA is in close contact with the Bosnian Government on establishing its priorities for bilateral assistance in the health sector, including the needs of those disabled in the war.

Police Training

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 13 May, Official Report, columns 385-87, if he will list, by name, the individual projects or schemes under the ODA's country aid programme, under which funding is given to countries to finance training of police officers (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in their home countries; and if he will list which countries have benefited from each project. [31161]

Mr. Hanley: The ODA does not keep centrally a record of the titles of individual projects which finance the training of police officers either in the United Kingdom or in their home countries. Police training projects are managed and recorded on a country basis only and it would involve a disproportionate cost to collate this information.

TREASURY

Tax (Self-assessment)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his estimate of the impact on the public sector borrowing requirement for (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98 of the effect of the change in the dates on which SC60 tax refunds will be made as a result of the switch to self-assessment; and if he will make a statement; [30593]

(2) when SC60 tax refunds relating to accounts years ending in tax years 1995–96 and 1996–97 will be made; what account will be taken of the timing of the relevant 1996–97 assessment in issuing these refunds; and if he will make a statement. [30592]

Mr. Jack: Refunds of deductions made from the earnings of self-employed sub-contractors in the construction industry—SC60 refunds—are made, and will continue to be made, where the sub-contractor can demonstrate that the deductions for any tax year exceeded his full liability to income tax and class IV national insurance contributions for that year. Although a sub-contractor's self-assessment for 1996–97 will not be due until 31 January 1998, this will not prevent a refund of SC60 deductions being made at an earlier date, if his liability for the year can be established. The Inland Revenue are drawing up guidelines for such claims to repayment, which will shortly be sent in draft to the representatives bodies for comment.

It is impossible to predict the effect of self assessment upon the timing of claims to repayment of SC60 deductions.

Credit Unions

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the length of time taken currently, from the initial application, for credit unions to be registered under the Credit Unions Act 1979; and what estimate he has made of the length of time which will be taken under the Act as amended by the Deregulation (Credit Unions) Order 1996. [31056]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The time taken for a credit union to be registered depends largely on how soon its committee members undergo training and set up the systems needed to run its operations. The deregulation order will not reduce that, though it will cut down the amount of work involved in determining the existence of a common bond among the members. However, as this normally takes place concurrently with other activities, it is unlikely to reduce the overall time taken for registration.

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what criteria the Registry of Friendly Societies will use to assess the status of credit unions wishing to register under the Credit Union Act 1979 as amended by the Deregulation (Credit Unions) Order 1996. [31055]

Mrs. Knight: To be registered a credit union must satisfy the registry that its objectives are the promotion of thrift among members, and the provision of credit at a fair rate of interest; that a common bond exists between members; that it is complying with statutory provisions for rules and insurance against fraud; and that its officers have received appropriate training.

The Deregulation (Credit Unions) Order 1996 will not change the assessment criteria used by the registry, but will allow greater flexibility in establishing a common bond. A guidance note for new credit unions is given to those seeking to start a credit union, and I have placed a copy in the Library.

Drug Seizures

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many drug seizures were made by Customs and Excise in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands in each year since 1990; and if he will indicate for each year the percentage change from the last one. [31095]

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The number of drug seizures made by Customs and Excise in Coventry and the west midlands, and percentage changes were as follows:

	Coventry		West Midlands
	Number	Per cent. change	Number	Per cent. change
1990	0	—	65	—
1991	0	—	64	–1
1992	15	—	94	+46
1993	16	+7	87	–7
1994	14	–13	93	+7
1995	23	+64	120	+29

Living Standards

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the average living standards in each Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development country in 1995; and what was the gap between the United Kingdom and the OECD average. [30796]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The most commonly cited single measure of living standards for which valid international comparison can be made is gross domestic product per capita.

The 1995 figures for GDP per capita are available for all OECD countries in the OECD publication "Main Economic Indicators", which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figure. [30770]

Mrs. Angela Knight: As at 1 April 1996, the Treasury employed three registered disabled people, which represents 0.27 per cent. of the Treasury staff. The Treasury also employs a number of disabled people who have chosen not to register, or who became disabled after the withdrawal of the registration scheme under the provisions of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

Exchange Rate Mechanism

Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy in respect of the pound sterling eventually re-joining a system of managed exchange rates. [30795]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Prime Minister has made clear on many occasions the Government's policy which is that the United Kingdom will not rejoin the ERM during this Parliament, and there is no question of us ever rejoining a rigid, old-style exchange rate mechanism.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to raise the limit below which delivery of an inheritance tax account is not required for administering a deceased person's estate. [32064]

Mr. Jack: The Inland Revenue has today laid regulations increasing the overall limit from £145,000 to £180,000, and relaxing the current rules on lifetime gifts and overseas assets. The changes will come into operation from 1 July 1996, for estates of persons dying on or after 6 April 1996. They will simplify the administration of some 7,500 estates in 1996–97.

Council of Ministers

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the recent Council meeting of the Economic and Finance Ministers of the European Union. [32166]

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I represented the United Kingdom at the Economic and Finance Council—ECOFIN—of the European Union in Luxembourg on 3 June.

At the start of the meeting we reminded the Council that the Prime Minister had made it clear that until there was agreement to lift the export ban on beef derivatives, and until a clear framework was in place leading to a lifting of the wider ban, the UK could not be expected to continue to co-operate normally on other Community business. As a result, the UK could not be expected to agree decisions requiring unanimity.

I later made clear that the UK would not be able to agree the common position on the regulation on the protection of the Community's financial interests although the UK supported the regulation. I also put down a general reserve on a proposal for a directive for a common system of VAT on agricultural outputs.

With the Minister of State, Department for Education and Employment, I attended a joint lunch with other EU Finance Ministers and Social Affairs Ministers at which we discussed the importance and priority of tackling unemployment.

As preparation for the forthcoming Florence European Council, the Council considered a report on progress to date in preparing for stage 3 of economic and monetary union, an interim report on follow-up to discussion of employment at previous European Councils—a substantive report is due for the Dublin European Council—and a draft of the broad economic policy guidelines for the Community and member states.

The Council decided to reinstate the excessive deficit decision relating to Germany and to abrogate the excessive deficit decision against Denmark. The Council did not reach agreement on a proposal to extend the European Investment bank mandate to lend to Asia and Latin America. The Council was consulted on the recommendation by the European Monetary Institute council for the appointment of a new president of the EMI and briefly considered a paper on pension reform in the EU and central and east European countries in preparation for the structured dialogue at the 8 July ECOFIN.

Company Profits (Isle of Wight)

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what account was taken in the company profit component of the gross domestic product figures for the Isle of Wight of the profits of companies or holding companies whose headquarters are not based on the Isle of Wight; and how the effects of the rules relating to habitual residence were applied. [28442]

Mrs. Angela Knight [holding answer 7 May 1996]: For the compilation of regional gross domestic product, profits of multi-regional companies are allocated to the area in which they are generated, either directly where data are available or otherwise by the use of proxies such as wages and salaries of employees in the area.

Habitual residence appears to refer to the main residence of an individual for the Inland Revenue's assessment of tax. Taxes are transfers of income not involving productive activity; habitual residence is not a term associated with gross domestic product since the latter is a measure of production.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy towards the security of human rights in Hong Kong after 1 July 1997. [30977]

Mr. David Davis: The Sino-British joint declaration on the question of Hong Kong, which is a binding treaty between Britain and China, provides for continuing human rights protection in Hong Kong after the handover. Specifically, in the last paragraph of chapter XIII of annex I to the joint declaration, China pledges to ensure that the provisions of the international covenants on civil and political rights and on economic, social and cultural rights, as applied to Hong Kong, remain in force after 30 June 1997.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the interpretation by the Standing Committee of the National Peoples Congress on the implementation in Hong Kong of the Chinese nationality law. [32165]

Mr. Rifkind: The interpretation in question states that British citizenship acquired by Chinese nationals under the British nationality selection scheme will not be recognised under the Chinese nationality law. The British Government regard British citizenship obtained under the BNSS as having exactly the same validity as British citizenship acquired in any other way. We do not differentiate between British citizens who have acquired their British citizenship through the BNSS and those who have acquired it in any other way. Passports issued under the BNSS are the same as passports issued to all other British citizens and are equally valid.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Vietnamese boat people in Hong Kong. [31241]

Mr. David Davis [holding answer 4 June 1996]: There has been encouraging progress in recent months. The steering committee of the international conference on Indo-Chinese refugees, which held its final meeting on March, emphasised that those screened out as non-refugees must return to Vietnam. We have been working hard to raise the monthly number of returnees, with good co-operation from the Vietnamese Government. As a result, the rate of both voluntary and orderly repatriation has increased. It remains our objective to complete the repatriation of Vietnamese migrants by July 1997.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figure. [30765]

Mr. David Davis: Based on a voluntary survey of staff, as at 1 April 1996 the Foreign and Commonwealth employed 48 registered disabled officers. This is 0.7 per cent. of the total number of staff employed.

Military Training

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what type of projects and programmes constitute the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme. [31110]

Mr. David Davis: The military training assistance scheme sponsors developmental and skills training in the UK. This can include training which has a main or subsidiary aim of familiarising participants with British military techniques and equipment. It also provides for in-country developmental and skills training by UK trainers on attachments overseas, the training of nationals from several countries at regional centres, and sponsorship of participants in courses operated by organisations such as the United Nations.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Governments fund the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme; and in what proportions. [31112]

Mr. Davis: UKMTAS is entirely funded by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many police officers from other countries have received training under the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme. [31111]

Mr. Davis: Full details are available only from 1990. Since then, some 179 police officers from overseas countries have attended training courses in the UK sponsored by the scheme.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the cost to public funds of the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme for each year since its inception. [31109]

Mr. Davis: The scheme has been operating in its current form since 1988. Annual financial year expenditure is:

	£ million
1988–89	13.2
1989–90	15.5
1990–91	18.1
1991–92	15.2
1992–93	12.5
1993–94	11.8
1994–95	12.0
1995–96	[1]13.5

[1] Estimate.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries which have received training of police officers under the United Kingdom military training assistance scheme. [31113]

Mr. Davis: In recent years officers from the following police forces have received training sponsored by the scheme:

Belize, Chile, Czech Republic, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Fiji, Honduras, Hungary, India, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Lebanon, Malaysia, Malta, Nepal, Nicaragua, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Palestinian Authority, Philippines, Romania, Slovakia, Sri Lanka, Trinidad and Tobago, Tonga, Uganda and Vanuatu.

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31505]

Mr. David Davis: None.

Kashmir

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when elections are scheduled to take place in Azad Kashmir to elect a new Government; if he will arrange for United Kingdom observers to monitor those elections; and if he will make a statement. [31466]

Mr. David Davis: Legislative assembly elections will be held on 30 June. Staff from our High Commission in Islamabad will visit Azad Kashmir during the elections.

DEFENCE

Porton Down

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) by what methods the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment is currently monitoring the health of the service volunteers who took part in studies at the establishment with the nerve agent pre-treatment sets; [31347]

(2) when the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment carried out studies to evaluate whether nerve agent pre-treatment sets caused long-term health effects in humans; and what were the conclusions of these studies. [31346]

Mr. Arbuthnot: These matters are for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 6 June 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your questions about studies into the long term health effects on humans and the monitoring of the health Service volunteers who took part in studies with the Nerve Agent Pre-treatment Sets (NAPS). I am replying to both questions in this letter as Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA), which now includes the Chemical and Biological Defence Sector (CBD) in its Protection and Life Sciences division (PLSD).

There have not been any studies directly undertaken by CBD Sector, Porton Down, to assess long term health effects on humans of the administration of NAPS tablets and no monitoring of the health of volunteers who took part in studies involving the administration of NAPS is currently being conducted. The active ingredient of NAPS tablets is pyridostigmine bromide, which is licensed for use in the clinical treatment of myasthenia gravis. Adults with this complaint take dosages far in excess of that found in NAPS tablets over extended periods, in some cases for life. There are no indications that these high doses over long period of time give rise to long term health effects.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 9 May, Official Report, columns 223–24, if Porton Down has used service personnel from the service volunteers programme in work which Porton Down has carried out for civilian organisations since 1996; and what has been Porton Down's policy on involving service volunteers in work for civilian organisations. [31349]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 6 June 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question asking whether Service volunteers have been used in work carried out by Porton Down for civilian organisations. The Chemical Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Protection and Life Sciences division (PLSD) of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

No Service volunteers have been involved in work carried out by Porton Down for civilian organisations since 1966. The purpose of the Service volunteer programme is to ensure that any protective measures proposed by CBD Sector are acceptable from a military point of view and therefore it would not be appropriate to involve Service volunteers in work which was not directly relevant to military situations. Moreover, the independent ethics Committee which reviews all protocols for work with volunteers must satisfy itself that there is a military justification for the work before it approves a protocol and no such work can be started until the ethics Committee's approval has been received.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies have been carried out by the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment to evaluate the long-term health effects of short-term exposure to the nerve agent Soman (GD); when these studies were carried out; and what were their conclusions. [31341]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 6 June 1996:

I have been asked to reply to you question concerning studies involving the nerve agent Soman. The Chemical Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Protection and Life Sciences division (PLSD) of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

No studies have been conducted to evaluate long term health effects on volunteers exposed to Soman. The only study carried out by CBD Sector specifically to investigate the long term effects of short term exposure to Soman examined the effects on mouse diaphragm muscle. The study indicated that subtle changes were observed in tissue 3 days after exposure to Soman. However, there was no observable difference in response between exposed and unexposed tissue 28 days after exposure. The findings of the study were published in the Journal of Pharmacy and Pharmacology in 1993 (Volume 45, pages 176–181).

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 8 May, Official Report, column 187, what was the amount of sarin to which volunteers were exposed in the study using single fibre electromyography. [31342]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 6 June 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your further question about the single fibre electromyography study. The Chemical Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Protection and Life Sciences division (PLSD) of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

In this study Service volunteers breathed in Sarin nerve agent vapour whilst walking in an exposure chamber at Porton Down. The Sarin was present at a concentration of 0.5mg m^3 and the volunteers were exposed for 30 minutes. The results of this study have now been reported in the open literature and can be found in the journal "Human and Experimental Toxicology" (1996) Volume 15, pages 369–75.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which division within the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment has had overall responsibility for running the service volunteers programme since 1966. [31343]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 6 June 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question about responsibility for running the Service volunteer programme at the Chemical and Biological Establishment since 1966. The Chemical Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Protection and Life Sciences division (PLSD) of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

In the period from 1966 to 1995 the Medical Division of the former Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment had overall responsibility for administering the Service volunteer programme. The responsibilities included co-ordination of the requests for volunteers to participate in studies, conducting medical examinations, providing medical supervision of studies, maintaining the records of volunteer attendance and liaison with military authorities. Since the internal reorganisation that was prompted by the move of CBDE into the DERA trading fund in 1995 these duties have been discharged by the Medical Countermeasures business centre.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 9 May, Official Report, column 222, for what reasons staff at Porton Down are not allowed to test chemical agents on themselves; and how many staff have deviated from the policy on self-testing since 1966. [31344]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 6 June 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your further question about self experimentation by staff at Porton Down. The Chemical Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Protection and Life Sciences division (PLSD) of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

Staff at Porton Down are not allowed to test chemical agents on themselves because this would not be consistent with the proper ethical control, oversight and experimental design required for work of this nature. The scientific value of such studies would be very limited. We are not aware of any formal studies since 1966 which deviated from this policy.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 9 May, Official Report, column 223, what details of experiments are given on request to the doctors of service personnel who took part in the service volunteers programme at the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment in cases where the service personnel have died. [31345]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 6 June 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question concerning information provided to the doctors of deceased volunteers at the former Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment (CBDE). The Chemical Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Protection and Life Sciences division (PLSD) of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

To date we have not received any enquiries from the doctors of deceased former volunteers. If we were to be approached by a doctor acting on behalf of relatives in such circumstances we would provide them with the same information as if the patient was still living.

I hope this information is helpful.

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment carried out experiments with service volunteers involving the nerve agent GE; and what were the conclusions of this work. [31348]

Mr. Arbuthnot: This is a matter for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency under its framework document. I have asked the chief executive, DERA, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 6 June 1996:

I have been asked to reply to your question about experiments with Service volunteers involving the nerve agent GE. The Chemical Biological Defence Sector (CBD) at Porton Down is now part of the Protection and Life Sciences division (PLSD) of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) for which I am responsible as Chief Executive.

The nerve agent GE was investigated in the early years of the nerve agent programme and those studies indicated that it caused similar effects to other organophosphorus nerve agents. No work involving GE and Service volunteers has been carried out since the early 1950's.

I hope this information is helpful.

Submarine Reactor Flasks

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the submarine reactor flasks being built by Rolls-Royce and Associates. [31327]

Mr. Arbuthnot: A contract for the design and build of purpose-built used fuel flasks for the transportation of used submarine reactor fuel was awarded to Rolls-Royce and Associates in May 1995. Manufacture of the flasks is sub-contracted to BNFL Engineering Ltd. Delivery is currently planned for the end of 1998.

Upholder Submarines

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what receipts from the sale of his Department's Upholder class submarines will be retained by (a) his Department and (b) the Treasury; and if he will make a statement. [31173]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I currently expect that all the receipts accruing from the sale of the Upholder class submarines will be retained by the Ministry of Defence. In the event that actual receipts exceed voted provision, Government accounting regulations stipulate that the excess goes to the Consolidated Fund.

Married Housing Estate

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what guarantees on future standards of repair and maintenance will be sought from private sector institutions which purchase leases on his Department's married housing stock. [31171]

Mr. Arbuthnot: As I told the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) on 23 April, Official Report, column 83, my Department will retain responsibility for the management and maintenance of the quarters which we lease back. This responsibility will continue to be discharged by the Defence Housing Executive after the sale.

Dr. Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who will be responsible for setting the rent levels and what account will be taken of local pay levels and circumstances after the sale of the married housing stock. [31172]

Mr. Arbuthnot: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 4 June to the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar), Official Report, column 344.

Army Technical Support Agency

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets he has set for the Army Technical Support Agency in 1996–97. [32148]

Mr. Soames: The chief executive of the Army Technical Support Agency has been set the following key targets for 1996–97:

Key target 1: Influence equipment design by attaining 70 per cent. acceptance of land systems technical support recommendations.

Key target 2: Achieve a 10 per cent. gross cost saving in advanced order recommended spares purchasing without reducing sustainability or availability of equipment.

Key target 3: Answer 90 per cent. of ad hoc inquiries within two working days.

Key target 4: Achieve an average response time of nine working days for demand for technical publications.

Key target 5: Complete 90 per cent. of operational (O) projects and 65 per cent. of priority A projects before the agreed target date.

Key target 6: Reduce the administrative lead time to complete initial spares provisioning lists to 10 months.

Key target 7: Satisfy 90 per cent. customers when undertaking technical projects.

Key target 8: Improve efficiency by 3.6 per cent. over 1995–96.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llywd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figure. [30768]

Mr. Arbuthnot: At 1 October 1995, the number of registered disabled people employed by the MOD and its agencies was 1,333. This represents 1.2 per cent. of the total staff.

Disposal Sales Agency

Mr. Merchant: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets he has set for the Disposal Sales Agency in 1996–97. [32147]

Mr. Arbuthnot: Since its launch in October 1994 the agency has brought in substantial revenues and has made significant efficiency savings. The key targets which have been set for the chief executive of the Disposal Sales Agency for this financial year are aimed at maintaining the momentum achieved in previous years through industrial participation and other efficiency measures.

1. To achieve disposal sales revenue of £80 million within budgetary cost allocation;

2. To secure efficiency savings of £4 million against the baseline of 1994–95 unit cost of generating £1 million of sales;

3. To increase to 85 per cent. the volume of receipts (excluding Government-to-Government) achieved through contractorised arrangements;

4. To achieve £1 million of sales on behalf of other Government departments and agencies.

National Enterprise Board

Mr. Waller: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement about the National Enterprise Board. [32070]

Mr. Lang: On 5 June 1996 I signed an order under section 11(2) of the British Technology Group Act 1991 dissolving the National Enterprise Board with effect from 1 July 1996.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Industry Council

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EU Industry Council held on 20 May. [30816]

Mr. Eggar: The Council adopted a resolution on industrial co-operation with third countries, particularly the Mediterranean region. The Council also agreed conclusions on shipbuilding which noted the state of ratification of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development agreement.

The Council also reached political agreement on a basis text of a Council decision implementing a third multi-annual programme for small and medium enterprises which incorporated a United Kingdom request for additional wording highlighting value for money considerations. I placed a parliamentary reserve on the text as a whole.

The Commission made oral presentations on its proposal for a new steel aid code to replace the current one which expires on 31 December, developments in the EU competition policy during 1995; its communications on the competitiveness of the chemical industry and on the textile and clothing subcontracting sector. The latter was referred back to COREPER for further consideration.

Finally, under any other business, the Commission gave a brief report on last week's G7 information society conference in South Africa.

Post Office Security Equipment

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what contributions were made by his Department for the provision of security equipment in local post offices in each of the last five years. [31138]

Mr. Oppenheim: The provision of security equipment in sub-post offices is a matter for Post Office Counters Ltd. and sub-postmasters.

Telecommunications (Liberalisation)

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the results of his consideration of responses to his consultation document on the liberalisation of international telecommunications services. [32167]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The Government will be inviting applications from today for further licences to provide international service from the UK, on the same terms enjoyed up to now by only BT and Mercury—that is, on telecommunication facilities owned and controlled by the company providing the service. These companies will be able to offer services on any route they choose.

This is another step in ensuring the continued competitiveness of the United Kingdom, both as a hub for telecommunications traffic worldwide, and as a place where the increasing number of companies for whom telecommunications play a major role in their business will choose to base their operations.

I believe that this further liberalisation will benefit users by bringing down international rates more quickly, and benefit the UK economy by attracting new investment, both by telecommunications operators and user companies, to the UK.

In parallel, we will be continuing to press for improved access for UK operators, both within the EU through strict application of new Community liberalisation rules, and in other countries through the World Trade Organisation.

I am also pleased to announce that the UK will, on 1 July, be lifting the "equivalency" rules which at present limit international simple resale services to certain routes. We will allow the provision of telecommunications services over leased line capacity on any route. I stress, however, that while we wish to open the UK market to full competition, we will ensure that such competition is fair.

I believe that liberalisation in Europe and other major markets reduces this risk of abuse by overseas companies which enjoy a monopoly or are inadequately regulated in their home market. One-way bypass—where companies might continue to charge UK-based carriers above-cost accounting rates, while delivering their own traffic more cheaply here—is an example of such abuse. We will be taking steps to deter such behaviour in the licences we shall be issuing.

The licences will contain many of the provisions already in public telecommunications operator licences and in those for international simple resale. In particular, we will wish to give the Director-General of Telecommunications powers to prevent one-way bypass or discriminatory practices between affiliate companies.

Where there is no overseas competition, provisions will be applied immediately requiring "proportionate return" both for resale and international facilities-based traffic. This will avoid rapid traffic imbalances occurring as a result of one-way bypass. Operators on these routes will also have to charge the same accounting rates as each other.

However, on the six routes which have already been found equivalent, and for EU routes, these obligations will be only reserve powers, and will not be applied unless market developments dictate. As other routes become more competitive, we will waive these last two requirements for those routes.

The new licences will be public telecommunications operator licences, and we will undertake the usual public consultations, and address any further issues which arise in the course of these applications. I aim to be able to issue the first licences from July.

Patent Office

Mr. Waller: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what targets he has set the Patent Office executive agency for 1996–97. [32069]

Mr. Lang: I have set the Patent Office the targets listed for 1996–97.

Efficiency

To increase output in relation to total staff numbers by 2 per cent.

To increase output in relation to total staff costs by 2 per cent.

To increase output in relation to current expenditure by 2 per cent.

Quality

To issue patent search reports within 12 weeks of receipt of a request in the Patent Office.

To issue patent examination reports within 18 months of publication.

To confirm payment of patent renewal fees within six working days of receipt in the Patents Office.

To issue initial search and examination reports on design applications within 12 weeks of receipt of request.

To confirm payment of design registration renewal fees within six working days of receipt in the Patent Office.

To issue trade mark examination reports within two months of data capture in the Patent Office.

To advertise within seven months of examination, trade mark applications which attract no substantive objection at the examination stage.

To register within four months of advertisement, trade mark applications which are not formally opposed.

In addition, I expect the chief executive of the Patent Office to continue to reply within 10 working days to all letters from Members of Parliament delegated to him for reply.

Ariane 5

Sir Michael Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the implications for United Kingdom space policy of the launch failure of Ariane 5; and if he will make a statement. [31872]

Mr. Ian Taylor: The loss of the European Space Agency's first Ariane 5 launch vehicle and the four CLUSTER space science satellites is a great disappointment for everyone involved. The United Kingdom Government contributed £35 million to CLUSTER and invested £12 million in instrumentation. British scientists played a prominent role in the CLUSTER mission and the setback in the research community will be keenly felt. The agency's space science programme will, however, continue to provide important opportunities for British space scientists.

The UK will continue to support competitive European launch capacity to meet commercial and research programme needs. The UK contribution to Ariane, announced in March of this year, totals £2.8 million up to 2000 for the follow on programme for infrastructure. The UK Government also contribute £5 million a year to the operations of the Kourau launch centre. The decision to re-enter the Ariane programme came as a result of discussions with industry about the priorities for British space policy. A further space policy seminar with industry is to be held on 25 June.

The Government's interest in space focuses particularly on our contribution to the science programme and the increasingly important civil activities of earth observation, pollution monitoring, mineral extraction data, global navigation, telecommunications, television and weather forecasting.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer of 22 May, Official Report, column 265, how much Britain has gained or lost in pounds sterling as a result of changes in exchange rates in each of the last three years. [31261]

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The structural funds regulations provide for a number of block allocations of grants for multi-annual programmes to be made to each member state. These allocations, like the whole of the EC budget, from which they are drawn, are denominated in ecu. Changes in exchange rates therefore affect the value in national currencies of the structural funds grants received by all member states. There are no losses or gains in sterling terms since the sterling equivalent of the ecu value of the allocations are known only when the programmes are completed.

Accounts (Late Filing Penalties)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the current tariff of penalties employed at Companies House for late filing of accounts, indicating what size businesses the penalties relate to, and including the sliding scale for the length of delay in filing. [30729]

Mr. Oppenheim [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The registrar and chief executive of Companies House executive agency has delegated authority to deal with such matters on behalf of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The registrar has been asked to write to the hon. Lady.

Letter from John S. Holden to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated 6 June 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question concerning the current tariff of penalties employed at Companies House for late filing of accounts.

The scale of late filing penalties, the class of company against which these are levied and the time periods involved are set out in the following table.

Scale of Penalties

	Public companies £	Private companies £
Not more than 3 months late	500	100
More than 3 months but not more than 6 months late	1,000	250
More than 6 months but not more than 12 months late	2,000	500
More than 12 months late	5,000	1,000

The scale of penalties is laid down in Section 242A of the Companies Act and applies equally to all companies in each class, irrespective of their size.

I hope this is helpful.

Research Councils

Mr. Ingram: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will place in the Library the memoranda issued to (a) the chief executives of the research councils, and (b) the director generals of the research councils setting out the conditions of their appointments. [31192]

Mr. Ian Taylor [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The Director General of Research Councils is a senior civil servant serving on a limited period appointment. Apart from his performance bonus arrangements the conditions of his appointment are those of senior civil servants. The chief executives of the research councils are employees of the councils. I have placed in the Library of the House the statement issued to those appointed since 1 April 1994 detailing the conditions of their appointments as chief executive and as accounting officer.

Rail Transport Research

Mr. Riddick: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measures are being taken to ensure that research into rail transport continues following privatisation. [32168]

Mr. Watts: I have been asked to reply.

I have approved the establishment of a review to consider the best mechanism for directing and co-ordinating research and development in order to meet the needs of the new railway industry. The review will provide advice for the successor bodies, which, following privatisation, will be responsible for determining their own research requirements. It will be chaired by Professor Sir David Davies, chief scientific adviser, Ministry of Defence. Its membership comprises: Professor Brian Mellitt director, engineering and production, Railtrack plc; Mr. Gordon Pettitt, transport management consultant, formerly managing director, regional railways; Professor Tony Ridley, professor of Transport Engineering, University of London centre for transport studies; and Mr. Tony Roche, board member, engineering services and safety, British Railways Board. The review is currently in the process of collecting evidence and will present its findings and recommendations to the permanent secretary, Department of Transport, by late summer.

SOCIAL SECURITY

State Pensions

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the state pension for (a) a single pension and (b) a couple would have been in April 1995 and April 1996 if the pension in each of these years had been uprated by the higher of the retail prices index or earnings in both of these years; and what estimate he has made of (i) the gross additional costs of such increases in pension and (ii) the net cost after savings in (1) means-tested benefits and (2) increased Treasury receipts from income tax. [30163]

Mr. Heald: The information is in the table:

	Retirement pension single rate £	Retirement pension couple rate £	Cost to national insurance fund £	Savings in income-related benefits £	Increase in Treasury income tax receipts £
1995–96	59.90	95.75	470 million	130 million	50 million
1996–97	62.25	99.50	510 million	140 million	50 million

Sources:

1. National insurance fund estimates provided by Government Actuary department.
2. Income-related benefit effects calculated using the policy simulation model 1996–97, based on the family expenditure surveys 1991, 1992 and 1993.
3. Income tax figures supplied by the Inland Revenue and calculated using provisional figures from a projection of the 1994 family expenditure survey.

Notes:

1. All costs are rounded to the nearest £10 million with the exception of income tax receipts which are rounded to the nearest £50 million.
2. The estimate for 1996–97 is based upon uprating the 1995–96 figures shown in the table.
3. Rates of retirement pension have been calculated on the basis of movement in the retail prices index and the average earnings, whole economy, index as produced by the Office of National Statistics as appropriate.

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many pensioners will be affected by the reductions in the reduced earnings allowance. [30833]

Mr. Roger Evans: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on 25 April, column 252.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what modification will be made in the application of the good cause clause in reduced earnings allowance cases which are restricted to 12 months' retrospection; and how they will now apply. [31258]

Mr. Evans: No change has been made to the application of the good cause provisions for late claims to reduced earnings allowance However, where there is good cause for a late claim or application for review of an award made on or after 24 March 1996, a maximum 12 months arrears of reduced earnings allowance is payable, in line with other, non-industrial injuries benefits.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if reduced earnings allowance will continue to be paid to a married woman who reaches 60 years of age but who has insufficient national insurance contributions to claim a retirement pension in her own right and her husband is in full-time employment and under 65 years of age. [31256]

Mr. Evans: Reduced earnings allowance recipients who have given up regular employment will transfer to retirement allowance after reaching state pension age.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the reasons for the 12-month restriction on back dating reduced earnings allowance in cases where the effects of a latent injury or disease have resulted in a loss of faculty which has reduced the claimant's earnings capacity; and what further retrospection will be allowed in such cases to the date of the last application for an award. [31257]

Mr. Evans: The introduction of a maximum 12-month period for payment of arrears of reduced earnings allowance is designed to bring the allowance into line with other, non-industrial injuries, earnings replacement benefits such as incapacity benefit or income support. Reduced earnings allowance is payable only in respect of industrial accidents occurring or prescribed diseases with a date of onset, before 1 October 1990. It is not justifiable to continue backdating payments in such claims indefinitely. Reduced earnings allowance can still be backdated for a maximum of 12 months where someone can show good cause for making a late claim.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many representations he has received regarding the reduction in reduced earnings allowance; and how many of these representations express support for the changes he has made. [31143]

Mr. Evans: As at 31 May, 97 right hon. Members and two organisations have written to Ministers. The letters have generally expressed concern or sought clarification.

Disability Discrimination Act

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will issue a code of practice on access to goods, facilities, services and premises under part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. [32084]

Mr. Burt: I have today laid a draft code of practice covering rights of access to goods, facilities, services and premises before Parliament under the powers contained in sections 51 and 52 of the Act. Proposals for the code were made by the National Disability Council following a very successful public consultation exercise. Response to the NDC's draft was favourable, with particular praise for the clear drafting and use of examples to explain the concepts contained in the Act.

In conjunction with the consultation by the NDC, the Government consulted on a number of proposals for regulations under part III of the Act. Regulations covering powers of attorney; insurance; guarantees and the exclusion of certain education-related services will be laid before Parliament in the near future.

The draft code of practice and the regulations will come into force on 2 December 1996, subject to parliamentary approval. The code will be published as soon as possible to give service providers, those involved in the selling, letting and managing of premises and others affected time to take account of its guide.

The Disability Discrimination Act is a huge step forward for disabled people. The code forms part of a co-ordinated framework of advice and guidance to ensure that the business community and disabled people are aware of their new duties and rights.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will issue guidance on the definition of disability under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. [32149]

Mr. Burt: I have today laid draft guidance before Parliament under the powers contained in section 3 of the Act. A draft of the guidance was issued as part of the recent consultation exercise carried out by the Department for Education and Employment. Many respondents to that consultation felt that the draft could be improved in terms of its structure and should provide fuller guidance. They also felt that the guidance in the draft should be put into context with references to the relevant provisions of the Act. The draft which I have laid before Parliament reflects these views. The Act defines disability as a physical or mental impairment which has substantial and long-term adverse effect on a person's ability to carry out normal day-to-day activities. People who have had a disability in the past which met this definition are also protected by the Act. The guidance explains some of the matters to be taken into account in determining whether an impairment has this effect.

The guidance is not legally binding, but an industrial tribunal or court must take it into account where it appears to be relevant. In most cases it will be clear whether or not someone meets the definition of disability in the Act. The purpose of the guidance is to provide help where there is doubt over whether someone is disabled. It is designed primarily for courts or tribunals, but may also be of help to disabled people and businesses.

I have also laid regulations before Parliament which refine the Act's definition of disability. Proposals for the use of regulations on the definition of disability were also included in the DfEE's consultation exercise, and the regulations have been drafted to reflect views expressed. The regulations make it clear that addictions, anti-social behaviour and tattoos and body piercings will not entitle people to protection under the Act. They also make it clear that babies and young children are protected by the Act.

The regulations and the draft guidance will commence on 30 July 1996 subject to approval by Parliament.

TRANSPORT

MV Derbyshire

Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will estimate the cost of the technical experts listed by his Department to take part in the second survey of the MV Derbyshire wreckage field. [31273]

Mr. Norris: I refer the hon. Member to my reply on 7 May, Official Report, column 52.

Railfreight Distribution

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to privatise Railfreight Distribution; and if he will make a statement. [32067]

Mr. Watts: I have today announced that the Government have decided that Railfreight Distribution—British Rail's channel tunnel freight business—should be offered for sale as soon as possible. I have asked BR, in consultation with my Department, to draw up a programme for its disposal. The offer for sale will be based on the existing business.

Railfreight Distribution is heavily loss-making. Privatisation will enable the business to be put onto a sound financial footing so that the growth potential of international freight services via the channel tunnel can be exploited on a commercial basis, thereby furthering the objective of transferring more freight from road to rail.

Departmental Research Sites (Sale)

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the proposed sale of his Department's former research site at Crowthorne and Livingston. [32169]

Mr. Norris: My Department no longer needs to own the sites at Crowthorne and Livingston after the sale of the Transport Research Laboratory to the Transport Research Foundation. It has a 15-year lease at Crowthorne and a one-year tenancy at Livingston. Healey and Baker are to market the Crowthorne site and Richard Ellis the Livingston site. Applications are about to be made to the local planning authorities to confirm the existing use and planning status of each site, including the scope to rebuild on the sites. The sites will be put on the market in the near future.

British Rail Maintenance Ltd.

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when Ernst and Young's report of their emerging findings on the sale of British Rail's former heavy maintenance depots, British Rail Maintenance Ltd., will be available. [32068]

Mr. Watts: I have today placed a copy in the Library.

Newbury Bypass

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what are the implications for the Newbury bypass of the discovery of the snail Vertigo moulinsiana in the area; [32065]

(2) when the Highways Agency expects to award the main contract for the Newbury bypass; and if he will make a statement. [32066]

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) which contractor has won the main contract for the construction of the Newbury bypass; [31360]

(2) which contractor has won the contract for archaeological work on the route of the Newbury bypass; [31361]

(3) what measures he expects the Highways Agency to take to replace any snail habitat lost through the construction of the Newbury bypass. [31364]

Mr. Watts: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment explains today in a separate answer to the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) that public consultation is now under way on a formal recommendation by English Nature, made through the Joint Nature Conservation Committee, that various locations in the Kennet and Lambourn valleys be considered as a possible candidate for designation in due course as a special area of conservation under European directive 92/43/EEC—the habitats directive—following the discovery of large populations of the species Vertigo moulinsiana, Desmoulin's whorl snail, in these locations.

One of the locations in question, Bagnor island, is due to be crossed by the Newbury bypass. Part of another area, Speen moor, will be affected by it. My right hon. Friend and I have accordingly considered JNCC's recommendation and the implications for the bypass.

The provisions of regulations 50 to 53 of the Conservation (Natural Habitats &c) Regulations 1994, review of existing decisions and consents, do not apply in the case of this site which is not yet a "European site" as defined by the regulations, nor is it yet subject to the policy protection which the Government apply to candidate SACs from the time when they are proposed to the Commission. However, in the light of the acknowledged conservation value of the site, my right hon. Friend and I have considered whether the bypass can proceed in a manner which is consistent with the conservation objectives of the directive.

The site recommended by JNCC consists of a cluster of eight separate locations, six of which are unaffected by the proposed bypass. The conservation objectives of the recommended SAC in the Kennet and Lambourn floodplain would be to seek to ensure that a large and viable overall population of the snail was maintained in the area. English Nature and the Highways Agency have discussed measures to achieve these conservation objectives. Porous asphalt will be used to minimise spray and the discharge of run-off will be controlled to reduce pollution. A number of further measures which can be implemented by the Highways Agency have been agreed in principle with English Nature. These will reduce the extent of snail habitat which would otherwise be destroyed by the road, together with other measures to maintain the conservation status of the snail in the area. Areas of new habitat are planned which will be much greater than those lost. The main measures are detailed in paragraphs 4.3 and 4.4 (option 2A) in the report "A34 Newbury Bypass—Impact of the A34 on Vertigo Moulinsiana and Opportunities for Mitigation—May 1996", copies of which have been placed in the Library. English Nature considers that, subject to further detailed discussion, these measures, if successfully implemented, should maintain the overall snail populations within the Kennet and Lambourn floodplain, and extend the distribution of the snail within the area where these measures are to be carried out.

My right hon. Friend and I are in any case satisfied that there are no alternative solutions and that there are imperative reasons of overriding public interest for proceeding with the proposed bypass.

Both the need for the bypass and the choice of route were established following the statutory procedures set out in the Highways Act 1980, which included two public inquiries. In addition to these procedures, my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State for Transport announced his conclusion on the choice of route following a further assessment in 1995. The assessment took into account changes in appraisal techniques and local circumstances, as well as new traffic and economic data since the public inquiries and the subsequent statutory decision to go ahead with a western bypass. He considered carefully the balance between all the options and concluded that the proposed route was the most effective solution for Newbury. Having considered the new information about Vertigo moulinsiana, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I are satisfied that it does not change the balance of the weight of evidence, including environmental evidence, in favour of this particular route. As I have already explained, new measures will be adopted with the aim of reducing the effects of the road on the snail population.

The imperative reasons for overriding public interest for proceeding with the bypass are environmental, social and economic. In particular:

- the bypass will relieve the severe environmental problems along the existing A34 in the town including noise and reduced air quality. At present, around 50,000 vehicles per day use the A34 through Newbury. This figure could increase to 78,000 by the year 2010 if the bypass is not built. In particular, the bypass will reduce heavy lorry traffic through Newbury by up to about 70 per cent.;
- it will improve road safety. Over the next 30 years, we estimate that 28 lives will be saved, and an estimated 370 serious casualties and 1420 less serious injuries will be avoided;
- it will aid the economy. The A34 is an important route nationally, linking the North and the Midlands with the ports of Southampton and Portsmouth. But high traffic volumes are causing long tailbacks and delays and these are getting worse. At peak times queues can extend over five miles either side of the town. The bypass will relieve a serious bottleneck on this important trunk road.

Extensive reviews of the trunk road programme in 1994 and 1995 have confirmed the need for the bypass.

My right hon. Friend and I are satisfied that the proposed course of action is consistent with the conservation objectives of the habitats directive. We have concluded after careful consideration that the bypass should proceed without further delay, and I instructed the Highways Agency to let the main contract for its construction.

Accordingly the main contract for the construction of the bypass has been awarded to Costain Civil Engineering Ltd. York Archaeological Trust has been awarded the contract for archaeological work along the route.

SCOTLAND

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figure. [30779]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of registered disabled staff employed the Scottish Office core and its executive agencies at 1 April 1996 is shown in the table.

Registered disabled staff in post in the Scottish Office and its executive agencies at 1 April 1996

	Total	Per cent.
Registered disabled staff	58	1.1
All other staff	5,180	98.9

Water and Sewerage Authorities

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what considerations led him to specify 6.5 per cent. as the rate of return he believes to be reasonable for the water and sewerage authorities. [30836]

Mr. Kynoch: The required rate of return reflects an assessment of the opportunity cost to the economy of new investment in activities such as the provision of water and sewerage services which involve low risk.

Ms Celia Urquhart

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the positions to which Ms Celia Urquhart has been appointed by his Department. [31067]

Mr. Kynoch: Ms Urquhart is currently a member of (a) the National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Scotland and (b) Scottish Enterprise.

Fixed Penalties

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many cases which have been dealt with by way of fixed penalty by procurators fiscal in Scotland in each of the past five years have also resulted in awards being made by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. [31069]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not available.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland under what provisions it is necessary to establish that a crime has been committed before an award can be made by the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board. [31070]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The board makes ex gratia payments of compensation in respect of eligible applications received up until 31 March 1996, under the provisions of the 1990 criminal injuries compensation scheme.

The terms of the scheme are reproduced in the board's annual reports, copies of each of which have been placed in the Libraries of the House. The scheme defines a criminal injury as one directly attributable to a crime of violence, including arson or poisoning, to an offence of trespass on a railway, or to activities such as attempting to apprehend an offender or prevent an offence being committed.

It is not necessary for an offender to have been convicted of a crime, but the board will not make an award if it is not persuaded that the injury has resulted from a crime of violence and may withhold or reduce compensation if the applicant has not taken, without delay, all reasonable steps to inform the police of the circumstances of the injury and to co-operate with the police in bringing the offender to justice. It is the board's policy to ask the police to investigate compensation applications which may be fraudulent, including those where there is a suspicion that the injury did not result from a criminal act.

Abortion

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many deaths were recorded as a result of abortion operations in Scotland in 1995; [31315]

(2) how many abortions (a) in total and (b) per 1,000 women were carried out in Scotland in 1995. [31319]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The provisional number of abortions performed in Scotland under the Abortion Act 1967 in 1995 was 11,136; the rate per 1,000 women aged 15–44 was 10.1. None of the abortions performed in Scotland in 1995 resulted in the death of the pregnant woman.

Fire Service

Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many fire fighters in the fire service in Scotland have had to retire through post-traumatic stress disorder, stress or depression arising from their job. [31350]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally.

Unitary Authorities

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the amount of standard spending assessment per person for each of the new unitary authorities. [31165]

Mr. Kynoch: Standard spending assessments do not apply to Scotland. The equivalent figures are for Government-supported expenditure for which the information requested is as follows:

	[1] [2] [3]GSE per person
Aberdeen City	1,078
Aberdeenshire	1,063
Angus	1,057
Argyll and Bute	1,397

[1] Population estimates for mid-1994 supplied by Registrar General for Scotland.

[2] GSE comprises grant-aided expenditure, plus allowances for: loan and leasing charges; expenditure on council tax benefit and housing benefit net of DSS subsidy; and, where applicable, expenditure on urban programme net of specific grant.

[3] The Islands Councils of Orkney, Shetland and Western Isles were unitary authorities prior to 1 April 1996.

Nature Conservation Payments

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the payments made to landowners by Scottish National Heritage for nature conservation purposes and access to their estates in each year since 1991. [30505]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 22 May 1996]: Scottish Natural Heritage, which came into existence in 1992, makes payments to landowners in two ways, through management agreements and grants. Details of grant payments are listed in the annual reports of SNH, copies of which are in the Library of the House. A list of all management agreements was published in SNH's first annual report and new agreements are included in subsequent reports.

Cullen Inquiry

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will amend the terms of reference of the Cullen inquiry to include consideration of the depiction of murder on films, videos and television as a possible contributory cause of violent behaviour. [30510]

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 4 June 1996]: The terms of reference already allow the Inquiry to consider the issues arising from the tragic events at Dunblane primary school on 13 March, as well as the circumstances leading up to and surrounding these events.

Animal Feedstuffs

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the Ministry for Agriculture Fisheries and Food (a) first evaluated and (b) first had access to a test for mammalian material in animal feedstuffs. [29913]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 17 May 1996]: I have been asked to reply.

The development of the ELISA test for bovine, ovine and porcine protein in ruminant feed has been a long-term project, based upon previous expertise in the identification of species of origin of meat. There were significant difficulties in purifying raw material to prevent interference by and cross reactions with many plant components of animal feed. Once resolved, there was a period of further validation based on the testing of feed samples collected on farm, commencing in June 1994. Additional testing of feed samples collected on farm, commencing in June 1994. Additional problems were identified, particularly relating to cross reactions with ingredients not previously tested, until the test was considered secure enough by mid-1995 to embark on surveillance at feed mills in compliance with Commission decision 95/287.

PRIME MINISTER

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 14 May, Official Report, columns 762–63, what consideration he has given to the issue addressed to him by the chairman of United Kingdom Families Flight 103, in a letter of 13 May, as to (a) whether the criminal investigation findings were reliable and complete and (b) whether there has been a fabrication of evidence to conceal certain matters therein set out. [30298]

The Prime Minister: My noble and learned Friend, the then Lord Advocate, concluded after the most intensive investigation in United Kingdom history that there was no evidence to support charges against the nationals of any other country. The alleged involvement of a Palestinian terrorist group was closely investigated during the early stages of the investigation, but no credible evidence emerged to substantiate its involvement in the Lockerbie crime. It is for a jury to decide how reliable the evidence is, but successive Lord Adovcates would not have brought and maintained charges if they had believed that the evidence on which they were based was unreliable, incomplete or fabricated.

Beef Ban

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Prime Minister what representations were made to the United States Government following their banning of British beef in 1989; what further negotiations have taken place since; and if he will make a statement. [31114]

The Prime Minister: It is not true that the United States authorities banned British beef in 1989. However, the USA has not accepted imports of bone in beef from Britain since 1989. After 1989, negotiations concentrated on securing access to US markets for boneless beef, which were successfully concluded in July 1994. Negotiations continue on securing wider access to the US markets, although in regular discussions with representatives of industry, the USA has not been identified as a priority market for the export of beef.

Kashmir

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make representations to the Prime Minister of Azad Kashmir concerning the detention in Mirpur prison of Chazanfer Ali; and if he will make a statement. [31422]

The Prime Minister: As Ghazanfer Ali, a Pakistani national, has now been formally charged and has made appearances in court, it is now a matter for the Azad Kashmir authorities. It would not be appropriate for us to make further representations.

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Prime Minister what instructions were issued to Government offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31515]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given today by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 June. [30456]

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 6 June [30457]

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Security and Intelligence Services

Mr. Day: To ask the Prime Minister when the annual report of the commissioner appointed under the Security Service Act 1989 will be laid before the House; and if he will make a statement. [32004]

The Prime Minister: A copy of Lord Justice Stuart-Smith's sixth annual report for 1995 has been laid before the House today in accordance with section 4(6) of the Security Service Act 1989. The confidential annex to the report has been excluded from that copy in accordance with section 4(7) of the 1989 Act. I am grateful to the commissioner for his work in providing assistance to the tribunal as provided in that Act and for reviewing the issue of warrants under the Intelligence Services Act 1994. I note that he is satisfied that the Secretaries of State have exercised their powers in accordance with the provisions of the 1994 Act.

Sir Roger Moate: To ask the Prime Minister when the annual report of the commissioner appointed under the Intelligence Services Act 1994 will be laid before the House; and if he will make a statement. [32005]

The Prime Minister: A copy of Lord Justice Stuart-Smith's first annual report, for 1995, has been laid before the House today in accordance with section 8(6) of the Intelligence Services Act 1994. The confidential annex to the report has been excluded from that copy in accordance with section 8(7) of the 1994 Act. I am grateful to the Commissioner for his work in reviewing the issue of warrants and authorisations, and in providing assistance to the tribunal as provided for in the Act. I note that he is satisfied that the Secretary of State has properly exercised his powers under the two sections of the 1994 Act.

Sir Jim Lester: To ask the Prime Minister when the annual report of the commissioner appointed under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 will be laid before the House; and if he will make a statement. [32006]

The Prime Minister: A copy of Lord Nolan's annual report for 1995 has been laid before the House today in accordance with section 8(7) of the Interception of Communications Act 1985. The confidential annex to the report has been excluded from that copy in accordance with section 8(8) of the 1985 Act. I am grateful to the commissioner for his work in reviewing the issue of warrants and in providing assistance to the tribunal as provided for in the Act. I note in particular the commissioner's view that the interception of both postal and telecommunications remains both an effective and essential operation in the interests of national security and the economic well being of the United Kingdom, and the prevention and detection of serious crime.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

European History

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what action she proposes to take in response to recommendation 1283 (1996) of the parliamentary assembly of the Council of Europe on history and the learning of history in Europe; and if she will make a statement. [31433]

Mr. Forth: The Government make the recommendation, much of which is reflected in the national curriculum. My officials, together with members of Ofsted and the Schools Curriculum and Assessment Authority will continue to contribute to the Council of Europe's meetings and projects on history teaching in Europe.

School Inspections

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what representations have been received (a) for and (b) against a six-yearly cycle of school inspections during the consultation on future inspection arrangements; when the results will be published; and if she will make a statement; [31017]

(2) what criteria will be used in assessing which schools will be inspected more frequently than the proposed six-yearly cycle; what proportion of schools she estimates will be affected; and if she will make a statement. [30996]

Mr. Robin Squire: Her Majesty's chief inspector is currently consulting educational interests on future inspection arrangements. Once I have his advice on the outcome, I will make a further statement.

Disability Discrimination Act 1995

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what conclusions she has reached following the recent public consultation on an employment code of practice and employment regulations under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995; and if she will make a statement. [32063]

Mr. Paice: Over 670 replies were received from organisations and individuals by the close of the consultation period at the end of March. This was a welcome and helpful response.

Most respondents considered that the draft code could be improved in the way it gave guidance on the employment provisions in the Act and helped employers avoid discrimination in all areas of employment. There was also a great deal of support for the code to contain more illustrative examples. Although most respondents considered that the length of the draft was about right, the constructive comments they, and others, made could not be taken into account without substantial revision.

We have therefore arranged to lay before Parliament today a redrafted code of practice relating to the elimination of discrimination in the field of employment against disabled people and people who have had a disability. The code includes many illustrative examples and significant additional guidance about the employment provisions of the Act, as well as information about how complaints might be made and how to seek further information, and a comprehensive index. It should now meet the needs of organisations of all sizes covered by the Act's employment provisions.

The proposals for employment regulations were supported by a majority of those who expressed a view and only minor changes have been needed to deal with some issues which were identified during the consultation process. As a result, we have also laid before Parliament today the Disability Discrimination (Employment) Regulations 1996.

The consultation exercise also sought views on two issues for which we made no proposals for regulations but were interested in opinions about the merit of possible change. One issue was the setting of a financial cap for making a reasonable adjustment. A clear majority of those who expressed a view were not in favour of a cap, and the Department is not proposing to introduce one when employment provisions are commenced.

The other issue was whether the duty of reasonable adjustment should apply to aspects of physical features of buildings or extensions which meet the British standard 5810.

A clear majority of those who expressed a view considered it should apply and we do not propose to introduce regulations on this issue. Therefore no aspect of a building will be exempted from the duty of reasonable adjustment simply because it meets BS5810.

We have decided that the employment provisions of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 will commence on 2 December 1996. The draft code of practice and the Disability Discrimination (Employment) Regulations 1996 will also commence on that date, subject to completion of the parliamentary procedure. The code will be published as soon as possible to give employers and others affected by the employment provisions time to take account of its guidance.

A statistical analysis of the responses to the consultation is being placed in the Library.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Schoolteachers (Qualifications)

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to his answer of 1 May, Official Report, column 552, where he stated that 198 Irish schoolteachers had their qualifications recognised in Great Britain under EU rules in 1993–94, what assessment he has made of the number of recognitions cited in the European Commission's recent report on the implementation of the professional qualifications directive; and if he will make a statement. [31122]

Mr. Ancram: The 1,277 recognitions relate to the cumulative total for England and Wales since directive 89/48/EEC was implemented, whereas the 198 recognitions refer to 1993–94 and include Scotland.

School Transport

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) by how much school transport costs have risen in (a) cash, (b) real price and (c) percentage terms since the Government adopted a policy of open enrolment; [31030]

(2) what have been the percentage, cash and real terms changes in transport costs in the primary, secondary, further and special needs sectors of education since the adoption of a policy of open enrolment. [31031]

Mr. Ancram: Between the introduction of open enrolment policy in 1990 and March 1995—1994–95 is the latest year for which actual expenditure is available—net expenditure on school transport has risen by some 50 per cent. from £23.2 million in 1990–91 to £34.7 million. The equivalent figures in constant price terms are £26.4 million and £34.7 million respectively reflecting an increase of approximately 31 per cent. Separate costs are not readily available for primary, secondary, further and special needs sectors of education and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the principal factors underlying the change in school transport costs in the last five years. [31032]

Mr. Ancram: The principal factors are an increase in the total school population, an increase in the proportion of pupils attending schools beyond statutory walking distance and an increase in the cost of provision of such transport.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a breakdown of current education transport costs by made of transport. [31033]

Mr. Ancram: The latest year for which actual expenditure is available is 1994–95 and the information is as follows:

	£ million
Education and Library Board Vehicles	9.2
Public Transport	19.9
Taxi Services	3.8
Other	1.8
Total	34.7

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to what extent the rise in education transport costs is due to increases in charges by transport companies. [31034]

Mr. Ancram: Increases in charges by public transport providers account for approximately 21 per cent. of the total cost increases for school transport in the period 1990–91 to 1994–95.

Education Funding

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list his allocation of resources to each of the education and library boards in the current financial year; and what percentage increase this constitutes over the 1995 allocation in constant price terms. [31035]

Mr. Ancram: The total allocation to the education and library boards for 1996–97 is £963.3 million, an increase of 0.6 per cent. at constant prices over the allocations initially provided for 1995–96. Individual board allocations have not yet been finalised as the 1996–97 figure includes £28.5 million which is earmarked for specific purposes, and has not yet been distributed among the five boards. I will write to the hon. Member later in the year when directly comparable allocation figures are available.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will state his allocation of resources to the schools which he directly funds; and what percentage increase this constitutes over the 1995 allocation in constant price terms. [31036]

Mr. Ancram: The information requested for the financial years 1995–96 and 1996–97 is set out in the table.

	1996–97 £	Percentage increase (constant prices)
Voluntary grammar schools	113,696,000	1.47
Grant maintained integrated schools
Primary	4,366,000	16.43
Secondary	7,266,000	30.36

The 1996–97 figures for grant maintained integrated schools take account of three new secondary schools and one new primary school and increased enrolments in existing schools.

Law Reform Advisory Committee

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) when the Law Reform Advisory Committee commenced work on the subject of landlord liability for failure to repair defective premises; what tenants interest groups it has consulted; and when it will issue its report; [31123]

(2) what factors led the Law Reform Advisory Committee to cease further work on actions arising out of insidious diseases; [31124]

(3) if it is the policy of the Law Reform Advisory Committee to make submissions to the Law Commission on areas of work in which it is interested; [31125]

(4) what is the policy of the Law Reform Advisory Committee in respect of when it addresses issues on which the Law Commission is working. [31128]

Sir John Wheeler: The Law Reform Advisory Committee is an independent non-statutory body whose remit is to keep the civil law of Northern Ireland under review and make recommendations for its reform to the Secretary of State. The committee operates within terms of reference and a programme of law reform which are approved by the Secretary of State. Within these parameters, the committee has an independence in policy matters and a discretion with regard to the working practices it adopts in pursuance of its remit. Accordingly, the advice of the chairman to the committee, the right hon. Lord Justice Carswell, has been sought on those aspects of the hon. and learned Gentleman's questions which refer to the committee's policy areas and detailed working practices.

The sub-committee dealing with the topic of landlord liability topic is at an early stage of the consultative process. It is not therefore possible to say at this stage when a report will be issued. The main committee decided to defer preparation of its report on actions arising out of insidious diseases until the Law Commission has completed discussions with the insurance industry on the remedies of plaintiffs against insurers.

The Law Reform Advisory Committee regards it as an important part of its work to consult the Law Commission regularly. It also considers the work of the Law Commission and decides which topics merit further consideration given the particular relevances to its jurisdiction.

Paedophiles Register

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will ask the Home Secretary to include Northern Ireland from the beginning in legislation to set up a national register of convicted paedophiles. [31126]

Sir John Wheeler: The Government are considering suggestions that convicted sex offenders should be required by law to notify the police of any changes of address. My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary intends to publish a consultation document shortly which will canvas views on this and other measures

At that time I will wish to seek views on the applicability of the proposals to Northern Ireland.

Balloo Road, Bangor

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what were the accident and casualty rates over the last five years on the Balloo road in Bangor; if he will give an assessment of the improvements required; and what are his Department's plans for upgrading that road. [31127]

Mr. Moss: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Roads Service under its chief executive, Mr. W. J. McCoubrey. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from W. J. McCoubrey to Mr. Robert McCartney, dated 31 May 1996:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply to your question about accident and casualty rates on the Balloo Road in Bangor and future improvement proposals for the road.

The RUC, who are responsible for compiling accident statistics, have advised me that in the 5 year period 1991–1995 inclusive 39 injury accidents in which 2 people were killed and 60 injured (7 seriously) were recorded in respect of the Balloo Road in Bangor.

Balloo Road is 2,200 metres long. The two end sections of the road, totalling some 1,400 metres have been reconstructed in the last 10 years at a cost of £1.5M. A scheme to bring the 800m central section up to a similar standard is included in the 6–15 year major roadworks programme where its priority will be assessed as part of a detailed review to be completed later this year. The work will involve reconstructing the carriageway to 9 m width with right turning lanes at 4 junctions, constructing footways on each side and installing traffic signals with a pedestrian facility at the Bloomfield Road South junction.

Peace Process

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on nominations to the forthcoming political negotiations, and about progress in setting up the forum established by the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Act 1996. [32163]

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I have issued invitations to nominate teams to participate in the negotiations, under section 2(2) of the Northern Ireland (Entry to Negotiations, etc) Act 1996, to the nominating representatives of the following parties:

Alliance Party
Democratic Unionist Party—DUP
Labour
Northern Ireland Women's Coalition
Progressive Unionist Party (PUP)
Social Democratic and Labour Party (SLDP)
UK Unionist Party—Robert McCartney
Ulster Democratic Party (UDP)
Ulster Unionist Party (UUP)

I am required by section 2(3) of the Act to refrain from inviting nominations in respect of any part if I consider that requirements set out in paragraphs 8 and 9 of the ground rules for substantive all-party negotiations—published as Command Paper 3232—are not met in relation to it. Paragraph 9 of the ground rules makes clear the agreement of the British and Irish Governments that the participation of Sinn Fein in the negotiations requires the unequivocal restoration of the ceasefire of August 1994.

After consultation with the Irish Government, both Governments are agreed that this requirement is not met and that, for so long as it is not met, no invitation can be issued in respect of Sinn Fein.

Letters have also been sent to the nominating representatives of all parties returned at the elections, including Sinn Fein, about arrangements for the forum. With them is a draft of initial rules of procedure, on which we seek comment. The letters also deal with the location of the forum: we have now identified suitable premises for it at the Interpoint centre in Belfast. I am placing a copy of these letters in the Library of the House.

Hydro-electricity

Rev. Ian Paisley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make available to the representatives of Lough Neagh and Maine System Game Anglers Association details of the minutes of meetings which took place between the fisheries division of the Department of Agriculture, the energy policy division of the Department of Economic Development, the hydro-electric consultant Mr. Dougal Baillie and a turbine manufacturer based in the Province with regard to the Radalstown hydro-electric application. [31223]

Mr. Ancram [holding answer 4 June 1996]: No meeting of these parties took place on this subject.

WALES

Cattle Slaughter Scheme

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from farming organisations concerning extensions of the 25p per kilo live weight supplementary payment until the 30-months slaughter scheme is fully operational; and if he will make a statement. [30700]

Mr. Hague: I have received a number of representations about the national supplement of 25p per kilogrammes live weight which beef specialists can receive under the over 30-month slaughter scheme.

The Government have extended the qualifying period for this rate until 15 June. Rates will be reviewed regularly thereafter in light of market rates for young cattle as EC regulations limit us to providing no more than the difference between 1 ecu per kilogramme and the market value.

If animals over 30 months of age on 20 March cannot be slaughtered before 15 June they will remain eligible for the top-up payments of 25p.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he plans to introduce a system for consigning animals due to enter the cull scheme to specific collecting centres; and what proposals he has for making arrangements for the relevant interim payments. [30702]

Mr. Hague: The over 30-month slaughter scheme is being run by the intervention board executive agency. Arrangements for consigning cattle to collection centres are matters for those taking part in the scheme, who are best placed to consider their own needs and local circumstances.

I understand the producers will be asked to notify the board of all the animals on which they wish to claim interim payments before the end of June and that payments will be made in the first half of July.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the current backlog of (a) steers and heifers over 30 months and (b) cull cows awaiting slaughter in each county in Wales. [30697]

Mr. Hague: Precise figures are not available. The total number of clean beef cattle and of cull cows aged over 30 months awaiting slaughter in Wales is estimated at between 15,000 and 20,000.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the date on which producers will receive their interim payment on (a) steers and heifers and (b) cull cows awaiting slaughter. [30701]

Mr. Hague: The over 30-month slaughter scheme is being run by the intervention board executive agency. I understand that producers will be asked to notify the board of all the animals on which they wish to claim interim payments before the end of June and that payments will be made in the first half of July.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from Welsh farming organisations concerning the introduction into Wales of the Scottish random selection system for allocation of animals to collection centres and for subsequent disposal; and if he will make a statement. [30703]

Mr. Hague: I have had a number of representations regarding the Scottish arrangements for allocation of cattle to selection centres. I understand that this has been organised by those taking part in the over 30-month scheme, who are best placed to consider local circumstances, and to decide priorities.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for the introduction of a cataloguing system for farmers with steers and heifers in the pipeline for the slaughter under the 30 months and over slaughter scheme, to assist in the identification of eligible animals. [30699]

Mr. Hague: The over 30-month slaughter scheme is being run by the intervention board executive agency. Arrangements for consigning cattle to collection centres or abattoirs are matters for those taking part in the scheme, who are best placed to consider their own needs and local circumstances.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what further initiatives he will take to ensure the efficient processing of cattle destined for slaughter under the 30-month BSE regulations; and if he will make a statement. [31134]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The over 30-month slaughter scheme is being run by the intervention board executive agency. Arrangements for consigning cattle to collection centres or abattoirs are matters for those taking part in the scheme, who are best placed to consider their own needs and local circumstances.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to increase rendering capacity in Wales. [30998]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Rendering capacity in Great Britain is being made available to all slaughterhouses operating as part of the 30-month slaughter scheme. We are actively considering a variety of options for increasing throughput of cattle under the scheme.

Abattoirs

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to increase the number of abattoirs in Wales. [30999]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Investment in abattoir facilities remains essentially a matter for the commercial judgment of individual operators.

Care and Repair Schemes

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from Care and Repair Cymru; and if he will make a statement. [30751]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Representations have been received from Care and Repair Cymru in response to the consultation paper, "The Welsh Office and Local Government: Redefining the Relationship". The issue was also discussed at a recent meeting between my officials and the organisation's director.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations his Department has received concerning changes in its support for local care and repair schemes; and if he will make a statement. [30759]

Mr. Jones: The Welsh Office has received representations from Care and Repair Cymru, voluntary organisations including individual care and repair schemes, local authorities, housing associations and private individuals. These representations are being considered.

Dental Services

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many dentists have left NHS service during the last year in (a) Torfaen, (b) Gwent and (c) Wales. [30980]

Mr. Hague: Information on the number of dentists who stop treating NHS patients is not available centrally. However, the number of dentists treating NHS patients in Gwent and Wales is shown in the following table. Separate information for Torfaen is not available centrally.

Number of dentists treating at least some NHS patients

	Gwent	Wales
At 31 December 1994	140	850
At 31 December 1995	141	856

GP Fundholding

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the extra annual administrative costs of the general practitioner fundholding system in Wales. [31000]

Mr. Hague: Reimbursement to general practitioner fundholders in respect of expenses covered by management allowances since the inception of the scheme is as follows:

1990–91: £0.112 million
1991–92: £0.518 million
1992–93: £1.677 million
1993–94: £3.055 million
1994–95: £3.795 million

Expenditure figures for 1995–96 are not yet available, but provisional accounts suggest that the total sum amounted to some £6.7 million.

Mr. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he proposes to ensure that the general practitioner fundholding system relates to health authority plans for local people. [31002]

Mr. Hague: Guidance on ensuring the accountability of GP fundholding practices was issued by the Welsh Office on 27 September 1995.

The guidance emphasised the need for GP fundholders and health authorities to develop partnerships to meet agreed national and local health priorities and to set out the main action required in the performance agreements between individual practices and authorities.

I have arranged for copies of the guidance to be placed in the Library of the House.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total. [30777]

Mr. Hague: The number of registered disabled staff employed by my Department is 33. This represents 1.4 per cent. of the total staff employed.

A further five registered disabled staff are employed in my Department under the sheltered placement scheme.

Pontypool Bypass

Mr. Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on delays to work on the Pontypool bypass, A4042; and what penalties will be levied on the contractor. [30978]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The contractor, Shephard Hill Civil Engineering Ltd., has experienced three days' delay as a result of adverse weather.

Liquidated damages would be applied to the contract in the normal way for late completion.

Direct Grant Schools

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many primary and secondary schools (a) are direct grant and (b) are seeking direct grant status; and if he will make a statement. [31132]

Mr. Hague: There are no longer any direct grant schools in Wales and, currently, no plans to seek applications.

School Health (Children)

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will set up a study of the condition of the teeth of primary and secondary school children in Wales with particular reference to the effects of the level of calcium in their diets. [31148]

Mr. Hague: I have no plans to do so.

Beef Farmers

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he will assist beef farmers in respect of cattle under 30 months old; and if he will make a statement. [31140]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The beef special premium and suckler cow premium schemes are available to assist beef producers. I have arranged for payments of subsidies to Welsh beef producer to be accelerated and over £66 million—representing 90 per cent. of livestock payments—was paid during April 1996. In addition, the Commission is recommending supplementary payments under these schemes which the Agriculture Council is considering this week.

Free School Milk

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the proportion of primary schools which are participating in the discretionary scheme for supplying school children under the age of five years with free school milk in each county or old county. [31155]

Mr. Hague: The EU school milk subsidy scheme is administered by the intervention board executive agency. I have asked the chief executive, Mr. G. Trevelyan, to reply direct to the hon. Member on this matter and will arrange for a copy to his reply to be placed in the Library of the House.

Farm Visits

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many farms and in what locations he has visited in 1996. [31133]

Mr. Hague: None. I visited a number of farms in 1995 and intend to do so again later this year.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on (a) the operation of the Government's measures in Wales to deal with the BSE crisis; and what assessment he has made of their effectiveness. [31081]

Mr. Hague: The Government have introduced a number of measures to assist those involved in the beef industry. These include direct support to renderers and abattoirs and schemes to remove older beef from the food chain and to help beef producers until the market recovers. It is too early to assess the effectiveness of these measures on the overall state of the industry.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many CTC colleges he proposes for Wales; and if he will make a statement. [31131]

Mr. Hague: I should be glad to consider an application to establish a CTC from any potential sponsor.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what restrictions European law places on the advertising of contracts for the supply of goods or services by local authorities though the medium of the Welsh language. [31145]

Mr. Hague: There are no restrictions on the advertising of contracts for the supply of goods or services by local authorities through the medium of Welsh. However, advertisements that are required to be placed in the Official Journal of the European Communities must be in one of the Community's official languages.

Youth Training

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his latest estimate of the number of young people currently on youth training in each training and enterprise council area; and what were the equivalent figures in the last three years. [31358]

Mr. Jonathan Evans: The figures requested are contained in the following table:

Numbers in training on youth training/youth credits/modern apprenticeships[1] at the end of March

	1993	1994	1995	1996
Gwent	2,429	2,861	2,449	2,418

[1] Includes accelerated and modern engineering apprenticeships.

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31514]

Mr. Hague: None.

Unitary Authorities

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the amount of standard spending assessment per person for each of the new unitary authorities. [31166]

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information for the 1996–97 settlement is given in the following table. This information is also available in the "Local Government Finance Report (Wales) 1996–97," a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Unitary	Standard spending assessment per head of population (£)[1]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Wasted Costs orders

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Attorney-General how many wasted costs orders have been made by courts against the Crown Prosecution Service in the last accounting year, with the breakdown of each Crown Prosecution Service area and the total sums for such areas and further broken down by the Crown courts and the magistrates courts. [28306]

The Attorney-General [pursuant to his answer, 14 May 1996, c. 384–285]: Information is now available about the number of costs awards against CPS central casework One such order was made in the magistrates courts and four in the Crown court. That answer also overstated the number of costs awards in the magistrates courts for the CPS Yorkshire area, by including some awards in favour of the CPS. The actual number of awards against the CPS was 11. An amended table is set out.

Costs awarded against CPS 1995–96

Area	Number of cost awards against CPS: Crown courts	Magistrate's courts	Amount paid £
North	2	19	3,102
Yorkshire	11	11	8,215
Mersey/Lancashire	11	6	3,259
Humber	9	6	22,827
North-west	5	14	9,363
East midlands	20	39	18,347
Wales	10	4	5,108
Midlands	9	7	7,503
Anglia	6	16	12,637
Severn/Thames	16	16	16,798
South-west	4	4	2,227

Costs awarded against CPS 1995–96

Area	Number of cost awards against CPS: Crown courts	Magistrate's courts	Amount paid £
London	111	95	63,804
South-east	13	26	19,528
Central casework	4	1	52,003
Total	231	264	244,721

1. Information is not available to establish the enactment under which the orders were made and awards of costs made otherwise than in accordance with the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985 may be included.

2. The information in relation to the number of awards is limited to Crown courts and magistrates court cases. It does not include cost awards made in the higher court.

3. The number of awards relates to all cases dealt with by the CPS areas, but does not include any orders made in respect of the specialised work handled by central casework.

4. Information about the amounts actually paid includes payments in respect of orders made in the higher courts and those in respect of the specialised work handled by central casework, but the amounts paid cannot be broken down by type of court.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Eastwood Park Prison

14. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received about Eastwood Park prison. [30276]

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. and learned Friend and I have received a number of letters from hon. Members and from members of the public about Eastwood Park and these were mainly about cell size.

Assaults on Prison Officers

15. Mr. Pope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officer hours were lost during the financial year 1995–96 due to injuries sustained as a result of assaults by prisoners; and what was the estimated cost to the Prison Service. [30277]

Miss Widdecombe: Absence by prison officers due to assaults on duty is recorded in terms of days rather than hours lost. The total number of days lost for this reason was 11,788 in 1995–96. The cost to the Prison Service is £543,150.

Identity Cards

16. Mr. Michael Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce a nationwide identity card scheme. [30280]

Mr. Sackville: We will announce our final decision on identity cards as soon as possible based on the options set out in the Green Paper published last year.

Ministerial Visits (Prisons)

17. Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many ministerial visits have been made to prisons int he last 12 months. [30282]

Miss Widdecombe: Since 6 June 1995, Home Office Minsters have visited Prison Service establishments on 75 occasions.

Fake Guns

18. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy on fake guns. [30283]

Mr. Maclean: There are strict law against the misuse of imitation firearms and the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1994 further strengthened the law. The Government's evidence to Lord Cullen's inquiry into the events at Dunblane discusses controls on imitation firearms and we shall take account of any comments Lord Cullen makes.

Firearms

19. Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review his Department's policy in respect of the issue of (a) shotgun and (b) other firearm licences to those aged under 18 years. [30286]

Mr. Maclean: Lord Cullen's inquiry into the circumstances of the tragedy at Dunblane will also examine wider issues including the controls on firearms. On 21 March the Government announced a review of firearms controls in Great Britain. As part of that review, the Government have provided detailed evidence to Lord Cullen's inquiry. Any changes to the firearms controls must await the outcome of that inquiry.

Asylum and Immigration Bill

20. Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact on employment of the Asylum and Immigration Bill. [30287]

Miss Widdecombe: We believe that the Asylum and Immigration Bill will improve employment opportunities for people lawfully resident in the United Kingdom and entitled to work here.

Euro 96

21. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional resources are being made available to the Metropolitan police in respect of crowd control during Euro 96. [30288]

Mr. Maclean: Policing outside football grounds is part of normal police duties, and costs are met from existing resources. The cost of policing inside the stadia will be met by the Football Association.

Police tactics for Euro 96 include the use of modern technology to transmit quickly to the regional centres photographic images of those involved in any disorder. The Football Trust is meeting the cost of this equipment, which is being made available close to the grounds hosting matches, in New Scotland Yard and in the national criminal intelligence service football unit.

Youth Justice System

22. Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will bring forward plans to reform the youth justice system. [30289]

Mr. Maclean: The Government's priority is to ensure the effective implementation of the range of positive initiatives and changes that are already in hand to help tackle juvenile crime.

Life Sentences

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons are at present imprisoned for life; and what were the comparable totals 10 and 20 years ago. [30268]

Mr. Howard: On 30 April, there were 3,436 life sentence prisoners in prison in England and Wales. The corresponding figures for mid-1976 and 1986 were 1,181 and 2,194 respectively.

Betting and Gambling

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place the green seal service on a statutory basis. [30829]

Mr. Kirkhope: No. The Sporting Life green seal service is a useful independent arbitrator on disputed bets. We consider that these should continue to be dealt with by voluntary regulation.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve the regulatory framework for gambling. [30279]

Mr. Kirkhope: The present framework has kept gambling well-ordered and crime free but we believe there is scope to reduce unnecessary regulation. We have proposed changes for casinos, bingo clubs and advertising of commercial gambling; and we are considering the position of the pools.

Secure Units

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to speed up the provision of secure units for young offenders. [30278]

Mr. Maclean: We are pressing ahead with the provision of secure training centres and the first of the extra 170 additional places being financed by the Department of Health came on stream in December. Around 103 more will be provided during this year.

Scott Report

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's conclusions in respect of Sir Richard's Scotts' recommendations on prosecution procedures. [32164]

Mr. Maclean: Sir Richard made eight recommendations concerning prosecution procedures. In essence, the recommendations are intended to ensure that in future the prosecution ascertains whether there are any documents held by other Government Departments and agencies which may be not only relevant to the way it proposes to put its case, but which may also be relevant to the way in which the defence proposes to put the case for the accused, so far as it is known or can be inferred. They also seek to ensure that satisfactory arrangements are in place for recording what is done by the prosecution in this regard—and the responses to their requests of other departments and agencies—and reporting all of this to the defence.

The recommendations are based on the existing law on disclosure but, as Sir Richard recognised, they need to be considered against the provisions in the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Bill, which is awaiting Report stage. The Government believe that the more focused and clearer duties established by the provisions in the Bill and the code of practice, to be promulgated under part II of the Bill, will address Sir Richard's concerns. To the extent that Sir Richard's recommendations are not already met by the provisions in the Bill, the Government have sought to identify what further action may be necessary.

Part II of the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Bill provides that the Secretary of State shall prepare a code of practice for the police designed to secure that information obtained in the course of a criminal investigation and which may be relevant to it is recorded, retained and revealed to the prosecutor for a decision on disclosure. Investigators other than the police will have to comply with any provisions of the code that are relevant to them. The Government have concluded that the draft code of practice should be amended to emphasise the duty on the investigator to explore all reasonable lines of inquiry, including those which might point away from the suspect.

The Government are preparing guidance booklets on disclosure for Government Departments and Crown servants. The purpose of these booklets is to give guidance on the procedures that should be followed concerning information which may be relevant to the investigation or prosecution of a criminal offence, and advice on the proper response to requests from investigators, prosecutors or the defence. This guidance will, of course, take account of Sir Richard's recommendations, as well as the provisions in the Criminal Procedure and Investigations Bill.

Finally, the Director of Public Prosecutions is reviewing the guidance that she gives to the Crown Prosecution Service on the proper application of the code of crown prosecutors, to ensure that the guidance emphasises the importance of the prosecutor considering whether there are any further reasonable lines of inquiry which in his view should be pursued. Similarly, other departmental prosecuting authorities will review and, where necessary, prepare equivalent guidance for other Government prosecutors.

We have placed a paper in the Library, giving a more detailed account of the Government's response to Sir Richard Scott's recommendations on prosecution procedures.

Prisoners (HIV/AIDS)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners have been infected with HIV while in prison in England and Wales; [30231]

(2) how many inmates currently are HIV positive or have AIDS in prisons in England and Wales; [30232]

(3) how many cases of HIV and AIDS have been reported in United Kingdom prisons for each year since 1991. [30233]

Miss Widdecombe: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from A. J. Pearson to Mr. Robert Key, dated 6 June 1996:

The Home Secretary has asked me, in the absence of the Director General from the office, to reply to your recent Questions about prisoners who are HIV positive or have AIDS.

There has been only one recorded case of a prisoner being infected with HIV while in prison in England and Wales.

On 21 May 1996, 80 prison inmates were known to be HIV positive or to have AIDS in prisons in England and Wales.

The following table lists cases of HIV and AIDS reported in prisons in England and Wales since 1991. Figures for Scotland and Northern Ireland can be requested from the Secretaries of State for those Departments.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cattle Incineration

Mr. Jopling: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cattle were slaughtered and destroyed by incineration on their farms during each week of the last foot and mouth disease outbreak in 1967–68. [30023]

Mrs. Browning: This information cannot be supplied in the form requested without incurring disproportionate costs. However, I can confirm that 211,825 cattle were slaughtered during the eight months of the 1967–68 foot and mouth disease epidemic. The normal practice in such cases is for the carcases to be buried or incinerated on farm to minimise the possibility of spreading the virus.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figure. [30775]

Mr. Boswell: At 1 April 1996 the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, including its agencies, employed 145 members of staff who had declared that they were registered disabled. This equates to 1.4 per cent. of the total staff employed.

Pennington Sewage Treatment Plant

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has made to

Southern Water Services in relation to the discharges from Pennington sewage treatment plant and its impact on local shellfish. [31167]

Mr. Boswell: In 1994 the Department responded to statutory consultations by the National Rivers Authority relating to discharges from Pennington sewage treatment plant.

The Department has made no representations on this subject to Southern Water Services.

Livestock Collection Centres

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which EU-approved markets and collection centres he had notified on or before 1 May to (a) the European Commission and (b) the central authorities of other EU member states as required by European Council directive 64/432/EEC. [30718]

Mrs. Browning: In addition to the collection centres listed in the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Heppell) on 20 December 1995, Official Report, column 1165, the following collection centres in Great Britain had been notified to the European Commission and central authorities of other EU member states on or before 1 May 1996:

Norton and Brooksbank sale centre, Sleastonhowe, Kirkby Thore, Penrith, Cumbria

Oliver and Son Ltd., New Market road, Edinburgh.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) how many checks were carried out by his staff on holdings, as defined in European directive 90/425/EEC (a) during 1995 and (b) between January and April 1996; [30715]

(2) if he will list the holdings in Great Britain that have been checked by MAFF in accordance with the requirements of European directive 90/425/EEC. [30714]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 4 June 1996]: Ministry personnel carry out many different types of checks at establishments which fall within the definition of a holding laid down in directive 90/425. Records of visits made are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Sharks

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) on what available data the EC quota of 100 tonnes of basking shark liver oil is based; what assessment he has made of whether the level of exploitation is sustainable; and if he will make a statement; [31330]

(2) if he will list the fisheries for basking sharks in United Kingdom waters. [31336]

Mr. Baldry: There is no EU quota for basking sharks. However, as part of the EU-Norway agreement Norwegian fishermen have a quota of 100 tonnes of basking shark liver in United Kingdom waters. The quota figure is based on historic catch levels. It has been reducing over the years from 800 tonnes in 1977 to 400 tonnes in 1988 and to the present 100 tonnes in 1991.

The very limited Norwegian uptake presents no threat to basking sharks in UK waters.

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the yearly catch for basking sharks under the EC-Norwegian agreement for each of the last five years. [31331]

Mr. Baldry: European Commission data indicate that Norwegian fishermen caught 5.8 tonnes of basking shark liver in 1993 against their annual quota of 100 tonnes under the EU-Norway agreement. No catches were recorded in the years 1991, 1992, 1994 or 1995.

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what data are collated by his Department on the landings in the United Kingdom of individual shark species; and what assessment his Department has made of the advantages of introducing a quota management system to log landings for shark species to support the convention on international trade in endangered species resolution 9.17. [31333]

Mr. Baldry: The Ministry records landings into the United Kingdom of a large number of commercially important fish species as well as of a number of species of shark and shark-like species not considered to be commercially important. The species of the latter which are currently recorded are angel shark, kitefin shark, leafscale gulper shark, great lantern shark, greater spotted dogfish, lesser spotted dogfish, spurdog, birdbeak dogfish, Portuguese dogfish, longnose velvet dogfish and knifetooth dogfish. Other shark and shark-like species are recorded under more general headings.

Sharks are not included in the convention on international trade in endangered species. However, in response to evidence of increased trade in sharks CITES resolution 9.17 commissioned research on the impact of trade on shark populations. The UK has complied with the obligations of resolution 9.17 by providing the CITES animals committee with information on trade in sharks and the biological status of sharks in UK waters. Additionally, the Department of the Environment has contributed funding of £15,000 towards the cost of research by the shark specialist group of the world conservation union.

Because shark catches in UK waters are low there is not sufficient justification for the establishment of a quota management system.

Fisheries

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC-Norwegian agreement in relation to the exchange opportunities for fisheries. [31332]

Mr. Baldry: As I said following the December 1995 Fisheries Council, the United Kingdom has large quotas at north Norway and we secured them for 1996 at the same level as in 1995.

Gelatine

Ms Quin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the food products which contain gelatine of beef origin. [24953]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 17 April 1996]: This information is not centrally recorded and cannot be provided without disproportionate cost.

Beef Ban

Ms Quin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those countries which banned the import of British beef prior to the EU ban and the date the ban came into force in each case. [26021]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 23 April 1996]: In the week prior to the adoption of Commission decision 96/239/EC on 27 March the following EU countries imposed unilateral bans or restrictions on imports of British beef: Belgium, Germany, Spain, Finland, France, Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden and Italy.

With regard to non-EU countries, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) on 16 May, Official Report columns 579–80.

Cattle Records

Mr. Hain: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) when he last met representatives of National Milk Records to discuss investment in a computerised record system tracing cattle by genetic imprint; [30711]

(2) what proposals there are for more investment in the National Milk Records cattle-tracing system; and if he will make a statement. [30712]

Mr. Baldry [holding answer 4 June 1996]: MAFF officials are in touch with National Milk Records about the future development of the NMR cattle recording system. I understand that an NMR working group is preparing proposals for extending the existing NMR database and I look forward to receiving these later this year.

Export Certificates

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if export certificate EC400 has been issued by his Department since October 1980 for calves destined for France, in excess of 15 days of age. [30727]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer 4 June 1996]: Yes; certificate EC400 was used to certify calves under the age of 42 days.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when divisional veterinary managers were notified that export certificate EC4000 is no longer to be issued; and what reasons were given. [30726]

Mrs. Browning [holding answer on 4 June 1996]: The Ministry does not have an export certificate EC4000. An instruction to divisional veterinary managers to withdraw all export health certificates in respect of live cattle, including EC400, was issued on 27 March 1996. This was in response to ratification by the European Commission of Commission decision 96/239/EC on emergency measures to protect against bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Written Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Conservation of Seals Act 1970

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to review the Conservation of Seals Act 1970; and if he will make a statement. [31299]

Mr. Sackville: The Government's policy on conservation of seals is kept under review. There are no plans to amend the 1970 Act.

Explosives

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to make it illegal to explain how to make explosives; and if he will make a statement. [31429]

Mr. Maclean: No. There are legitimate users of explosives who make them up themselves and require information on how to do so safely. A person who makes explosives for any unlawful purpose commits a serious offence under the Explosive Substances Act 1883. It is an offence under the Control of Explosives Regulations 1991 to acquire or keep explosives without a certificate from the police.

Clean Air Acts (Prosecutions)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have been brought in each year since 1979 for actions contravening the clean air legislation and regulations concerning smoke controlled areas. [31108]

Mr. Maclean: It is not possible from the information held centrally by my Department to identify offences relating to smoke controlled areas from other summary offences under the Clean Air Acts 1956 and 1968.

The table shows the number of prosecutions for air pollution offences under the two Acts from 1979 to 1994 (latest available).

It should be noted that the statistics of court proceedings are based on returns made by the police to the Home Office. Although they include offences where there has been no police involvement, such as prosecutions instigated by Government Departments—in this case local authorities—private organisations and individuals, the reporting of this type of offence is known to be incomplete.

ENVIRONMENT

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1), pursuant to his answer of 28 March, Official Report, column 710, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested; [31453]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 14 March, Official Report, column 694, how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31449]

Sir Paul Beresford: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Thamesmead Town Ltd.

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding service charges to tenants of Thamesmead Town Ltd.; and if he will make a statement. [31946]

Sir Paul Beresford: The Secretary of State received a letter from Greenwich council's housing (private sector) sub-committee on 17 May. The issues raised are under consideration and I will copy my response to the hon. Member in due course. I shall not be making a statement to the House.

Pennington Sewage Treatment Plant

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to ensure that the secondary biological treatment plant at Pennington is equipped with ultra violet disinfection equipment by Southern Water Services. [31770]

Mr. Clappison: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 6 June 1996, Official Report, column 505–506.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

SHL Software

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the contracts his Department and his agencies have with SHL software computer system; what is the current cost; when each contract ends; what are the penalties involved should he seek early termination of the contract; and if he will make a statement. [31438]

Mr. Willetts: My Department does not have any contracts with SHL software computer system.

State Papers

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what progress has been made in his initiative to release blocks of state papers when requested by historians; how many records have been released under this initiative; what subjects the released records cover; if all these records have been released to the public record office; and if he will make a statement. [31320]

Mr. Freeman: Good progress has been made with the reviewing and releasing of records since my right hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), then the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, announced on 25 June 1992, that he was inviting historians to suggest blocks of records withheld by the Government which should be considered for release as part of the Government's initiative on openness.

More than 53,000 records have been released in the Public Record Office, Kew as a result of the openness initiatives, including those released in response to historians' requests and the review by Government Departments of all over-30-year-old material in accordance with the provisions of the White Paper on open government, Cm 2290, published in July 1993.

The records that have been released over a wide variety of subjects. It would be disproportionately costly to list them all, but they include, for example, wartime Cabinet records, Joint Intelligence Committee minutes and memorandums, papers relating to the trial and execution of Roger Casement and the Invergordon mutiny, and previously withheld records relating to Suez.

In addition, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has released four batches of records from the special operations executive—SOE—archive relating to SOE's activities in Scandinavia, the far east, the middle east and eastern Europe.

Government Departments continue to re-review withheld records and to respond to requests from historians and others. As a result of these initiatives, many more records are expected to be released in the coming months.

DEFENCE

Small-arms Weapons

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for each of the armed services, for each of the last four years, the number of small-arms weapons that have been declared surplus to requirements. [31426]

Mr. Soames: Our records are not maintained in the format requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. However, the total number of small arms declared surplus to requirements over the last four years is 235,200, of which 44,300 await disposal.

European Union Flag

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions were issued to his Department's offices and agencies in respect of flying the European Union flag on 8 May; and if he will make a statement. [31502]

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 6 June by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, Official Report, column 518.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

National Lottery Grants

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if she will list for each parliamentary constituency, the organisations which have received grants from the national lottery and their amounts. [31218]

Mr. Sproat: This information is not held centrally. The Department of National Heritage is currently developing a lottery database that will make these figures available.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

UNESCO

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the UK observer to UNESCO will attend the 12th meeting of the Secretaries-General of UNESCO Commissions in the European region in Stockholm from 8 to 12 June. [31623]

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: The UK observer to UNESCO will not be attending this meeting.

Council Resolution on the development of universal service for telecommunications in the EU.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Prospects Scheme

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if she will make a statement on the prospects scheme for unemployed people aged over 40 years; and what are the principal sources of funding for the scheme. [31826]

Mr. Forth: Prospects is the name given on Merseyside to a pilot, led by Knowsley metropolitan borough council, aimed at identifying any new sources of jobs arising from social and economic change. It will run for 18 months from January 1996.

The pilot is funded by the European Union. Similar pilots are being run in 15 other member states.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 7 May concerning the Construction Industry Training Board which was transferred from the Department of Trade and Industry to her Department. [31575]

Mr. Paice: A reply was sent on 5 June.

Student Loans Company

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average length of time hon. Members have had to wait for a reply from the chief executive of the Student Loans Company to parliamentary questions that her Department refers to him to answer; and if she will make a statement. [31484]

Mr. Forth: I understand that the average length of time taken by the Student Loans Company to reply to parliamentary questions tabled during the past 12 months has been seven days.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) pursuant to her answer of 16 May, Official Report, column 516, when the hon. Member can expect a reply from the chief executive of the Student Loans Company; [31494]

(2) pursuant to her answer of 1 May, Official Report, column 539, when the hon. Member can expect a reply from the chief executive of the Students Loans Company. [31441]

Mr. Forth: I understand that the chief executive has now written to the hon. Member, as requested.

Barnsley and Doncaster Training and Enterprise Council

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the total amount of money paid to date to the Barnsley and Doncaster TEC to assist with social and economic regeneration in respect of the pit closure programme; and (a) how much has been spent to-date and (b) on what scheme. [31424]

Mr. Paice: Over the three financial years 1993–94 to 1995–96, a total of £6.9 million pounds has been paid to the Barnsley and Doncaster training and enterprise council to support the range of activities agreed between the Government office for Yorkshire and Humberside and the TEC under the local coal plan.

The moneys were used by the TEC to extend and enhance the provision of adult training, business start-up and business support services available to communities that were affected by colliery closures. In addition, a number of local initiatives were developed, using the funding provided, to increase the range of local education, training and employment advisory and guidance services available to those who required help.

Other Government funding available to the TEC will also have benefited those areas directly affected by colliery closure.

Additional Educational Needs Funding

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if she will (a) list the change in 1996–97 education standard spending assessment (i) in cash, (ii) as a percentage of total standard spending assessment and (iii) in pounds per pupil aged five to 18 years for each education authority and by class, arising from her decision to reverse the policy of increasing allowances for additional educational needs and free school meals in line with increases in the number of children of income support claimants and (b) rank each authority in descending order in terms of cash lost per pupil; [31051]

(2) if she will list the representations from local authorities to date (a) in favour and (b) against her decision to reverse the policy of increasing additional educational needs allowances and free school meals in line with increases in the number of children of income support claimants; and if she will make a statement; [31052]

(3) if she will list the proportion of education standard spending assessment distributed by the additional educational needs index (a) in 1990–91, (b) in 1995–96 and (c) in 1996–97 for each education sub-block and in total. [30997]

Mr. Robin Squire: The information is set out in the tables. Options setting out different ways of calculating the allowances in the schools standard spending assessment—SSA—sub-blocks for additional educational needs and free school meals were presented to the local authority associations last year for consultation. The option chosen was to reset the allowances at the levels derived from the 1993 review of standard spending assessments. The option chosen is supported by the Association of County Councils and opposed by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and the Association of London Government. To date, I have received representations from two local authorities opposing the option chosen.

1. Columns 4 and 5 calculate SSA per 5 to 18+ pupil by dividing the sum of the primary, secondary and post-16 SSA sub-blocks by the sum of pupils aged 5 to 10, 11 to 15 and post-16, as defined in the Local Government Finance Report (England) 1996–97.
2. Column 4 sets out the actual level of SSA per pupil aged 5 to 18+ for 1996–97. Column 5 sets out what the level of SSA per pupil would have been without the change in methodology.
3. Column 6 ranks each authority in descending order of the change in SSA funding per pupil.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he intends to lay before Parliament the proposed regulations which affect the payment of the disability living allowance mobility component to certain hospital in-patients. [32222]

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: The Social Security (Disability Living Allowance and Claims and Payments) Amendment Regulations 1996 were placed before the House today, 7 June. These regulations align the payment rules for the mobility component of disability living allowance—DLA—with those for the DLA care component, which is withdrawn after the first 28 days in hospital, 84 days for children.

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if a claimant for a backdated award will be advised that he should also make his claim for reduced earnings allowance at the same time; and what form the advice will take. [31259]

Mr. Roger Evans: The administration of reduced earnings allowance, payable under the industrial injuries scheme, is a matter for Peter Mathison, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Michael Clapham, dated 6 June 1996:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking if a claimant for a back dated award will be advised that he should also make his claim for Reduced Earning Allowance (REA) at the same time; and what form the advice will take.

I have assumed, as you have not specified the other benefit, that you are referring to a claim for Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit (IIDB).

Instructions to Benefit Agency staff provide for the issue of leaflet NI6, together with the relevant claim form, to a person who asks about claiming IIDB in respect of either an accident at work or an industrial disease.

Leaflet NI6, on page 9, gives information on how and when to claim REA and stresses that a person should not delay claiming REA until after the claim of Disablement Benefit is determined or they may lose benefit for any period more than three months before date of claim.

I am enclosing a copy of the leaflet NI6 for information. A revised version of this leaflet will be available shortly which will take account of the other REA legislative changes.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Coal Industry

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the (a) maximum and (b) minimum cost per hour charged by N. M. Rothschild working on the contract to give advice on the privatisation of the coal industry; what is the total cost to date; what is the estimated final total cost; and if he will make a statement. [31489]

Mr. Page: Information relating to hourly rates paid to advisers on coal privatisation is commercially confidential. I can, however, confirm that, since 1991–92, the Department has paid N. M. Rothschild £8.956 million in professional fees. Further payments are expected to be small.

British Coal (Equal Pay)

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will advise the British Coal Corporation to commit itself to negotiations on the colliery canteen workers' equal pay claim following the dismissal of their appeal to the House of Lords; and what steps he will take to bring the parties together; [31927]

(2) if he will advise the British Coal Corporation to make a special payment as part of the settlement of the canteen workers' equal pay claim for the undue delay in this case. [31928]

Mr. Page: These are matters for British Coal.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principle grades and the number and percentage of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30556]

Mr. John M. Taylor: On 1 April 1996, the DTI, excluding its executive agencies employed:

(a) (i) 3,235 men; (ii) 2,631 women.

(b) the following number of staff and women in its main grade levels:

Grade level	Total number of staff	Women	Percentage of women in grade level
G2	9	0	0
G3	43	8	18.6
G4	7	3	42.9
G5	156	25	16.0
G6	121	29	24.0

SEO	406	76	18.7
HEO	1,034	314	30.4
EO	1,121	531	47.3

(c) the following number of staff and women in its administration grade levels:

			Per cent.
AO	1,544	1,003	65.0
AA	759	490	64.6

The figures are provided on a headcount basis. They exclude casual staff and staff currently out of the Department, such as those on loan, career breaks.

I have asked the chief executives of this Department's agencies to respond to the hon. Member direct.

Letter from P. R. S. Hartnack to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 31 May 1996:

I am responding in relation to the Patent Office to your Parliamentary Question to the President of the Board of Trade about male and female employees. The information requested is set out in the following tables:

Letter from Seton Bennett to Mr. Brian Donohoe, dated 31 May 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to provide additional information on behalf of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory in reply to your question about the numbers and percentages of women employed on 1 April 1996.

For NWML, the information you request is summarised in the following table. This Agency employs a significant number of staff in the Scientific and the Professional and Technology grades and I have included these in the figures for the appropriate levels.

Staff included in the data comprise permanent staff, staff on loan from other Government Departments, staff seconded from the private sector (who have been allocated to the grades which reflect their salaries) and staff on paid maternity and sick leave.

The data does not include casual staff and those on short term appointments from agencies.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the employment effects in the United Kingdom of the introduction of a statutory national minimum wage set at (a) £3 per hour, (b) £3.50 per hour and (c) £4 per hour; and if he will make a statement. [31291]

Mr. John M. Taylor: Assuming a half restoration of differentials, a minimum wage set at the levels indicated would destroy in excess of 1 million jobs.

Mr. Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the cost to the Exchequer from the introduction of a statutory national minimum wage of (a) £3 per hour, (b) £3.50 per hour and (c) £4 per hour; and if he will make a statement on the basis for the calculations. [31290]

Mr. Taylor: I have made no such assessment. However, it is clear that a minimum wage would destroy hundreds of thousands of jobs, which would have an adverse effect on the Exchequer.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures. [30766]

Mr. John M. Taylor: The figures for DTI, excluding its executive agencies, are set out below:

Total staff: 6,511

Registered disabled: 67

As a percentage of total staff: 1.03

The DTI also employs a number of staff with disabilities who have chosen not to register.

Agency chief executives have been asked to respond direct to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Joyce to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 30 May 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question about the number of registered disabled people employed by The Insolvency Service; and what percentage this is of the total figure.

As at 18 April 1996, 17 registered disabled persons were employed by The Insolvency Service, representing 1.24% of the total permanent staff in post.

In addition, there are 28 permanent members of staff with disabilities who have chosen not to register. This represents 2.05% of the total permanent staff in post.

Letter from Jim Norton to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 7 June 1996:

I am replying on behalf of the Radiocommunications Agency to your question to the President of the Board of Trade about the percentage of disabled people employed.

To ask the President of the Board of Trade, how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department; and what percentage this is of the total figures.

The Radiocommunications Agency has no registered disabled staff.

However, there are a number of staff with disabilities who have chosen not to register.

Letter from John Holden to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 7 June 1996:

You recently asked the President of the Board of Trade, how many registered disabled people are employed by his Department and what percentage this if of the total figures. I am replying as Chief Executive of Companies House.

There are 13 members of staff in Companies House who are registered disabled. This represents 1.2% of total staff.

There are, however, a further 20 members of staff who have identified themselves as disabled but are not registered disabled. This in total represents 3% of Companies House staff with disabilities.

Letter from J. C. Octon to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 31 May 1996:

In the absence of the Comptroller General on official business I am replying for the Patent Office to your question on the number of registered disabled staff employed in the Office. The figures are:

Total number of staff as at 1 April 1996: 810

Number of registered disabled staff: 12

Disabled as percentage of total staff: 1.5%

The Office also has staff with disabilities who have chosen not to register.

Letter from Seton Bennett to Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, dated 31 May 1996:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to provide information on behalf of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory in reply to your question about the number of disabled people employed by DTI.

This Agency has no registered disabled among its 51 employees.

TREASURY

Abortions

Sir David Steel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many deaths were recorded as a result of abortion operations in England and Wales in 1995 [31317]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The information requested is not yet available. The 1994 deaths following legal abortions will be presented in the Office for National Statistics annual reference volume "Abortion Statistics 1994 Series AB No. 21" due for publication in July 1996.

Drugs-related Deaths

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many drugs-related deaths occurred in (a) Coventry and (b) the west midlands for each year since 1990. [31094]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The number of drugs-related deaths[1] to residents of Coventry district health authority and West Midlands regional health authority for each year since 1990 are shown in the table.

	Coventry	West Midlands
1990	5	30
1991	1	26
1992	2	29
1993	1	33
1994	1	25

[1] International Classification of Diseases 9th Revision codes 304 (drug dependence) and 305.2–305.9 (non-dependent abuse of drugs).

Deaths for 1992 and earlier years represent the number of deaths registered in each year, while deaths for 1993 and 1994 are deaths which occurred in these years. Also, new procedures for coding cause of death from 1993, and the absence of medical inquires, mean that figures for 1993 onwards may not be exactly comparable with earlier years. For most conditions, however, these effects are small. More details may be found in Office of Population Censuses and Surveys series DH2 for 1993, which was published in October 1995, a copy of which may be accessed by the House of Commons Library.

Child Maintenance

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the availability of tax relief on the cost of child maintenance for (a) married and (b) unmarried absent parents. [31202]

Mr. Jack: For maintenance arrangements entered into since 1988, tax relief is available only for payments made to a divorced or separated spouse for their own maintenance or the maintenance of a child living with them. The relief is subject to certain conditions and to a limit equal to the married couple's allowance.

EDS Computer Systems

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has revised his estimate of the savings to be made from his Department's information technology partnership with the firm EDS; and if he will make a statement. [31783]

Mrs. Angela Knight: The Treasury and its agencies do not have a technology partnership with the firm EDS.

CRESTCo

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he will take on the Director General of Fair Trading's report on CRESTCo. [32400]

Mrs. Angela Knight: My right hon. and learned Friend and I have now considered the Director General of Fair trading's report and we agree with his conclusion that the rules proposed by CRESTCo do not pose any significant competition problems. Accordingly, I have written to the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board to inform him that the Treasury gives the SIB leave to recognise CRESTCo as a recognised clearing house under the Financial Services Act 1986 and to approve CRESTCo as an operator of a relevant system under the Uncertificated Securities Regulations 1995 (SI 1995 No. 3272.

HEALTH

Emergency Ambulance Calls

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average response time to a 999 call for an ambulance in London. [31321]

Mr. Horam: Average response time figures are not available centrally.

Ms Hodge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what basis need is assessed in response to 999 calls in London; and what system of prioritisation is employed. [31323]

Mr. Horam: All 999 calls are given equal priority at present.

Doncaster Health Authority

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many applications, broken down by gender, were received for the position of chairman of the new Doncaster health authority; how many candidates matched the criteria for selection; how many were considered for the shortlist; and what criteria were used for the final selection. [31495]

Mr. Malone: Following a regional advertising campaign and review of the regional database of candidates, two suitable candidates, both male, were identified. Both were interviewed and assessed against the job description for health authority chairmen, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the contracts for hospital and health services awarded under the competitive tendering process to date by Doncaster health authority, (b) the successful tenderers and (c) the value of the contracts. [31493]

Mr. Horam: This is a matter for Doncaster health authority. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Keith Jones, chairman of the authority for details.

Hospital Readmissions

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 1 April, Official Report, column 52, when the information which the national health service executive is collecting about the number of patients aged between 16 and 64 years who have been (a) discharged within the previous 90 days and (b) re-admitted to hospital within 90 days of discharge will be available. [31938]

Mr. Bowis: The national health service executive will receive the first returns of this information, covering the period April to June 1996, some time after the end of that period.

Mental Health Challenge Fund

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those health authorities and their approved projects which have received grants from the mental health challenge fund. [31940]

Mr. Bowis: I announced details of the successful bids on 23 April.

Mental Illness

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State of Health what action he plans to take to ensure that, as the number of psychiatric nurses increases, a higher proportion focus on people with a severe mental illness. [31939]

Mr. Bowis: The national health service executive has made it clear that is the responsibility of health authorities, in partnership with providers of mental health services, to ensure that appropriate services are provided for people with a severe mental illness, based upon an assessment of local need.

Yorkshire RHA

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the research experience, (b) the job held prior to their final appointment with Yorkshire regional health authority and (c) the terms agreed on transfer from the regional health authority into other public employment for staff on senior managers pay point 9 or above, employed in the final year of its existence by the Yorkshire regional health authority. [30599]

Mr. Malone: Such data on employees of the former Yorkshire regional health authority are not available centrally.

Hospitals

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the hospitals which have been opened in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement. [31219]

Mr. Horam: The information is not available centrally in this form. For major national health service capital projects completed on site, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) on 20 March, Official Report, columns 247–48.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the hospitals which have been closed in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement. [31220]

Mr. Horam: This information is not collected centrally.

Water Fluoridation

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many water companies have fluoridated their water since 1985. [31381]

Mr. Malone: In England, since 1985, eight water undertakers have operated fluoridation schemes.

General Practitioners

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the number of GPs at present per head of population (a) per health authority and (b) per family health services authority. [31380]

Mr. Malone: Family health services authorities ceased to exist on 1 April 1996. The number per health authority is not yet available.

Hepatitis B Vaccinations

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimates he has made of (a) the extra costs of universal hepatitis B vaccinations; (b) the total cost of such a vaccination programme and (c) the cost of administering the vaccinations. [31371]

Mr. Horam: I refer the hon. Member to the replies I gave her on 6 March, Official Report, column 294, for information on costs.

Haemophilia

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in relation to haemophilia, what guidance he issues in respect of (a) a patient's consent to blood tests for hepatitis C and (b) a patient being told about positive results. [31372]

Mr. Horam: The Department of Health issued general guidance in 1990 on consent for examination and treatment. Doctors treating patients with haemophilia will be aware of the risk of infection with hepatitis C in the case of patients treated with blood products before they began to be heat treated to destroy viruses in 1985. The majority of patients at risk have already been tested and advised of the results as part of the management of their condition.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what is (a) the number of haemophiliacs and (b) the number who have been infected with hepatitis C; [31373]

(2) if he will list the percentage of partners of haemophiliacs who have been infected with hepatitis C; [31376]

(3) if he will list the percentage of children of haemophiliacs who are infected with hepatitis C. [31377]

Mr. Horam: This information is not available centrally.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the rate of hepatitis C infection in haemophiliacs in each European country. [31374]

Mr. Horam: We have no information about the rates of hepatitis C infection in haemophiliacs in other European countries.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the countries that have given compensation to haemophiliacs infected with hepatitis C. [31375]

Mr. Horam: No.

Breast Cancer

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has issued on the maximum waiting time for surgery for breast cancer. [31378]

Mr. Horam: No such guidance has been issued by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. However, the national health service breast screening programme recommends that 90 per cent. of women should be admitted within three weeks of being informed of the need for surgical treatment.

Community Pharmacy Bills

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the time scale for payment by his Department of bills submitted by community pharmacies; and what estimate he has made of the number of bills in each of the last five years which were paid after this period. [31379]

Mr. Malone: A payment representing approximately 80 per cent. of the amount due for dispensing prescriptions is made to community pharmacies on the first day of the month following that in which the correctly endorsed prescription is submitted for pricing. The remainder is paid on the first day of the following month. The costs to pharmacies of payment to this time scale are included in pharmacists' pay for providing NHS pharmaceutical services. Payments made beyond this time scale are not contemplated and information on any possible instances is therefore not collected centrally.

Private Finance Initiative

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the stage reached for the planned private finance initiatives for each of the proposed new hospitals in (a) Norfolk and Norwich, (b) Amersham, (c) Carlisle, (d) Swindon, (e) north Durham, (f) Bishop Auckland, (g) the Royal London hospital and (h) St. Thomas's hospital. [31876]

Mr. Horam: Full business cases for Norfolk and Norwich, Amersham, and Swindon have been approved, and the full business case for Carlisle is currently being considered for approval. Outline business cases for the remaining schemes have been approved. At north Durham and Bishop Auckland, the trusts concerned have identified preferred bidders and are preparing full business cases. At the Royal London hospital and St. Thomas's hospital, the trusts concerned have prepared shortlists from which they will identify their preferred bidder.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will publish the terms of the proposed private finance initiatives for the proposed new hospitals in (a) Norfolk and Norwich, (b) Amersham, (c) Carlisle, (d) Swindon, (e) north Durham, (f) Bishop Auckland, (g) the Royal London hospital and (h) St. Thomas's hospital; [31880]

(2) what is the length of repayment periods for the proposed private finance initiatives for the proposed new hospitals in (a) Norfolk and Norwich, (b) Amersham, (c) Carlisle, (d) Swindon, (e) north Durham and (f) Bishop Auckland; [31879]

(3) what is the repayment period for the proposed private finance initiatives for the Royal London hospital and St. Thomas's hospital. [31877]

Mr. Horam: The contract terms in these private finance initiative projects are being negotiated between the trusts and their private sector partners. A privately financed solution is acceptable only if it offers better value for money overall than a publicly funded alternative.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much is being sought through the private finance initiative for the proposed new hospitals in (a) Norfolk and Norwich, (b) Amersham, (c) Carlisle, (d) Swindon, (e) north Durham, (f) Bishop Auckland, (g) the Royal London hospital and (h) St. Thomas's hospital. [31878]

Mr. Horam: The capital values of private finance initiative schemes approved in the full business cases for the following hospitals are:

	£ million
Norfolk and Norwich	170
South Buckinghamshire NHS trust, which includes:
Amersham general hospital	38
Swindon	90

The other hospitals mentioned in the question are in the process of negotiation with private sector partners or potential private sector partners and the total value of any proposed scheme is part of the negotiating process.

Infections (Schools)

Mr. Eastham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures his Department is pursuing to combat head lice infestation in schools. [31621]

Mr. Horam: The Department launched an information campaign on 22 April. This was ably assisted by the voluntary organisation Community Hygiene Concern—CHC—which provides support and advice to families on dealing with this problem. CHC currently receives grant aid from the Department of £75,000 over three years.

Our campaign leaflet, "The Prevention and Treatment of Head Lice" gives advice to parents and teachers on the options available. The campaign has proved popular with community health professionals, including those in the school health service. In excess of 750,000 leaflets have been distributed.

Paediatric Intensive Care Beds

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will make a statement on the provision of paediatric intensive care beds per head in (a) Yorkshire and (b) England; [31989]

(2) what is the number of paediatric intensive care beds per capita in each of the regional health authorities in England. [31899]

Mr. Horam: A recent survey of dedicated general and specialist paediatric intensive care beds open in England, by regional health authority, indicates current bed distribution relative to resident child populations as shown in the table. This does not take account of intensive care for children provided in adult intensive care units or of care provided outside the region in question. A report by the chief executive of the national health service executive on paediatric intensive care was published last month, copies of which are available in the Library. The report describes plans to develop this service further, and to provide additional beds.

Region	Beds open: April 1996	Population (0 to 16 years)[1]	Bed per capita ratio

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sharks

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures have been taken over the last five years to assess the stock size of the basking shark in United Kingdom waters; and what the stock size is currently estimated to be. [31329]

Mr. Baldry: Between 1987 and 1992, the basking shark was the subject of a survey programme carried out by the Marine Conservation Society. The Scottish Office Agriculture, Environment and Fisheries Department monitored the very limited Scottish basking shark fishery while it was in operation, and collated data from other nations. However, no estimates of basking shark stock size were made, due in part to their erratic and highly variable appearances off western European coasts.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) who is the legally responsible attendant for livestock on vehicles carried by sea between Dover and Dunkirk when the driver of the vehicle is travelling on an alternative sea route; [31774]

(2) what measures are in place to ensure that vehicles carrying livestock between Dover and Dunkirk keep within their journey plans, in the event that they must wait at Dunkirk for absent drivers travelling on other sea routes. [31775]

Mrs. Browning: The Welfare of Animals during Transport Order 1994, as amended, requires every person in charge of any animal transport undertaking that transports animals in the course of business or trade to ensure that, when animals are unaccompanied, the consignee is prepared to receive them and, to ensure that the animals are transported without delay to their place of destination.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many communications he received in 1995 regarding the export of live farm animals; and how many were from hon. Members. [31786]

Mrs. Browning: In 1995, the Ministry received 19,695 communications regarding the export of live farm animals, of which 1,966 were from hon. Members.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Marlow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects (a) interim judgment and (b) full judgment in the case on BSE which he is placing before the European Court of Justice. [31828]

Mrs. Browning: The United Kingdom's challenge to the legality of the export ban was placed before the European Court of Justice on 24 May. We have not yet been given a date for the hearing on the application for an interim injunction, but expect this to take place in about three to four weeks, with the ECJ issuing its interim judgment within a further week. Given the usual timetable for this type of case, we expect final judgment to take about 18 months.

SCOTLAND

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland for what reasons he changed the terms of previous Scottish Office guidance issued to Scottish local authorities relating to the compulsory competitive tendering of council services under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1986. [30537]

Mr. Kynoch: The early reintroduction of compulsory competitive tendering of services under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 is designed to ensure value for money for council tax payers. The decision follows complaints that some councils have failed to obtain value for money when existing arrangements expire, notwithstanding a warning issued on 15 November 1995 that the Government would reconsider the length of the CCT moratorium if authorities did not approach the suspension of CCT in a constructive manner.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the value of services that will be subject to the competitive tendering exercise under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980; and how many jobs in Scottish councils will be covered by these contractual arrangements. [30595]

Mr. Kynoch: Precise information is not available. However, we estimate that in 1994–95 local authorities were carrying out in-house work valued at about £560 million and employing 20,000 following competitive tendering exercises under the 1980 Act.

The extent to which this work will be subject to a competitive tendering exercise for re-introduction on 1 January will depend on when the present arrangements expire.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to reverse his recent change of guidance to Scottish local authorities, issued on 13 May, relating to the compulsory competitive tendering of services under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 and to extend the deadline for this exercise to 1 July. [30540]

Mr. Kynoch: No.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to publish information on the private finance initiative in Scotland. [32461]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am publishing today a document entitled "Private Finance and Public Services: A Partnership for Scotland". It summarises guidance on the preparation of private finance initiative projects and lists sources of advice for those sponsoring projects in Scotland. It also describes the progress and potential of the initiative in Scotland and includes a list of actual and potential projects. I shall arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library of the House.

Development Corporations

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what valuation was put on the housing stock of each of Scotland's development corporations by the appropriate district valuer; and when these valuations were made. [30543]

Mr. Kynoch: The information is set out in the table.

Corporation	District valuer's valuation £ million	Date
Glenrothes	47.673	31 March 1994
East Kilbride	57.277	30 November 1993
Cumbernauld	29.835	31 March 1995
Livingston	42.133	8 August 1995
Irvine	33.043	17 August 1995

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the organisations that were allowed to bid for the housing stock of each development corporation in Scotland, the valuations put on the housing stock of each corporation by each bidder, the names of the successful bidders, the number of properties successfully bid for in each case and the amounts that each organisation paid for these properties. [30551]

Mr. Kynoch: The guidance issued by the Scottish Office on the disposal of tenanted housing owned by the new town development corporations provided that local authorities, registered housing associations or approved landlords could bid for the stock. The table shows in column 2 the organisations that submitted bids, in column 3 the number of areas of each town for which each organisation submitted bids and in column 4 the total of the cash bids made by each organisation. The successful bidders for the tenanted stock in Glenrothes and East Kilbride, the new towns where disposal has been completed, were Kirkcaldy district council, which paid £51.682 million for 4,783 houses, and East Kilbride district council, which paid £56.2 million for 7,834 houses. The purchase prices are lower than the cash bids as the number of tenanted houses fell, mainly due to sales to tenants, in the period between submission of the bids and completion of the sale.

Corporation (1)	Bidders (2)	Number of areas bid for (3)	Cash bids £ million (4)
Glenrothes	Kirkcaldy District Council	15	53.619
	Hillcrestt Housing Association	4	15.340

	Viewpoint Housing Association	1	0.860
Irvine	Cunninghame District Council	5	32.375
(5 areas)	Irvine Housing Association	5	22.777

[1] Each Corporation divided the housing stock into discrete geographical areas for the purposes of disposal of the tenanted stock. Bidders could bid for any number or all of the areas.

Inverclyde Enterprise Zone

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many companies have been recruited to designated sites by Locate in Scotland during the existence of the Inverclyde enterprise zone; and if he will make a statement. [30181]

Mr. Kynoch [holding answer 4 June 1996]: Four companies operating from sites within the Inverclyde enterprise zone have been attracted to those sites by Locate in Scotland since the zone was established.

TRANSPORT

Departmental Staff

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list (a) the number of (i) male and (ii) female employees, (b) the number of officials employed at each of the principal grades and the numbers and percentages of women employed at each of these grades and (c) the number of staff employed at administrative grades and the number and percentage of these staff who are women in his Department on 1 April. [30553]

Mr. Norris: The answer, as recorded in the Department's two computerised personnel records systems, is in the tables.

(a) Total staff in the Department of Transport as at 1st April 1996 broken down by gender

Highways Agency

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the Highways Agency's 1996–97 proposed expenditure in each of the regions for (a) new network enhancement schemes, (b) new motorway communications projects and (c) new local safety schemes. [31310]

Mr. Watts: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Graham Allen, dated 7 June 1996:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent question asking if he will list the Highways Agency's 1996–97 proposed expenditure in each of the regions for (a) new network enhancement schemes (b) new motorway communication projects and (c) new local safety schemes.

The Highways Agency proposed to spend during 1996–97 the amounts (in £) set out below in each of its four regions on new network enhancement schemes, new motorway communication projects and new local safety schemes respectively:

	Southern	London	Midland	Northern
Network enhancements	0	290,000	400,000	0
Communications[1]	1,753,000	395,000	135,000	500,000
Safety schemes	450,000	225,000	550,000	500,000

[1] In addition to these amounts 973,000 will be spent on new communications projects which will be managed centrally by the HA.

All these sums will be in addition to expenditure on schemes which began before the start of the current financial year, but will incur further expenditure during it.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 26 March, Official Report, column 546, (1) how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested; [31457]

(2) how much his Department estimated it would have cost to provide the information requested. [31448]

Mr. Norris: More than £450, the current threshold above which answers are deemed to incur disproportionate cost.

Road Accidents

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many serious injuries, deaths or other appropriate and broadly comparable indicators of road accidents occur annually per unit of vehicle/miles travelled in each member state of the Europe Union; and what studies have been made of variations. [32016]

Mr. Norris: International comparisons of road accident data are difficult because of national difference in definition, reporting procedures, reporting rates of both the public and collecting authorities, the legal requirement to report injury accidents and different levels of enforcement of road safety legislation. The table, which includes European member states, presents available data which are regarded as reasonably comparable between the countries shown. Such comparisons provide a benchmark for a wide variety of more detailed studies of international variation in road accident casualties and rates or reporting procedures.

[1] Figures in bold are for 1993.

Hackney Carriage Licences

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has, following the Smith and Kelly v. Wirral metropolitan borough council decision, for re-instating the rights of courts to override the refusal of councils to grant hackney carriage licences. [31351]

Mr. Norris: As I do not share the hon. Member's view of the implication of this decision, I have no plans of the sort he suggests.

Railtrack Share Flotation

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost to public funds of Railtrack's celebration of its share flotation held at the natural history museum; and if he will make a statement. [31430]

Mr. Watts: None.

Forth Rail Bridge

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much Railtrack is planning to spend on the remedial works identified by the Health and Safety Executive's recent report on the Forth rail bridge; what projects have been delayed because of the emergency nature of the repairs to the Forth rail bridge; and what expenditure Railtrack is planning on the Forth rail bridge over the next three financial years. [31474]

Mr. Watts: This is an operational matter for Railtrack.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures are taken to ensure that vessels carrying vehicles containing livestock between Dover and Dunkirk do not exceed the number of passengers a cargo ship is licensed to carry. [31773]

Mr. Norris: All ships trading internationally to and from UK ports are subject to inspection by the Marine Safety Agency to ensure that they comply with the appropriate standards, including the requirement that any ship carrying more than 12 passengers must have a passenger safety certificate.

Performance Bonds

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer of 20 May, Official Report, column 38, what was the sum required for each of the bonds; and what was the size of the company to which each related. [31231]

Mr. Norris [holding answer 4 June 1996]: In one case, the value of the bond was £2.5 million in respect of a contract with a tender value of approximately £25 million awarded to a company with a turnover for a year in which the bond was placed of around £350 million.

In the second case, the value of the bond was £4.75 million in respect of a group of contracts with total value of approximately £38 million awarded to a company whose turnover was around £95 million for the year in which the bond was placed.

In neither case was it ultimately necessary to call on the bonds protection, though such additional protection was considered prudent to protect the Department as a client.

WALES

Archive Services

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received concerning the provisions of section 60 of the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 on archive services in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [31482]

Mr. Hague: I have received several representations from hon. Members and others. Section 60 of the Local Government (Wales) Act 1994 requires councils to consult with Ministers about the schemes which they prepare under that section and to have regard to ministerial advice. It imposes no onus on myself or colleagues to monitor the implementation or operation of the schemes, but using reserve powers in sections 32 to 34 of the Act I could intervene where appropriate. I trust that it will not prove necessary to use those powers.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

AIDS Conference

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if representatives from his Department will be attending the 11th international conference on AIDS in Vancouver in July. [31018]

Mr. Hanley: The Overseas Development Administration will be funding the attendance of a researcher in HIV/AIDS at this meeting. The ODA is also providing grants for five scholars from developing countries to enable them to attend.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 278

SESSION 1995–96

20th May—7th June 1996

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instruments etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker's rulings and statements'.

Other contributions by Speaker and deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates and Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates, etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Comm = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
